

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

LEWIS, A. T.

HISTORY OF THE
CONSULATE AND THE EMPIRE OF FRANCE UNDER NAPOLEON.

BY M. ADOLPHE THIERS.
LATE PRIME MINISTER OF FRANCE; MEMBER OF THE FRENCH ACADEMY, AND OF THE INSTITUTE, ETC. ETC. ETC., AUTHOR OF "THE HISTORY OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION."

TRANSLATED BY
D. FORBES CAMPBELL AND H. W. HERBERT.
WITH NOTES AND ADDITIONS.

VOL. I.

PHILADELPHIA:
JOHN HIGHLANDS.
1893.

DC
201
T413
1893

HISTORY OF
THE CONSULATE AND THE EMPIRE v. 1

FRANCE UNDER
N A P O L E O N.

BOOK I.

CONSTITUTION OF THE YEAR VIII.

The Provisional Consuls enter upon their Functions—Division of Duties between Sieyès and General Bonaparte—The General secures for himself the Administration of Affairs, and leaves the digesting of the new Constitution to Sieyès—State of France in Brumaire, Year VIII.—Disorder in the Administration of the Finances—Extreme Destitution of the Armies—Disturbances in La Vendée—Agitation of the Revolutionary Party in some of the Cities of the South—First efforts of the Provisional Consuls to restore order in the different departments of the Government—Appointment of Cambacérès to the Ministry of Justice, Laplace to the Ministry of the Interior, Foucquier to the Ministry of the Police, Talleyrand to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Berthier to the Ministry of War, Forfait to the Ministry of the Marine, Gaudin to the Ministry of the Finances—First Financial Measures—Suppression of the Progressive Forced Loan—Institution of the Agency of Direct Contributions, and immediate preparation of the Assessments left in arrear for several years—Creation of Bonds of the Receivers-general—Confidence begins to be restored; the Bankers of Paris lend the Government the first Funds that it has need of—Relief sent to the Armies—Political Acts of the Provisional Consuls—Repeal of the Law of Hostages; Release of the Priests in confinement and of the Persons Shipwrecked off Calais—Parleys with the Chiefs of the Royalist Party—Suspension of Arms in La Vendée concluded with Messrs. de Bourmont, d'Autichamp, and de Châtillon—Commencement of Relations with Foreign Cabinets—State of Europe—England and Austria bent on continuing the War—Paul I. irritated against his Allies, is disposed to withdraw from the Coalition, and to accede to the System of Neutrality adopted by Prussia—Importance of Prussia at that Moment—General Bonaparte sends his Aid-de-Camp, Dorne, to Berlin—Rumours of Peace—Sensible Improvement in the material and moral State of France, in consequence of the first Acts of the Provisional Consuls—The Subject of the Constitution begins to be taken up—Plan of Sieyès long before projected and matured—List of Notables, the Conservative Senate, the Legislative Body, the Tribunal, the Grand Elector—Disagreement between Sieyès and Bonaparte relative to the Organization of the Executive Power—Danger of a Rupture between those two Personages—They are reconciled through the Mediation of Friends—The Grand Electors superseded by Three Consuls—Adoption of the Constitution of the Year VIII., and the Commencement of its Operation fixed for the 4th of Nivose.

THE events of the 18th of Brumaire had terminated the existence of the Directory.

The men who, after the storms of the Convention, devised that sort of republic were not thoroughly convinced of the excellence and solidity of their work; but, on emerging from the reign of blood which they had just witnessed, it was difficult for them to do better or otherwise than they did. It was impossible, in fact, to think of the Bourbons, to whom public opinion was decidedly hostile; it was equally impossible to throw themselves into the arms of an illustrious general; for, at that period, none of our military men had acquired sufficient glory to subjugate the national mind. All illusions, moreover, were not yet dispelled by experience. The nation had just escaped from the hands of the Committee of Public Welfare; it had yet tried only the sanguinary republic of '93, consisting of a single assembly, which exercised all powers at once: a last trial was yet left to be made, that of a moderate republic, in which the supreme power should be judiciously divided, and the administration of which should be committed to new men, who had no hand in those excesses which had filled France with horror. The Directory was in consequence devised.

This newly-contrived republic lasted four years, from the 14th of Brumaire, year IV., till the 18th of Brumaire, year VIII. It was set on foot honestly and heartily by men, most of whom were upright, and animated by excellent intentions. Some persons of violent character or suspected integrity, such as Barras caused him to be held a man of resolution, but he was not so. He had no preconceived opinion on any portion of public affairs.—Opinion of Napoleon. Las Cases, ii. 143.

Naturally indolent, haughty, and voluptuous; accessible to corruption; profligate, and extravagant; ill-qualified for the fatigues and the exertion of ordinary

* BARRAS was originally an officer of the regiment of the Isle of France. Deputy to the National Convention. He had no talent for the tribune, and no business habits. . . . He had never served or risen above the rank of Captain, neither had he any knowledge of the art of war. . . . The passion with which he spoke would have for instance, had contrived to introduce themselves into the list of governors, who, during those four years, transmitted the supreme power from one to another; but Rewbell,¹ La Reveillère-Lepaux,² Le Tourneur,³ Carnot,⁴ Barthelemy,⁵ Roger-Ducos,⁶ Sieyès,⁷ were men of integrity, some of them of considerable ability, and the last, M. Sieyès, possessed a very superior mind. And yet the directorial republic had very soon exhibited a scene of distressing confusion: less cruelty but more anarchy—such had been the character of the new government. The Directory gave up guillotining; it only transported. It ceased to force people to take assignats upon pain of death; but it paid nobody. Our soldiers, without arms and without bread, were beaten instead of being victorious. Terror was succeeded by a feeling of intolerable uneasiness. And, as weakness also has its gusts of passion, this republic, moderate in intention, had resorted at last to two measures that were absolutely tyrannical—the progressive forced loan, and the law of the hostages. This latter measure, in particular, though there was nothing sanguinary in it, was one of the most odious vexations invented by the cruel and fertile imagination of parties.
Vol. I.—3

Is it surprising that France, to which the Bourbons could not be presented in 1799, and which, after the ill success of the directoral constitution, began to have no faith in the republic—is it surprising, I say, that France should throw herself into the arms of that young general who had conquered Italy and Egypt, a stranger to all the parties, affecting to disdain them all, endowed with an energetic will, showing equal aptness for military and civil affairs, and affording glimpses of ambition which, instead of alarming the nation, was then hailed by it as a hope? Less glory than he had acquired would have sufficed to enable a man to seize the reins of government; for, some time previously, General Joubert had been sent to Novi, that he might there earn those titles which he still wanted for effecting the revolution, since styled in our annals that of the 18th of Brumaire. The unfortunate Joubert was defeated and fell at Novi; but young Bonaparte, always fortunate and victorious, at least at that time, escaping the dangers of the sea as well as the dangers of battles, had returned from Egypt to France in an almost miraculous manner; and, on his first appearance, the Directory succumbed. All parties hastened to meet him, demanding of him order, victory, and peace.

It was not, however, in a day that the authority of one could supersede that mot government in which so many, alternately oppressed or oppressors, had enjoyed for a moment a share of the supreme power. It was necessary in order to save appearances, and to induce harassed France to submit to absolute power, that she should pass through a glorious, restorative, and semi-republican government. It was requisite, in short, that the Consulate should pave the way to the Empire.

It is this portion of our contemporary history of which I am now about to treat. Fifteen years have elapsed since I recorded the events of our first revolution. Those fifteen years have been passed amid the storms of public life: I have seen an ancient throne crumble to pieces and a new throne arise; I have seen the French revolution pursue its invincible course. Though the scenes which I have witnessed have not excited in me any great surprise, I have not the presumption to believe that the experience of men and of business has taught me nothing; I have the confidence, on the contrary, that I have learned much, and that I am thus, perhaps, more apt to appreciate and describe the great things done by our fathers during those heroic times. But I am certain that experience has not frozen within me the generous sentiments of my youth; I am certain that I love, as I ever did love, the liberty and the glory of France.

I now resume my narrative from the 18th Brumaire, year VIII.—November 9th, 1799.

The law of the 19th of Brumaire, which instituted the Provisional Consulate, being passed, the three new consuls, Bonaparte, Sieyès, business, he was yet possessed of firmness, decision, and audacity, which fitted him to be a leader of importance in perilous emergencies.—Alison, l. 483. H.

¹ REWBELL, an Alsatian by birth, and a lawyer by profession, was destitute of either firmness or eloquence; but owed his elevation to his habits of business, his knowledge of forms, and the pertinacity with which he represented the feelings of the multitude.—Alison, l. 483. H.

² LA REVEILLERE-LEPAUX, a native of Angers, was of the lower class of citizens, small, hump-backed, and of an exterior as disagreeable as can be imagined. He was an absolute Esop. He wrote tolerably. His mind was of no compass; he had neither business habits, nor knowledge of men. . . . For the rest, he was a warm and sincere patriot, an honest man, a worthy and intelligent citizen. He entered the Directory poor, and poor he quitted it.—Opinion of Napoleon. Las Cases, ii. 145. H.

³ LE TOURNEUR DE LA MANCHE. Born in Normandy, he had little talent, little information, little character. . . . For the rest, he was an upright and honest man. He left the Directory poor.—Opinion of Napoleon. Las Cases, ii. 150. H.

⁴ CARNOT exhibited the combination, rare in a corrupted age, of Republican energy with private virtue.—Alison, iii. 36.

A native of Burgundy, he entered the army early, and was a Chevalier of St. Louis at the time of the revolution, which he embraced warmly. He was named to the convention, and member of the Committee of Safety with Robespierre, &c. Very hostile to the nobles. A man of business, always sincere, but with no talent for intrigue, and easy to be deceived. He always showed great moral courage.—Opinion of Napoleon. Las Cases, ii. 149. H.

⁵ BARTHELEMY. A respectable man, of royalist principles.—Alison, l. 489. H.

⁶ DUCOS was a man of limited and easy character.—Gourgaud, Memoirs Nap. H.

⁷ SIEYÈS had been long known to Napoleon. Born at Prejus. He was named to the Constituent Assembly by the electors of the third estate in Paris. He was not a man of execution, he knew little of men, and had no capacity for influencing their actions. His studies were all metaphysical, and he had the fault of all metaphysicians, that he too often despised practical opinions; but was capable of giving useful and luminous advice in the most serious situations.—Gourgaud, Memoirs Napoleon. H.

⁸ JOUBERT. A general under the Directory. Conquered the Italian Tyrol, while Napoleon was overrunning Carinthia, whom he afterwards joined at Klagenfurt, by a masterly retreat, in 1797. Superadded Moreau near Genoa, was defeated by Suwarrow, and fell gallantly in the action, at Novi. H.

and Roger-Ducos, left St. Cloud, and repaired to Paris. Sieyès and Roger-Ducos, members of the late Directory, were already settled in the palace of the Luxembourg. Bonaparte quitted his small house in the Rue de la Victoire, and, with his wife, his adopted children, and his aides-de-camp, took up his residence in the apartments of the Petit-Luxembourg. There, in proximity to his two colleagues, surrounded by the fragments of the late government, and the elements of the new one, he fell to work with that unerring and rapid intelligence, and with that extraordinary activity, which had always marked his operations in the field.

With him were associated two colleagues, Roger-Ducos and Sieyès, both of whom had belonged to the Directory, and had been busily engaged in destroying that government which they despised. Sieyès, in particular, had been placed beside General Bonaparte, because he was the second personage of the republic. Author of the grandest and best conceptions of the French revolution, such as the union of the three orders, the division of France into departments, and the institution of the national guard, Sieyès, destitute of eloquence, had rivalled Mirabeau in the early days of our revolution, when oratory conferred more power than all other qualifications; and now that universal war assigned the first place to military genius, Sieyès, who had never worn a sword, was almost the equal of General Bonaparte. So great is power of mind, even unaccompanied by the talents which render it useful or applicable. But now that it was necessary to apply himself to business, Sieyès, who was indolent, peevish, obstinate in his ideas, irritated or confused by the slightest contradiction, could not long vie in influence with his young colleague, who was capable of working night and day, whom no contradiction ruffled, who was abrupt but not testy, who could win the good-will of men when he pleased, and who, at any rate, when he neglected to do so, had always the alternative of carrying his point by force.

There was, however, a task which was generally assigned to Sieyès—that of preparing the new constitution, which the provisional consuls were directed to digest, and to propose to France without delay. At this period people were still somewhat imbued with the ideas of the eighteenth century; it was less generally but still too much believed, that human institutions might be purely a work of mind, and that the constitution of a nation might spring ready made from the brain of a legislator. Assuredly, if the French revolution must have had a Solon or a Lycurgus, M. Sieyès was worthy of being so; but there is only one real legislator in modern times,—that is experience. This idea was not so common then as it is now-a-days, and it was universally agreed that M. Sieyès should be the author of the new constitution: this was hoped, this was said; it was asserted that he possessed one, which was the result of long meditation; that it was a profound, an admirable production, and that, being now rid of the obstacles which revolutionary passion threw in his way, he could bring it forward; that he would be the legislator, and General Bonaparte the administrator of the new government, and that between them they would render France powerful and happy. Every period of the revolution had had its illusions: the present period is not free from them; but these, it is true, are likely to be the last.

It was, therefore, agreed by common consent that Sieyès should prepare the constitution, and that General Bonaparte should govern by it. It was urgent, in fact, that some one should govern; for the state of the country in all respects was deplorable: disorder, both moral and material, was at its height.

The stanch revolutionists, beaten at St. Cloud, still had partisans in the Society of the Riding House—Manège, as it was called—and in similar societies in different parts of France. They had at their head few of the leading men of the two assemblies: but they numbered among them several officers highly esteemed in our armies: Bernadotte,² a man of moderate abilities, and of a vain and ambitious disposition; Augereau,³ a brave soldier, supremely unreasonable, and luckily possessing but little influence; lastly, Jourdan,⁴ a good citizen and

¹ MIRABEAU. It would be as presumptuous on one individual to write an encyclopedia, as a character of Mirabeau. It should embrace all the talents, and all the vices, every merit and every defect, every glory and every disgrace. Remember, for one moment, what he was—student, voluptuary, soldier, prisoner, author, diplomatist, exile, pauper, courtier, democrat, deputy, orator, statesman, traitor; he had seen more, suffered more, learned more, felt more, done more, than any man of his own or any other age. He lived in two worlds, the one of thought, the other of action, and he mastered them both.—Hon. George Sydney Smythe. H.

² BERNADOTTE. His father was an attorney of small means at Pau in Bearn, born 1764. Enlisted as a private in the royal marines at the age of 15. In 1790 he was still a sergeant; in 1792 he was a colonel in the army of General Custines, and in the following year was made general of brigade. Distinguishing him-self on all occasions, after the peace of Campo Formio, he was selected by Napoleon to present the standards taken at Rivoli to the Directory. He appears always to have distrusted Napoleon, who, however, on one occasion, spoke of him as possessing "a French head with the heart of a Roman," &c.—Court and Camp of Napoleon. H.

³ AUGEREAU. The son of a green grocer in Paris, born 1757. Entered the Neapolitan service, and was still a private, at thirty. In 1793, volunteered into the republic-

can army of the South. In 1794, brigadier-general. In 1796, general of division, carried the bridge of Lodi, and the strong position of Castiglione. Was the first man across the bridge of Arcole. After the fall of Mantua, despatched with sixty stand of colours to be presented to the Directory. In July, 1797, sent to Paris by Napoleon to intrigue with the Directory. Appointed to the command of the army of the Rhine and Moselle, vacant by the death of Hoche.

His bravery, great as it was, was eclipsed and sullied by his shameful avarice, &c.—Court and Camp of Napoleon. H.

⁴ JOURDAN. The son of a surgeon at Limoges. Born in 1762. At sixteen enrolled in the regiment Auxerrois, and served in the American war. In 1791, a commander of a battalion under Dumouriez. In 1792, fought at Jemappes, under Egalité 2d, now Louis Philippe. In 1793 general of division, and gained the battle of Wattignies. Obtained the command of the army of the Moselle, and gained the battle of Fleurus. In 1795, crossed the Rhine, was defeated at Rastatt, recalled and superseded by Beurnonville. In 1797 represented Upper Vienne in the council of five hundred. In November was appointed to the army of the Danube; defeated by the Archduke at Stockach; superseded by Massena. Rechosen member of the five hundred, and in September, proposed his famous resolution, seconded by Augereau, that the country is in danger, &c.—Court and Camp of Napoleon. H.

a good general, whose military miscarriages had soured his temper, and thrown him into an exaggerated opposition. There was reason to fear that the fugitives of the Council of Five Hundred would assemble in some considerable city,—form there a sort of Legislative Body and Directory, and rally around them the men who still retained all the ardour of revolutionary sentiments; some because they were compromised by excesses, or were in possession of national domains; others because they loved the republican system for its own sake, and were afraid lest they should see it overturned by the hand of a new Cromwell. Such an attempt would have occasioned serious embarrassment in a juncture already extremely difficult; and apprehensions were entertained that it might be made in Paris itself.

In regard to the opposite faction also, there was ground for serious fears; for La Vendée was again in a flame. M. de Châtillon¹ on the right bank of the Loire, M. d'Autichamp² on the left bank, Georges Cadoudal³ in Morbihan, M. de Bourmont⁴ in Le Maine, M. de Frotté⁵ on the coast of Normandy, all excited and supported by the English, had renewed the civil war. The law respecting hostages, the weakness of the government, the defeats of our armies—such were the motives which had induced them to take up arms again. M. de Châtillon had for a moment occupied Nantes; he had entered the city but made no stay in it. This circumstance had been sufficient to induce the large communes in the insurgent districts to throw up hasty entrenchments, and to surround themselves with palisades where they had not the protection of walls. Some with a view of providing for their own defence, retained the little money which the insurgent country contributed to the public exchequer, alleging that, since the government did nothing for their protection, it was right that they should take care of themselves.

The Directory, though resolved to shun the excesses of the Convention, had not been able to resist all the violent measures which the war in La Vendée, as soon as it broke out again, led the revolutionary party to propose.

Hurried along by the movement of the popular mind, it had passed the law of the hostages, by virtue of which all relations or supposed accomplices of the Vendéans were to be confined and to be punished with certain penalties by way of repressing acts committed in the localities for which they were responsible as hostages. This unjust and violent law had but inflamed the passions, without disarming a single hand in La Vendée, and had excited inexpressible animosity against the Directory.

The war abroad had been somewhat less disastrous towards the conclusion of the last campaigns. The victories of General Masséna⁶ at Zurich,⁷ and of General Brune at the Texel,⁸ had driven back the enemy to a considerable distance from our frontiers; but our soldiers were in a state of absolute destitution. They were neither paid, nor clothed, nor fed. The army which had defeated the combined English and Russians in Holland,⁹ having the advantage of being maintained by the Batavian republic, was better off than the others; but the army of the Rhine, which had lost the battle of Stockach, and that of Helvetia, which had gained the battle of Zurich, were in the utmost want. The army of the Rhine, stationed on French ground, practised there, without mercy and without benefit, the system of requisitions; that of Helvetia subsisted by means of war contributions imposed upon Basle, Zurich, Berne—contributions badly levied and badly employed, and which, quite insufficient for the subsistence of the soldiers, disgusted the spirit of independence and economy that distinguishes the Swiss. The army of Italy, which, since the disasters of Novi and the Trebbia, had fallen back upon the Apennines into a sterile country ravaged by the war, was a prey to diseases and to the most distressing privations. Those soldiers, who had endured the greatest reverses with unshaken constancy, and had shown heroic fortitude in ill fortune, covered with rags, consumed by fever and famine, solicited charity on the roads in the Apennines, having nothing to eat but the little nutritious fruits growing in the arid soil of those parts. Many of them deserted, or joined the

¹ M. DE CHÂTILLON was an old gentleman of sixty, virtuous, loyal, possessing little wit but some vigour. He had lately married, which contributed to render him faithful to his promises.—Gourgaud, Mémoires Nap. M.

² M. D'AUTICHPAMP had served several campaigns as a private hunter in the republican armies during the reign of terror. He was a man of limited ability, but possessing the air, the manners, and the elegance which became his education and station in society.—Gourgaud, Mémoires Nap. H.

³ GEORGES CADOU DAL. The son of a village miller—when Bretagne took up arms he entered service as a common horseman, and in 1795 was considered the head of the plebeian party. In 1796 and the three ensuing years, was the only general-in-chief who was not noble. In 1800 he made peace with the French government.—Encyclopædia Americana. H.

⁴ M. DE BOURMONT, a Choann leader. He commanded the bands of Maine, submitted together with La Revelaye, and went up to Paris.—Gourgaud, Mémoires Nap. M.

⁵ M. FROTTÉ. A young, active, and artful chief of the Choanns. He commanded the bands of Normandy, maintained the war after the submission of de Bourmont, and gave much trouble to the government. He was surprised in the house of Guidal, the general in command at Alençon, who was in correspondence with and betrayed him. He was tried and shot.—Gourgaud, Mémoires Nap. M.

⁶ MASSÉNA, born at Nice, 1758. Made two voyages in a merchant ship. Entered the Royal Italian regiment at seventeen as a private. In 1789, left the army in disgust as a sergeant. Married a tradesman's daughter at Antibes, and settled at Nice. Re-entered the republican armies, and in 1793 was general of division. In 1796 he was present at every action of note, and so highly did Bonaparte esteem him, that he wrote him word, your own services are worth 6000 men. He was unpopular with the soldiers, owing to his insatiable avarice and rapacity. He superseded Jourdan after the defeat at Stockach, and though himself hard pressed for a time, by the Archduke Charles, finally gained a considerable advantage over the Austro-Russian army at Zurich.—Court and Camp of Napoleon. M.

⁷ ZURICH, see the preceding. M.

⁸ TEXEL, see below. M.

⁹ ANGLO-RUSSIAN. In 1799, a joint expedition was agreed on by England and Russia against Holland. Twelve thousand men were landed under Sir Ralph Abercromby at the Helder, and defeated the Dutch under General Daendels. The Dutch fleet in the Texel surrendered without firing a shot. The British troops were at first successful, and before the arrival of the Russians repulsed Vandamme at Alcmær, but finally after much hard fighting were ultimately compelled to capitulate, quitting Holland with a mutual restoration of all prisoners.—Atlas, ii. 51—53. M.

troops of banditti that infested the high roads in the south, as well as in the west of France. Whole corps were seen quitting their posts without orders from their generals, and occupying others where they hoped to live less wretchedly. The sea, scoured by the English, exhibited in all directions none but an enemy's flag, and never brought them any succour. There were divisions whose pay had been withheld for eighteen months. Some provisions were levied by means of requisitions; but as for muskets, cannon, and ammunition, which are not to be procured by requisitions—the want of these our soldiers had no means of supplying. The horses, already inadequate to the services of the artillery and of the cavalry, were almost all swept off by disease and famine.

Such were the results of a weak, ill-regulated administration, and more especially of extreme financial embarrassment. The armies of the republic had, for several years, lived upon assignats and victory. The assignats no longer existed; and Victory, after suddenly forsaking us, had scarcely begun to show herself again to our legions, and had not yet opened to them the abundant plains of Germany and Italy.

It is necessary here to give an idea of our financial situation—the principal cause of the sufferings of our armies. This situation exceeded all that had ever been seen at former periods. The Constituent Assembly had committed two faults, which had been remedied, to a certain extent, by means of the assignats, but for which, since the discredit of that paper-money, there was left no palliative. These two faults were, firstly, the suppression of the indirect contributions imposed upon liquors, salt, and articles of consumption in general; secondly, the right granted to the municipal administrations of making themselves the assessments of the land-tax and of the other direct contributions.

By the suppression of the indirect contributions the treasury had lost, without compensation, one-third of its revenues. The produce of the state domains being reduced to almost nothing by a vicious administration, that of the registration, by the falling off of private business, and that of the customs by the war, the direct contributions formed almost the only resource of the exchequer; but these contributions, amounting to about 300,000,000 in a budget of 500,000,000, were extraordinarily in arrear. There were outstanding debits for the year V., the year VI., and the year VII. The assessments for the year VI. were not completed; for the year VII., one-third yet remained to be made out; and for the current year, that is to say, the year VIII., they were scarcely begun. Owing to this delay in the preparation of the assessments, the current contributions could not be levied, and the accumulation of those in arrear occasioned new difficulties to the collectors, who frequently had to demand payment for several years at once.

This state of things proceeded from the adoption of a principle apparently just, but in reality mischievous; namely, that of leaving the local administrations to tax themselves, in some measure, by preparing the assessments themselves. The departmental and municipal administrations were then conjoined, as every one knows. Instead of prefects, sub-prefects and mayors, who were instituted at a later period, there were attached to all these administrations commissioners, having a consultative voice, and whose duty it was to originate and urge the acceleration of the administrative operations, but not to execute these themselves. The system of cantonal municipalities, uniting the 44,000 communes of France into 5000 collective communes, had increased the disorder. All local business was suspended; but what was a still greater misfortune, the two grand points of state-business, the recruiting of the army and the collection of taxes, were completely neglected. To make amends for this default of administrative action, the 5000 commissioners attached to the cantonal municipalities were charged with the duty of accelerating the preparation of the assessments; but they had not the only power which could be efficacious, that of acting themselves; and besides, engaged in a thousand different occupations, they paid but little attention to that important work, the preparation of the assessments. The indemnity granted to them for this service, being much more expensive than it has been since the institution of the office of the direct contributions, was a heavy charge on the treasury, and without any corresponding advantage.

Thus the direct contributions, the principal branch of the revenue of the state, were not collected. Besides the permanent deficit arising from the default of receipts, there was another, arising from the amount of the expenditure, which at that time far exceeded the receipts. The ordinary expenditure might have been provided for by means of a revenue of about 500,000,000; but the war had raised it to nearly 700,000,000. Nothing was left to meet the deficiency but the national domains, absorbed for the greater part, and which it was, moreover, difficult to realize advantageously, because the definitive triumph of the revolution was still a matter of great doubt.

This state of things had led to revolting abuses, and to a situation which it is necessary to describe for the instruction of nations and governments.

The assignats, as we have just observed, had long ceased to exist. The mandates, which succeeded them, had disappeared also. Paper money was, therefore, completely abandoned; and, great as the void might be, it was better not to fill it up at all for the present, than to fill it, as had before been done, with a forced paper, which was scarcely taken in payments, though forced, and which uselessly furnished occasion for the exercise of all the rigours of the law, in order to compel its acceptance. In lieu of this suppressed paper-money the following system was introduced.

In the first place, the government ceased to pay the civil functionaries, even in paper, so that in Brumaire, year VIII., they had received nothing for ten months. It was necessary, however, to give something to the annuitants and pensioners of the state. To these were delivered bons d'arrérage, the sole value of which consisted in their being taken as money in payment of the contributions. The pay of the troops was withheld; but what the armies took upon the spot for their subsistence was paid for by means of bons de réquisition, likewise receivable in discharge of the taxes. The companies which had contracted to supply some of the wants of the soldier, performing that service ill, and sometimes not at all, obtained, instead of money, orders upon the first receipts of the treasury; and by virtue of titles of this sort, granted very arbitrarily, they laid their hands upon almost all the cash that found its way into the public exchequer. Lastly, rescriptions on the national domains, receivable in payment for those domains, were another sort of paper-money added to all those we have just enumerated, and contributing to the most frightful stock-jobbing.

These papers, in fact, had not a forced currency like the assignats; but, thrown into circulation, incessantly bought and sold in the market of Paris, rising or falling on the slightest whisper of good or bad news, they were the subject of a speculation ruinous to the state, and of a deplorable demoralization of the public. The men of business, depositaries of all the ready money, could procure them at a very easy rate. They bought them up from the annuitants, the contractors, or the other holders, at the lowest price; then sent them into the treasury in payment of the contributions, passing for 100 francs what had cost them at most eighty, and sometimes sixty or even fifty. The collectors themselves embarked in this kind of speculation, and, while they received money from part of the tax-payers, they paid into the coffers of the state at par the paper which they had bought at the lowest rate. Thus very few persons paid their contributions in cash; there was too much inducement to discharge them in paper. In this manner, the treasury scarcely ever received any specie, and its distress, in consequence, increased every day.

As the irritation against the Vendéans had produced the law of the hostages, the irritation against the jobbers had led, in like manner, to the measure of the progressive forced loan, destined to reach the great capitalists, and to make them contribute to the expenses of the war. This is what had been called in France, during the days of terror, the tax upon the rich; it is what in England was denominated the income-tax—a tax to which Mr. Pitt had at this time recourse, in order to carry on the furious war which he was waging against France. This tax, proportioned not to the extent of immovable property, which constitutes a sure basis, but to the supposed wealth of individuals, could be raised, though with considerable trouble, in England, where order prevailed, and the fury of parties did not make the assessment of fortunes a medium of vengeance. But this was not feasible in France, for amidst the disorders of the times, the jury had been a sort of revolutionary committee, capriciously attributing wealth or poverty at the dictates of its passions, and never esteemed just even when it was just, which is almost equivalent to never being so. The government dared not bring forward this measure, as formerly, under the mere simple form of a tax; they disguised it under the name of a forced loan, repayable, it was said, in national property, and divided, according to the supposed faculties of each, by an assessment-jury.

Thus this measure had become one of the calamities of the moment. That and the law of the hostages formed the two grievances most frequently alleged against the Directory. It was not the cause, as it was asserted, of the poverty of the treasury, a poverty arising from a complication of circumstances; but it kept aloof the rich speculators, whose aid was indispensable to the government, and of whom it was under the absolute necessity of availing itself, if but for a moment, that it might be able to exist without them afterwards.

This financial situation was, as we have said, the principal cause of the destitution and the reverses of our armies. Being well known to foreign powers, it inspired them with confidence that they should conquer us by a little perseverance. The two victories of Zurich and the Texel had, to be sure, removed those powers somewhat farther from the object which they had in view, but not diverted them from the pursuit. Austria, proud of having reconquered Italy, was determined to fight to the last extremity rather than yield again. Her bearing there was that of an absolute power. Occupying Piedmont, Tuscany, the Roman States, she had not recalled either the King of Sardinia to Turin, or the Grand Duke of Tuscany to Florence, or the pontifical government to Rome. The defeat of Korsakoff¹ and Suwaroff² at Zurich gave her less concern than might have been expected. It was in her eyes a check to the Russian, not to the Austrian arms; a fault of Generals Korsakoff and Suwaroff,—a military mishap, not very difficult to be retrieved, and of no great consequence, unless it should disgust the Russians with the war. But she confidently hoped, by means of British influence and subsidies, to bring them back into the field.

As for England, rich from the income-tax, which already produced more than 200,000,000*l.* a year; blockading Malta, which she expected soon to take by famine; intercepting all succours sent to our army in Egypt, which she hoped before long to reduce by privations and force, England was fully resolved to pursue

¹ KORSKOFF, a Russian general. He commanded in Switzerland, while Suwaroff was fighting in Italy. Through extreme arrogance, and absurd contempt of his enemy, he was surprised at Zurich by Massena, and, though he cut his way through the French army with undaunted resolution, lost all his artillery and baggage. Suwaroff joined the army a few days later, and made his wonderful retreat across the Glarus.

² SUWAROFF. Alexander Rimniski, a Russian field-marshal, born 1730, of a noble family. In 1742 he enlisted as a private. In 1762, a colonel, he had gained distinction in the Seven Years' War. In 1774, and many years after, he was engaged in constant warfare with the Turks. Took Ismail in 1790, and in 1792, Warsaw. In 1799 he took the command in Italy against the French, and defeated Moreau; shortly afterward the coalition between Russia and Austria was dissolved, and he was recalled and shortly after died. He had great talents, great information, great vivacity, considerable wit, much facility in various languages; was exceedingly eccentric and original, a man of decided genius—the most daring and dashing general of the old school.

all the objects which her policy flattered itself with the prospect of attaining, before she laid down her arms. She calculated, moreover, upon a sort of social dissolution in France, which would soon change our country into an open country, accessible to all who might think fit to enter it.

Prussia, the only one of the northern powers that had not taken part in the war, maintained a reserve full of coldness towards the French government. Spain, obliged by the treaty of St. Ildefonso to make common cause with us, appeared extremely grieved at this community of interests. No one, indeed, seemed to care about having relations with a government that was ready to fall. The victories of Zurich and the Texel had regained for it an outward show of respect, but not the confidence of the cabinets with which it was at peace or in alliance.

Thus, at home, La Vendée again in insurrection—abroad, the principal powers of Europe in arms,—rendered the dangers of the war doubly pressing. It was necessary, by the adoption of some financial measure, to supply the first wants of the famished armies; it was necessary to re-organize them, to move them forward, to give them able commanders, and to add new victories to those which had been gained at the conclusion of the last campaign. It was necessary, above all, to cure foreign cabinets of the notion of an approaching social dissolution in France, which rendered some so confident in the result of the war, others so shy in their relations with us. And all this could only be accomplished by a strong government, able to curb parties, and to enforce unity of action, without which there cannot be, in the exertions which it makes to save itself, either harmony, energy, or success.

The disease had arrived at that height which is frequently followed by a favourable turn; on one condition indeed, that the patient shall have sufficient strength left to get over the crisis. Fortunately, the strength of France was still great. The revolution, though decried by those whom it had overthrown, or whose illusions it had not realized, was, after all, the cause of justice and of reason, and it still excited the attachment which a great cause always excites. It had, moreover, numerous partisans, bound to its fortunes, in all those who had acquired new situations, bought the possessions of emigrants, or acted a part by which they had compromised themselves. In short, the nation was not so exhausted, morally or physically, as to submit quietly to the invasion of its territory by the Austrians and Russians. On the contrary, it felt indignant at the idea. Its armies swarmed with admirable soldiers, officers, generals, who needed only a good direction. All these forces were ready to unite spontaneously in a single hand, if that hand were capable of directing them. Circumstance, therefore, favoured the man of genius who was about to present himself, for genius itself requires the aid of circumstance.

Had young Bonaparte, for example, come forward in 1789, even with his talents and his glory, to rescue French society, at that time leaning on all sides to dissolution, because its elements had become incompatible, in vain would he have propped it with his mighty arms. His human strength would have availed nothing against the powers of Nature. At this period, on the contrary, when that old society, broken up, as it was requisite that it should be before being recast in a new mould, presented only elements, scattered indeed, but tending of themselves to approximate, it was prepared to accommodate itself to all the efforts of the able hand that knew how to grapple it. General Bonaparte, therefore, had on his side both his own genius and the force of circumstances. He had a whole society to organize, but a society willing to be organized, and, by him, because it had immens. confidence in him, inspired by his unparalleled successes.

The law which decreed the Provisional Consulship, conferred extensive powers on the three consuls. This law invested them with the plenitude of "directorial power;" it specially charged them to "restore order in all the departments of the administration," to "restore domestic tranquillity," and to "obtain for France an honourable and solid peace." It associated with them two legislative commissions, of twenty-five members each, selected from the Council of the Ancients and that of the Five Hundred, to supply the place of the Legislative Body, and to give a legal character to the acts of the Consuls. It authorized these two commissions to decree all necessary measures, on the proposition of the executive authority. It confided to them, moreover, the highly important duty of preparing a new constitution. And yet, as such powers could not be conferred on them for an unlimited time, the same law enacted that, on the 1st of the following Ventose, the two Councils of the Ancients and the Five Hundred should have full right to assemble again, if, in the interim, a new constitution had not been promulgated and accepted. In that event the members of the then Legislative Body would retain their powers, excepting sixty of them, erased from the list of the councils by an extraordinary measure. The eventual re-assembling being fixed for the 1st of Ventose, the dictatorship confided to the provisional consuls was limited to three months. It was, in fact, a real dictatorship with which they had been invested: for these commissions, deliberating with closed doors; divided into different sections, of finance, legislation, constitution; meeting together only to legalize what the government had to propose to them; were the surest and most convenient instruments for acting with promptness. For the rest, there was little reason to fear that these powers would be abused; for, when there is so much good to be done, and so short a space to do it in, men do not waste time in doing evil.

On the very day on which the three Provisional Consuls removed to the Luxembourg, they met to deliberate on the most urgent affairs of the state. It was the 11th of November, 1799—20th of Brumaire. It was necessary to choose a president; the age and position of M. Sieyès seemed to call him to that distinction, but Roger Ducos, though his friend, as if carried away by the feeling of the moment, said to General Bonaparte, "Take the arm-chair, and let us deliberate." Bonaparte immediately complied. The official acts of the Provisional Consuls, however, made no mention of a president. They entered into a first summary examination of the state of the country. Young Bonaparte was ignorant of many things, but he guessed intuitively those which he was not acquainted with. He had carried on war, provided for the maintenance of numerous armies, administered conquered provinces, negotiated with Europe. He could not have served a better apprenticeship in the art of governing. For superior minds, but for those alone, war is an excellent school. In it a man learns to command, to decide, but above all to govern. Thus the new Consul appeared to have on all subjects either an opinion ready formed, or one that formed itself with the rapidity of lightning, particularly after he had listened to special men, the only men to whom he did listen, and solely on the subject of their special pursuit.

He was still deficient in a species of knowledge most serviceable in the exercise of the supreme authority—the knowledge not of men generally, but of individuals. As for men in general, his knowledge of them was profound; but, having always lived with armies, he was a stranger to the individuals who had figured in the Revolution. To supply this deficiency he had recourse to the testimony of his colleagues. But, gifted with rapid penetration and a prodigious memory, he very soon made himself as well acquainted with the personnel of the government, as with that of his army.

After this first conference, the parts were taken and accepted. The young general, without waiting for the opinion of his colleagues, gave his own on the instant, summed up and settled every affair with the decision of an acting man. It was evident that the impulse would thenceforth proceed from him alone. They separated, after agreeing upon the things most urgent to be done; and Sieyès, with a resignation which does honour to his reason and patriotism, said in the evening to Messrs. de Talleyrand and Rœderer, "We have a master who knows how to do every thing, who can do every thing, and who will do every thing." He thence wisely concluded that it was best to let him act, for, at that moment, personal rivalries would have ruined France. It was agreed anew, by a sort of voluntary division of the official duties, that, during this dictatorship, which it was necessary to render brief and serviceable, General Bonaparte should govern, and that M. Sieyès should undertake the preparation of the constitution. This, as we have already said, was a task which public opinion adjudged to the latter, and in the accomplishment of which his colleague was not disposed to cross him much—a single point excepted—the organization of the executive power.

The most urgent matter of all was the composition of the ministry. In a monarchy, it is the first men in a country who are called to it. In a republic, those first men having become themselves the heads of the republic, there are left for the ministry only second-rate men, mere clerks, without any responsibility, because the real responsibility has ascended higher. When such persons as M. Sieyès and General Bonaparte were Consuls, highly distinguished men, like Messrs. Fouché,¹ Cambacérès,² Reinhard,³ de Talleyrand,⁴ could not be real ministers. The choice of these had no other importance than a certain political significance and the due despatch of business. It is in this respect alone that their selection can be considered as of any moment.

The lawyer Cambacérès, a scholar and a philosopher, whom we shall notice more particularly by and by, was retained, without opposition, as minister of justice. After a brisk discussion among the Consuls, M. Fouché was continued in the ministry of the police. M. Sieyès would have rejected him, because, he said, he was not to be depended on, and a creature of Barras, the Director. General Bonaparte supported him, and caused him to be confirmed in his post. He considered himself bound to this course by the services which Fouché had done him during the events of the 18th of Brumaire. Besides, he united to a very shrewd mind a profound knowledge of ¹ FOUCHÉ, born at Nantes, in 1753, was at first intended for the sea, but afterward became professor of mathematics in Arras, &c. Here he formed an intimate acquaintance with Robespierre. He was sent to the National Convention from the department of the lower Loire—joined the party of the mountain, voted for the death of the king with extreme ferocity. In 1793 distinguished himself by his cruelty and hatred of the priests, as conventional deputy in the department of the Aube, and the Nièvre; and yet farther by his infamous atrocities in conjunction with Collot d'Herbois at Lyons. He fell into disgrace with Robespierre, and probably escaped death only by his fall. In 1795, he was expelled the Convention as a thief and terrorist, and for several years scarcely earned a bare and wretched livelihood as spy to the Directory. In 1798, he was sent on an embassy to Milan, and afterward to Holland. In 1799 installed by Sieyès head of the police. A baser, bloodier, more cowardly and brutal miscreant never disgraced humanity.—Court and Camp of Napoleon. M.

² CAMBACÉRÈS, born at Montpellier in 1753, of a poor but noble family. Educated a lawyer. In 1791 made president of the criminal tribunal in the department of Herault. In 1792 member of the National Convention, voted after much tergiversation for the death of the king. In 1790 he was appointed minister of justice. He was a wily schemer, a cringer to all parties when in power, a sensualist and a glutton.—Court and Camp of Napoleon. M.

³ REINHART was a native of Wirtemberg, an honest man of ordinary capacity.—Gourgaud, Mémoires. M.

⁴ TALLEYRAND, born in Paris, in 1754, eldest son of a younger branch of the Counts de Périgord. He was educated at St. Sulpice with Sieyès, and forced into the church, wherein he became bishop of Autun at thirty-four. Before this time, however, he had been designated by Mirabeau as "one of the most subtle and powerful intellects of the age." In 1789 he was returned to the meeting of the States General by the clergy of his diocese. He carried, in the National Assembly, the confiscation and sale of the church property. In 1791 was chosen a member of the Departmental Convention. In 1793 sent with Chevelli, minister to England. In 1794 escaped to America, where he remained until the reign of terror was at an end. In 1795 he was recalled. In 1797 appointed minister of foreign affairs under the Directory. In 1799 resigned and quarrelled with the Directory, and joined Napoleon, on his return from Egypt.

The truth is, that Prince Talleyrand's career has been remarkably free from violence, and that he swayed the destinies of France, not by terror, but by the sheer strength and prompitude of his talents.—Court and Camp of Napoleon. M.

The sagest politician, the shrewdest statesman, the deepest judge of human nature, the wittiest if not the wisest man of his own, or perhaps any other day. M.

the men and things of the revolution. Public opinion, at that time, marked him out for the minister of police; as M. de Talleyrand, from his familiarity with courts, his experience in business of importance, his acute understanding, and his conciliatory spirit, was marked out for the minister of foreign affairs. M. Fouché was retained; but such was the animosity of the revolutionists against M. de Talleyrand, either on account of his constant connection with the moderate party, or in consequence of the part which he had played in recent events, that it was found expedient to defer for a few weeks his return to the ministry for foreign affairs. M. de Reinhart was kept for a fortnight longer in that post. General Berthier,¹ the faithful companion of the conqueror of Italy and Egypt, the inseparable chief of his staff, who could so thoroughly comprehend and issue his orders—General Berthier received the portfolio of war, in the place of M. Dubois-Crancé,² who was considered as much too warm in his opinions. M. Quinette³ was superseded in the ministry of the interior by an illustrious savant, M. de La Place.⁴ This was a signal and just homage paid to science, but it was not a service rendered to the administration. His superior genius was not fitted for the details of business. M. Forfait, an engineer and naval constructor of ability, succeeded M. Bourdon—de l'Oise—in the ministry of the marine.

At this moment, the most important choice to be made, perhaps, was that of minister of finance. In the departments already specified, the Consuls could supply the place of ministers, especially in the two most important departments—war and foreign affairs. General Bonaparte, in fact, could perfectly well perform all the duties of Messrs. Berthier and de Reinhart. But that was not the case with finance. This is a subject upon which technical knowledge is indispensable; and there was not in the ministry, that went out with the Directory, any man who could labour effectively at a reorganization of the finances, which had become necessary and urgent. There was a person who had formerly been chief clerk, a man not of brilliant but of solid understanding, and possessing great experience, who had rendered, both during the old system and in the early period of the revolution, those secret but valuable administrative services, with which governments cannot dispense, and which they ought to appreciate highly. The first clerk to whom I allude here was M. Gaudin, since Duke of Gacé. M. Sieyès, well qualified to judge of men, though not to control them, had discovered M. Gaudin, and had been desirous to commit to his hands the portfolio of finance toward the end of the Directory. M. Gaudin, a good financier, but a timid citizen, had declined the offer made to him under an expiring government, which wanted the first requisites of credit, strength and the appearance of stability. But when power seemed to fall without opposition into able and firm hands, he could no longer feel the same repugnance. General Bonaparte, having a decided partiality for practical men, joined without hesitation in the opinion of his colleague, Sieyès, and offered to M. Gaudin the administration of finance. M. Gaudin accepted this post, in which he never ceased, for fifteen years, to render eminent services.

All the departments of the ministry were thus filled. Another appointment was added to the preceding—that of M. Maret, since Duke of Bassano, who became secretary to the Consuls, with the title of secretary of state. Charged to prepare for the Consuls the elements of their labour, frequently to draw up their resolutions, and to communicate them to the heads of different departments, to keep the secrets of the state, he had a kind of ministry, destined sometimes to supply, to complete, or to control the deficiencies of the others. A cultivated mind, a certain acquaintance with Europe, with which he had already negotiated—particularly at Lisle, with Lord Malmesbury—a tenacious memory, a fidelity not to be shaken, caused him to become one of the most serviceable, and most constantly employed fellow-labourers about General Bonaparte. In those who served him, the general preferred exactness and intelligence to brilliancy. It is a partiality common to superior genius, which desires to be comprehended and obeyed, but wants no substitute. Such was the secret of the high favour also enjoyed by M. Berthier for twenty years. M. Maret, though far from equalling him, had, in civil affairs, some of the merits displayed by the illustrious chief of the staff in his military career.

General Lefebvre⁵ was retained in the command of the 17th military division. It will be recollected that, at first, in the morning of the 18th of Brumaire, he had shown some hesitation; and that he had afterwards blindly thrown himself into the arms of the new dictator. He

¹ BERTHIER, born at Versailles in 1753, the son of an eminent surgeon. He served in the American war on Rochambeau's staff. Held a command in the National Guards at Versailles. After their defection, served in the republican armies, was Kellerman's quarter-master in the army of Italy, and, when Bonaparte took that command, attached himself to his fortunes, and never quitted him.—Court and Camp of Napoleon.

² He was totally destitute of the vigour and decision necessary to form a great commander, but was the essence of order itself, indefatigable in exertion, unwearied in application and methodical in habit.—ibidem, iv. 163.

³ DUBOIS-CRANCÉ was a party man, slightly esteemed, and with no habit of business or order. He was incapable of performing the duties of his office. His office was filled with partisans, who, instead of attending to their duties, wasted their time in deliberation. It was an absolute chaos.—Gourgaud, Mémoires.

⁴ QUINETTE had been one of the republican commissioners appointed to arrest Dumouriez.—Thiers' Revolution.
VOL L—4

⁵ LA PLACE. A geometrician of the highest order, who nevertheless showed himself to be not even of moderate abilities as a minister. From his very first appointment, the Consuls perceived that they had committed an error. La Place grasped no question in its true point of view. He was always aiming at subtleties, had none save problematical ideas, and carried the smallest possible degree of mind into the administration of affairs.—Gourgaud, Mémoires.

⁶ LEFEBVRE. A native of Ruffec, born of an humble family in 1755. The revolution found him a veteran sergeant. In 1793, he was raised from the rank of captain to that of adjutant-general. In December of the same year he was general of brigade, and the following month, of division. He fought under Pichegru, Moreau, Huche and Jourdan, in the Netherlands and Germany. He served Napoleon well in the revolution of the 18th of Brumaire.—Camp and Court of Napoleon.

was rewarded for it by the 17th military division and the command of Paris. Thenceforward his fidelity might be depended upon.

Members of the two councils, who had distinguished themselves by their co-operation in the 18th of Brumaire, were sent into the provinces to explain and justify that event, and, if necessary, to supersede such of the agents of authority as might prove either refractory or inadequate to their functions. The result of the 18th of Brumaire was everywhere hailed with joy. The revolutionary party had, nevertheless, in the men compromised by their excesses, adherents who might have become dangerous, especially towards the provinces of the south. Where they did show themselves, the gilded youth, as they were called, were quite ready to come to blows with them. The defeat or the victory of either, might have produced serious inconveniences.

Some changes were made in the distribution of the great military commands. General Moreau,¹ deeply irritated against the Directory, which had so ill rewarded his patriotic devotedness during the campaign of 1799, had consented to be the lieutenant of General Bonaparte, to assist him in consummating the revolution of the 18th of Brumaire. At the head of 300 men, he had condescended to act the part of keeper of the Luxembourg, the palace in which the directors found themselves prisoners, while their deposition was determined on at St. Cloud. General Bonaparte, who, by skillfully feeding the pride and resentments of Moreau, had induced him to accept that singular part, owed him some compensation. He united the two armies of the Rhine and of Helvetia into one, and gave him the command of it. This was the most numerous, the finest army of the Republic, and it could not have been put into better hands. General Moreau had gained but little glory during the last campaign. His services, though substantial, especially when, with a handful of men, he stopped the triumphant career of Suwaroff, were nevertheless no victories, and were not appreciated at their proper value. At this period the battle of Zurich had eclipsed every thing. Besides, the political conduct of Moreau on the 18th of Fructidor, when he denounced Pichegru,² either too soon or too late, had injured him in public opinion, and caused him to be considered as a weak character, wholly beneath himself when he was not upon the field of battle. General Bonaparte, therefore, raised him considerably, by conferring on him so extensive a command; and he came to another very wise determination. The legions of the Rhine and of Helvetia comprehended the most ardent republicans of the army, and many who were envious of the glory acquired in Italy and in Egypt. Masséna commanded them, and he had but little affection for General Bonaparte, though subjugated by his genius. In regard to him, he passed alternately from admiration to ill-humour. There was reason to fear, on his part, some unpleasant demonstration on account of the 18th of Brumaire. The choice of Moreau cut short all possible manifestations, by removing an ill-disposed general from a discontented army. This choice was likewise a good one in a military point of view; for this army of the Rhine and of Helvetia was destined, in case the war were renewed, to operate in Germany, and no one had so thoroughly studied this part of the theatre of war as Moreau.

Masséna was sent to the army of Italy, to places, and among soldiers, with whom he was perfectly acquainted. It was honourable to him to be selected as the repairer of faults committed in 1799, and the continuator of the exploits of General Bonaparte in 1796. Separated from the army among which he had just won a victory and made himself supporters, he was to be transferred to a new army, to which the Directory was odious, and in which he would find none but approvers of the 18th of Brumaire. This choice, like the preceding, was highly judicious in a military point of view. It was the Apennines that the French would have to dispute with the Austrians; and, for a war of this kind, on such a theatre of operations, Masséna had not his equal.

After they had decided upon these indispensable appointments, the Consuls had to direct their attention to an affair not less urgent, namely, that of the finances. Before they could obtain money from the capitalists, it was requisite that they should give them the satisfaction of suppressing the progressive forced loan, which, like the law of hostages, had incurred universal reprobation. The forced loan, as well as the law of hostages, was far from having produced all the evils that were attributed to them. But these two measures, truly paltry in regard to utility, were vicious in a moral point of view, inasmuch as they revived the most odious recollections of the reign of terror. All, therefore, agreed in condemning them. The revolution-

¹ MOREAU, born at Morlaix in Brittany, in 1763. He was a law student at Rennes, in the commencement of the revolution. In 1793, he was made brigadier-general. In 1794, general of division, and conquered the Netherlands and Holland, together with Pichegru. In 1796, commander-in-chief of the army of the Rhine and Moselle, he defeated Wurmser, but after an indecisive engagement with the Archduke Charles was compelled to retreat through the Black Forest. Discovered, in 1797, the treason of Pichegru, but delayed so long before denouncing him, that he was looked upon with suspicion by the Directory. In 1799, appointed to the army of Italy, and while in Paris awaiting instructions, he was invited to aid in subverting the government, which, like Bernadotte, he refused to do.—Court and Camp of Napoleon.

He was a great captain, a sincere and honest republican, a simple, unaffected and pure-minded man.

² PICHEGRU, born in 1761, at Arbois, of poor but respectable parents, was teacher of mathematics at Brienne to Napoleon Bonaparte. At the age of eighteen, he enlisted as a private of artillery; served three years as a sergeant in the American war. In 1789, was appointed adjutant. In 1792, owing to the partiality of St. Just, he was appointed general-in-chief. He displayed rare talents; beat the Austrians at all points, was appointed commandant of Paris in 1795, and overturned the projects of the terrorists. While in command of the army of the Rhine, he entered into correspondence with the Bourbons, was discovered by the Directory, who dared not punish him. Retired to Bellevue, and remained in retirement, until he was returned to the council of five hundred from the Upper Saône. He was discovered in farther plots with Moreau in behalf of the royal family, and was transported to Cayenne, whence, after eight months' exile, he escaped to England, via Patagonia.—Court and Camp of Napoleon.

ists themselves, who, in their patriotic ardour, had demanded these measures of the Directory, by a reaction very common to parties, had suddenly declared themselves hostile to them as soon as they perceived their failure and unpopularity.

No sooner was Gaudin installed minister, than, by order of the Consuls, he submitted to the legislative commissions a resolution, the object of which was the suppression of the progressive forced loan. This suppression took place amidst universal applause. In lieu of the forced loan there was substituted a war-supply, consisting of an addition of 25 per cent. to the principal of the land-tax, the tax on movable property, and the personal tax. This supply was payable like the other taxes, in money or state paper of any kind; but, owing to the urgency of the case, it was required that half the amount should be paid in cash.

The war-supply, which had thus superseded the progressive forced loan, could not furnish immediate relief, for it was only to be levied upon the assessments of the direct contributions, and at the same time with those contributions, of which it was in reality but an augmentation, in the proportion of one-fourth. It was requisite for the current service, and more particularly for the troops, that the treasury should be immediately replenished. M. Gaudin, on the strength of this new measure, destined more especially to please the great capitalists, appealed to the principal bankers of the capital, and applied to them for assistance, the urgency of which was felt by all. General Bonaparte entered into direct communication with them, and the sum of 12,000,000*fr.* in cash was immediately lent to the government. It was to be repaid out of the first receipts of the war contribution.

This accommodation was a great boon, and reflected honour on the public spirit of the bankers of the capital. But it was a supply for a few days only. More durable supplies were needed.

We have seen, at the beginning of this book, how the suppression of the indirect contributions, decreed at the very outset of the revolution, had reduced the treasury to the mere produce of the direct contributions; how this revenue had itself been almost annulled by the delay in the preparation of the assessments; and lastly, how the assignats, the ordinary medium for supplying all deficits, having totally disappeared, recourse was had to paper of various kinds; which, not having the forced currency of coin, was no longer a clog, as before, on private business, but left the government without resources, and gave rise to the most hideous stock-jobbing. It was necessary to put an end to this state of things, and to reorganize the collection, if the government wished to open again the sources of the public revenue, and, with the sources of the public revenue, those of public credit.

In every country where there exist taxes on property and person, which we term in France direct contributions, it is requisite to have a return of that property, with an estimate of its produce, and a list of the names of persons, with an estimate of their pecuniary means. It is requisite that these returns be modified every year, according to the transfer of property from hand to hand, according to the birth, death, or removal of persons. It is then requisite to apportion every year among the properties and the persons the amount of taxes that has been decreed. Lastly, there must be a collection, at once exact and prudent: exact to ensure the receipts; prudent not to harass the payers. Nothing of this kind existed in the year VIII.—1799.

The register of real property—cadastre—a work which has occupied the last¹ forty years, was not yet begun. There were ancient terriers in some communes, and a general return of properties was undertaken in the time of the Constituent Assembly. These data, though by no means accurate, were turned to account. But the operations which consist in revising the lists of properties and persons, according to their incessant changes, and in apportioning annually among them the amount of taxes decreed—these operations, which properly constitute what is called the preparation of the assessments, were left to the municipal administrations, to whose disorganization and carelessness we have already adverted.

The collection was in not less disorder. It was given to the lowest bidder; that is, to those who undertook the duty at the cheapest rate. These collectors paid over the funds levied by them to receivers, who acted as intermediate agents between them and the receiver-general. Both the one and the other were in arrear. The disorder prevailing in every department did not permit a strict eye to be kept upon them. Besides, the non-preparation of the assessments always furnished them with a plausible pretext for deferring the payments, and stock-jobbing with the means of making those payments in depreciated paper. In short, they received little, and paid less.

On the recommendation of M. Gaudin, the Consuls were not afraid to revert to certain practices of the old government, which experience had proved to be sound and useful. Upon the improved model of the ancient administration of the vingtièmes, there was instituted the agency of direct contributions, hitherto constantly rejected, from the mischievous idea of leaving the local administrations to tax themselves. A director and an inspector in each department, and 840 comptrollers, distributed in greater or less numbers in the arrondissements, were themselves to perform the duty of preparing the assessments; that is to say, of drawing up the list of properties and persons, of ascertaining the changes which had taken place during the year, and of charging them with their fair proportion of the tax. Thus, instead of the 5000 commissioners of cantons, who could do no more than urge the communes to the preparation of the assessments, there were to be 99 directors, 99 inspectors, and 840 comptrollers, performing the duty themselves, at an expense to the state of three millions instead of five. It was hoped that in six weeks this administration would be completely organized, and that in two or three months it would have finished the third part yet remaining to be made of the assessments of the year VII.—the last year; all those of the year VIII.—the current year; lastly all those of the year IX.—the next year.

¹ The reader will perceive that this portion of the work was written some years ago.—Translator.

Courage was required to overcome some prejudices, but General Bonaparte was not the man to let prejudices stop him. The legislative commissions, debating with closed doors, adopted the proposed plan after some observations. Guarantees were granted to such persons liable to the contribution as had claims to make—guarantees which have since been rendered more secure by means of the institution of councils of prefecture. The basis of all regular contribution was thus re-established.

This done, it was requisite to organize the collection and the payment of the funds into the treasury.

At the present day, in consequence of the perfect order which the Empire and the subsequent governments have successively introduced into our finances, the levy of the funds of the treasury is executed with a facility and regularity that leave nothing to be desired. Collectors receive, month by month, the direct contributions, that is to say the taxes imposed upon land, buildings, and persons, which they pay over to the particular receiver stationed in the principal place of every arrondissement, and the latter to the receiver-general resident in the chief town of the department. The receivers of the indirect contributions, consisting of customs levied on the frontiers upon foreign merchandise; duties of registration chargeable on transfers of property and on judicial acts; lastly, duties imposed upon articles of consumption of various kinds, such as liquors, tobacco, salt, &c.: the receivers of these contributions pay over the proceeds as they receive them to the particular receiver, and the latter again to the receiver-general, the real banker of the state, whose duty it is to amass the funds, and to dispose of them agreeably to the orders transmitted to him by the administration of the treasury.

The equal distribution of public burdens and the general prosperity have rendered the payment of taxes so easy at the present day; moreover, the periodical returns, which contain a summary of all the operations connected with the receipts and expenditure, have become so clear; that the taxes are paid on the day specified—frequently before—and that the precise date of their receipt and appropriation is also known. Thus government has found means to establish a system grounded on the truth itself of facts, according as they take place. It is, therefore, the nature of direct contributions levied upon property and persons—which are thus a species of rent—that they are capable of being fixed before-hand, both as to the amount and as to the term of payment. They are demanded, therefore, a twelfth at a time, and monthly. The receivers are debited with them, that is to say, constituted debtors for their amount, every month. But it is presumed that they have not received them till two or three months after each twelfth or instalment is due, in order to leave them the means of exercising forbearance towards the payers; and, at the same time, to create in themselves a motive for collecting in the tax, for, if they receive it before the time at which they have to pay it in, they derive a profit, by interest, proportionate to the despatch of the collection. It is, on the contrary, the nature of indirect contributions—which are levied only upon the importation of foreign goods into France, upon transfers of property, or upon the consumption of articles of different sorts—that they are received but irregularly, and according to the extent of the transactions in the articles upon which they are laid. The receivers are therefore debited, that is to say, constituted debtors, for them, at the very moment when they come into their hands, and not by twelfths and monthly, as is the practice with direct contributions. Every ten days the receiver-general is constituted debtor for what has come in during the past ten.

As soon as he is debited, no matter for what kind of contribution, the receiver-general pays interest upon the sums with which he is debited, till the day that he pays them away for account of the public services. On the other hand, from the day that he pays any sum whatever on account of the state, before he is in debt to it, the state, in its turn, gives him credit for the interest. A balance is afterwards struck between the interest owing by the receiver-general upon the sums that have remained in his hands beyond the time prescribed, and the interest due by the treasury upon the sums that have been advanced to it; so that not a single day's interest is lost either by the one or the other; and the receiver-general becomes a real banker, having a running account with the treasury, obliged to hold constantly at the disposal of the government the funds which the wants of the service may require, no matter to what extent.

Such is the system which experience on the one hand, and the improved circumstances of the tax-payers on the other, have gradually introduced in the collection of the funds of the treasury.

But at the period, the history of which we are recording, the taxes came in irregularly, and the system of accounts was confused. The collector, who was in arrear, might allege the delay in the preparation of the assessments, or the distress of those from whom they were to be levied. He might, moreover, conceal the amount of his receipts, owing to the want of clearness in the returns of the operations. The government knew not, as at present, what was passing every day in the several thousand coffers, great and small, composing the general exchequer of the state.

M. Gaudin proposed, and prevailed on General Bonaparte to adopt, a system borrowed in a great measure from the old government, an ingenious system, which has gradually led us to the organization at present established. This system was that of bills of the receivers-general. These receivers, real bankers of the treasury, as we have called them, were to give bills, falling due from month to month, for the total amount of the direct contributions, that is to say, for 300,000,000*fr.* of the 500,000,000*fr.* then composing the budget of the state. These bills, when due, were made payable at the office of the receiver-general. To compensate for the delay afforded to the contributor in paying his tax, it was assumed that each twelfth was discharged about four months after the period when it was due. Thus the bills for the twelfth, payable on the 31st of January, were to be drawn so as to fall due on the 31st of May; by which means the receiver-general, having before him a term of four months, was at once enabled to grant indulgence to the payer of the tax, and stimulated to obtain payment earlier; for, if he could collect it before the expiration of two months instead of four, he gained two months' interest.

This combination, besides possessing the advantage of sparing the payer of the tax and interesting the collector in collecting it, had the merit of preventing the receivers-general from delaying payment. For the treasury had bills of exchange upon them at a fixed date, which they were obliged to pay upon pain of their being protested. Such a combination, it is true, was not possible till after the preparation of the assessments, and the ensurance of collections; the receivers-general being unable to pay punctually unless they were supplied punctually. But, this being accomplished by the means which we have stated, it was easy to establish the system of bills; and independently of the advantages enumerated, it was attended with this, that, on the first day of the year, it placed at the disposal of the treasury the 300,000,000*fr.* of direct contributions, in bills of exchange, which could be surely and easily discounted.

To give credit to this paper, destined to answer the purpose which the royal bons fulfil at this day in France, and the exchequer bills in England, the caisse d'amortissement—sinking fund—was devised. This institution, which we shall see, ere long, intrusted with the management of the entire public debt, had at first no other object than to support the bills of the receiver-general. The manner in which this was managed was as follows. The collectors of the public money, as a guarantee for their operations, gave at that time a security in immovable property only. This kind of security, exposing the state to the difficulties of a forced ejectment, when it was obliged to proceed against the grantor, did not sufficiently answer the object of its institution. It was therefore determined to require of the receivers a security in money. They were then making such large profits, by jobbing with the produce of the tax itself, as to submit cheerfully to this condition rather than resign their posts.

These securities, paid into the caisse d'amortissement, were destined to serve as a guarantee to the bills. Every bill, when due, was to be paid at the office of the receiver-general, or, in default, at that of the caisse d'amortissement, which was to discharge it on presentation, if attested, out of the security of the grantor.

The bill, in consequence, immediately equalled in character the best commercial paper. Nor was this the only advantage of this combination. Probably a small portion of the securities might suffice to uphold the credit of the bills, for few of the receivers-general would be tempted to suffer their paper to be protested: the surplus would then be left at the disposal of the treasury, which might settle for it with the caisse, by ceding to it immovable property or rentes.

The government had, therefore, by means of this institution, the advantage of giving assured currency to the bills, and of procuring for itself a certain sum in cash, that might be made forthwith available—a resource which, just then, came most seasonably.

Such was the system of collection and of payment, which in a short time set the treasury at its ease. It consisted, as we have seen, in making up the assessment of contributions, and in putting them in a train to be collected with punctuality and despatch; secondly in drawing bills on the principal receivers for the total amount of the tax—bills readily discounted, owing to the means devised to enable the receivers-general to discharge their obligations themselves, which otherwise the caisse d'amortissement could discharge for them.

We have adverted to the direct contributions only. As for the indirect contributions, which did not come in regularly, or by twelfths, the receivers-general were, after the receipt of them, but not till then, to transmit to the treasury bills at sight on their chest; so that these were not available till after the drawer had received the amount. This part of the service, which left too great an enjoyment of funds to the receivers-general, was subsequently improved.

At the moment of the introduction of every new system, there are inconveniences of transition, arising from the difficulty of adjusting the present state of things with that which one purposes to create in its stead. Thus the bons d'arrérages delivered to the annuitants, the bons de réquisition delivered to the farmers, whose commodities had been taken on the spot, lastly, the délégations on funds to be paid into the chests, delivered with a culpable license to certain contractors, were likely to derange all the calculations. Different methods were adopted to remedy the inconveniences which resulted from the presence of all this paper in circulation. The bons d'arrérages, given to the annuitants, had exclusively the favour of being still received in payment of taxes; but the amount of them for the current year was known, and by so much the sum of the obligations which the receivers-general were to subscribe was diminished.

As for the bons de réquisition and the délégations, papers of suspicious origin, and the amount of which was unknown, they were subjected to a particular liquidation. They were discharged at a later period, partly with national property, partly with paper of different kinds and with due regard to equity.

By paying the annuitants in money, as it was proposed soon to do, whenever the due receipt of the contributions should be secured—by providing for the armies, and relieving them from the necessity of recurring to the system of requisitions—and by obstinately refusing to the contractors the irregular delegations, which had before been granted to them on the receipts of the treasury, the government could not fail to dry up the source of the paper circulation, and to re-establish everywhere the collection of taxes in cash.

With these means, devised for insuring the revenues of the state, were combined measures, some of them quite legitimate at any time, others still having the character of expedients and the excuse of necessity. The purchasers of national domains, doing as every body then did, that is to say, disregarding the laws, withheld the price of the immovable property which they had bought. They were required to pay it within four months, upon pain of forfeiture. This obligation could not but bring in a great part of the papers in circulation, which was specially receivable in payment for national domains. Certain classes of purchasers were to pay a portion of the price in cash. For this portion they were obliged to sign negotiable engagements. These papers were safe and easy to be disposed of; for those who had signed them were threatened with the loss of their purchases, if they suffered their engagements to be protested.

National domains to the value of 300,000,000*fr.* or 400,000,000*fr.*, still remained unsold. This value, entirely hypothetical, founded on the estimates of 1790, might, if better times were waited for, be worth double, treble, and even more. The best course would have been not to dispose of them. Urgent necessity, however, caused recourse to be had to a new alienation. It was decided that rescriptions, representative of the price of the domains proposed to be sold, should be negotiated to speculators, to the amount of 150,000,000*fr.* Luckily, a very small part only of this sum was issued.

Lastly, a scheme was adopted for representing by paper of the same kind the capital of certain ground-rents belonging to the state, which anterior laws had permitted the debtors to redeem. This produced well-nigh 40,000,000*fr.* The parties who owed these rents had ceased to pay them, without having, however, effected their redemption. Paper, destined to represent this capital of 40,000,000*fr.*, and negotiable, like the rescriptions on the national domains, through the medium of stock-brokers, was issued.

These emissions of artificial securities were the last concessions made to pressing wants. Disposed of to speculators, they were destined to procure some resources till the re-establishment of the finances, which there was reason to expect from the punctual preparation of the assessments, and the system of the bills of the receivers-general. For the rest, these papers, as we shall see by and by, were issued with great reserve, and had not the usual disadvantageous effect, namely, the depreciation and the alienation at a low price of the resources of the state.

The solidity of these various schemes, undoubtedly good in themselves, depended entirely on the solidity of the government itself. Founded on the supposed return of order, they would yield the results which were hoped from them, if order were actually restored; if the executive power displayed vigour and perseverance in the execution of its plans; if it organized well and speedily the new administration of the direct contributions; if it took constant care to require that the assessments should be made out, and put in train to be collected within the time prescribed; if it provided that the bills of the receivers-general should be subscribed and paid when due; if it saw that the securities should be promptly furnished and deposited in the caisse d'amortissement in sufficient amount to uphold the credit of the bills; if, finally, it abandoned for ever those ruinous expedients, such as bons d'arrérages, bons de réquisition, and delegations, which it had promised itself to renounce. If all this were effected, government was certain to obtain the beneficial results which were expected from the new financial system. There was reason to hope for this too from the intelligence and firmness of General Bonaparte. All these plans he had himself discussed, approved, nay, frequently modified and improved. He appreciated their importance and their merit, and he was firmly resolved to see that they were strictly executed. No sooner were they decided upon than they were sent to the legislative commissions, which converted them into laws, without the loss of a moment. Twenty days sufficed for conceiving, for digesting, for clothing them with a legal character, and for carrying them partly into effect. General Bonaparte was at work several times a week with the minister of finance, and he thus took the best method of putting an end to those pernicious delegations, which were frequently granted on the solicitation or through the corrupting influence of the contractors. Every week he made the ministers bring him a statement of their necessary expenses, compared it with the statement of the probable receipts furnished by the treasury, and divided among them the real resources, in proportion to the wants of each. He disposed, therefore, of that only which was certain to be collected; and, in consequence of this firmness, the principal abuse, that of the delegations, was destined very soon to disappear.

In the mean time, till the assessments should be completed, and put in train for collection, and till the bills of the receivers-general should be transmitted to the treasury and discounted, the government had for its present wants, besides the 12,000,000*fr.* lent by some of the bankers, the sums lodged by the receivers-general in the caisse d'amortissement; whatever amount could be raised, through stock-brokers, upon the newly-created securities; and, lastly, the current income or receipts, with which, imperfect as it was, a shift had hitherto been made. The confidence inspired by the Provisional Consuls had a good effect upon the brokers; means were found to negotiate the new securities now, though not a creature would have taken them a few days before.

It was by these united means that the government was enabled to relieve the naked and famished armies, and to procure for them a first supply, of which they were in such urgent want. So great was the disorder that, even at the office of the minister of war, there were no returns of the troops, their number, or their quarters. The office of the artillery was the only one which possessed returns of this kind for the troops of that arm. But, as the army was neither fed nor clothed, as the battalions of conscripts, raised in the departments and equipped with the bons de fourniture, had been most frequently organized without the intervention of the central authority, the latter knew scarcely any thing concerning them. General Bonaparte was obliged to send officers of the staff to the armies themselves to procure such documents as he wanted. He transmitted, at the same time, to the different corps, some supplies, but these very inadequate to the extent of their necessities. Addressing them, by proclamation, in that language which he could render so impressive to soldiers, he conjured them to have patience a few days longer, and to display, under hardships, the same courage which they had often displayed in battle.

"Soldiers," said he, "your wants are great; all possible measures are taken to supply them. The first quality of a soldier is constancy in enduring fatigue and privation; valour is but the second. Several corps have quitted their positions; they have turned a deaf ear to the voice of their officers. The 17th Light is of this number. Are they all dead then—those heroes who fought at Castiglione,¹ at Rivoli,² and at Neumark?³ They would have perished rather than abandon their colours, and they would have recalled their young comrades to honour and to their duty. Soldiers, your rations have not been regularly distributed, you say. What would you have done, if, like the 4th and 22d Light, and the 18th and 32d of the line, you had found yourselves in the midst of a desert, without bread or water, feeding on horses' and mules' flesh? 'Victory will give us bread,' said they—and you quit your colours!"

"Soldiers of Italy, a new general commands you; he was always in the advanced guard in the most brilliant days of your glory. Surround him with your confidence; he will restore victory to your ranks."

"I shall have a daily account sent me of the conduct of each corps, and especially of that of the 17th Light, and of the 63d of the line; they will recollect the confidence that I had in them."

The administration of the finances, and that of the armies, were not the only departments of the government which claimed, in a pressing manner, the attention of the new Consuls. It was necessary, at the same time, to revoke those severities, unworthy of a wise and humane government, which the violence of the parties had wrung from the weakness of the expiring Directory; it was necessary to maintain order, threatened here by the Vendéans in arms, there by the revolutionists, exasperated at the events of the 18th of Brumaire.

The first political measure of the new Consuls was relative to the law of the hostages. This law, which made the relations of the Vendéans and Chouans responsible for acts committed in the revolted provinces, punished some with imprisonment, others with transportation. It shared with the law of the progressive forced loan, and, with much better reason, the public animadversion. It was, in fact, only under the influence of the blind passions of this time, that men dared to hold the relations of the insurgents responsible for acts which they had not committed, even though they wished them success. The Consuls dealt with this law as they had done with the law of the progressive forced loan; they proposed its repeal to the legislative commissions, by which it was immediately decreed. General Bonaparte went himself to the prison of the Temple, where many of these hostages were confined, to break their fetters with his glorious hands, and to receive those numerous benedictions, which the reparative acts of the Consulate so invariably and so justly called forth.

To this measure were added others of a like kind, which stamped the policy of the Provisional Consuls with a character precisely similar. Many priests, though they had taken that oath, as to the civil constitution of the clergy, which became the origin of the schism, had nevertheless been persecuted. These priests, who were distinguished by the epithet assermentés—sworn—were some of them concealed or fugitives; others imprisoned in the isles of Ré and Oléron. The Consuls issued orders for the release of all who were still in confinement. This measure had the effect of drawing from their retreats, or bringing back to France, all the priests of the same class, who had sought their safety in flight or concealment.

Several emigrants, shipwrecked off Calais, had been for some time a subject of deep interest to the public mind. These unfortunate persons, placed between the horrors of shipwreck and the rigour of the laws against emigration, had not hesitated to throw themselves on the shore of France, not imagining that their country could be as pitiless to them as the tempest. The partisans of measures of

¹ CASTIGLIONE. On the 3d of August, 1796, Napoleon advanced with 25,000 men upon Lonato, while Augereau's division moved toward Castiglione. Both attacks were completely successful, Napoleon cutting the Austrian army in sunder, and Augereau, after some very hard fighting, carrying the town of Castiglione and driving the Austrians back upon Mantua.—Alison, i. 410.

In these battles the Austrians had thirty thousand men. There were 18,000 at Castiglione. Lypiat formed the advanced guard, so that it required all the vigour of his excellent division, reinforced by the reserve of cavalry, to take the town and beat the enemy.—Montolieu, Mémoires, i. 10.

² RIVOLI. Fought on January 14, 1797, between 40,000 men under Alvinzi and Quasdonovich, and Napoleon with 20,000. At first the chances of the day appeared to be against the French, but by a wily ruse their leader outwitted the Austrian chiefs and gained a complete victory.—Alison, i. 418.

The armies of Alvinzi and Provera were stronger than is supposed. Their loss amounted to 30,000 killed, wounded, or prisoners, the number of the last being 19,000 men.—Montolieu, Mémoires, i. 21.

³ NEUMARK. An affair in the Tyrol, April 2, 1797, between the Austrians under the Archduke Charles, and the French division of Massena. The gorge, though of terrific strength, was forced, almost instantly, the imperialists losing 1500 men.—Alison, i. 405.

severity alleged, and the thing was nearly certain, that these emigrants were going to Vendée, to take part in the renewal of the civil war; and thence they argued that it was right to apply to them the terrible laws of the time against emigration. But public humanity, luckily awakened, was adverse to this mode of reasoning. The question had been several times resolved in a contrary spirit. At the instigation of the new Consuls it was finally decided that these emigrants should be liberated, but transported out of the territories of the Republic. Among them were several members of the highest families in France, and, in particular, that Duke de Choiseul, whom we have since found invariably among the steady friends of a discreet liberty, the only liberty that honest men can love and defend.

The acts which we have just recorded gave universal satisfaction. Admire the difference that may exist between one government and another! Had these acts emanated from the Directory, they would have been termed unworthy concessions made to the emigrant party! Emanating from the new consular government, at the head of which figured an illustrious general, whose presence, wherever he might happen to be, instantaneously suggested the idea of strength, these acts were regarded as signs of a vigorous but moderate policy. So true it is, that to be moderate with honour and with advantage, one must needs be powerful!

In this first moment, it was only in regard to the revolutionary party that the policy of the Provisional Consuls was deficient in moderation. It was against this party that they had striven in the recent struggle on the 18th and 19th of Brumaire. Some irritation and distrust were naturally felt towards it; and, among these acts of a conciliatory and reparative policy, severity was exercised against it alone. The news of the 18th of Brumaire had produced a strong sensation among the patriots of the South. The societies affiliated to the parent society of the Riding-House, formed in Paris, manifested redoubled indignation. It was reported that the deputies, deprived by the law of the 19th of Brumaire of their quality of members of the legislative body, were about to assemble at Toulouse, for the purpose of installing there a sort of Directory. General Bonaparte, now that he had in his hands the government and the army, was afraid of nothing. He had shown, on the 13th of Vendémiaire, that he well knew how to quell insurrections, and he felt no uneasiness about what a few hot-headed patriots, without soldiers, were likely to do. But his colleagues, Sieyès and Roger-Ducos, had not the like confidence. Several of the ministers joined them, and they persuaded him that it was necessary to take precautions. Inclined himself, from disposition, to energetic measures, though disposed to moderation from policy, he consented to doom thirty-eight members of the revolutionary party to transportation, and eighteen others to confinement at La Rochelle. Among the number were several wretches, one, in particular, who boasted of having murdered the Princess de Lamballe; but there were also honourable men, members of the two Councils, and one distinguished and respectable personage, General Jourdan. His public opposition to the 18th of Brumaire had at the moment excited some apprehensions. To inscribe the name of such a man on such a list was a fault upon a fault.

Public opinion, though unfavourably disposed towards the revolutionists, treated this measure with coldness and almost with censure. Such was the aversion to severity, to reactions, that they were disapproved, even when exercised against those who had themselves hesitated at nothing. Remonstrances poured in from all quarters, and some of them from very high ones, in favour of certain names included in this list of proscription. The Court of Cassation presented a memorial in behalf of one of its members, Xavier Audouin, who had not deserved that so much trouble should be taken on his account. M. de Talleyrand, always mild from disposition, always adroit in his proceedings, whom the revolutionary party had contributed by its aversion to keep out of the ministry of foreign affairs, had the good feeling to interpose in favour of one Jorry, who had publicly insulted him. He did so, he said, for fear the insertion of this vulgar offender's name in the list of the new proscripts might be attributed to revenge on his part. His published letter did him honour, and saved the person for whom he pleaded. In compliance with a public demand, as it were, General Jourdan's name also was erased. Most fortunately, the speedy and favourable turn taken by events allowed the abrogation of this act, which was only an accidental deviation from a course otherwise firm and straightforward.

General Bonaparte had sent his devoted lieutenant, General Lannes,¹ to Toulouse. On the mere appearance of this officer, all preparations for resistance ceased. Tranquillity was restored in the city of Toulouse; the societies auxiliary to that of the Riding-House, in all the cities of the South, were put to silence. The hot-headed revolutionists soon saw that public opinion, re-acting against them, was no longer in their favour, and they perceived at the head of the government a man whom nobody could hope to be able to resist. Besides, the more rational of them could not forget that it was this same man who, on the 13th of Vendémiaire, had dispersed the royalist bands of the sections of Paris, which had risen against the Convention; and who, under the Directory, by lending a hand to the government, had furnished it with the means of bringing about the 18th of Fructidor. They submitted, therefore; the most violent uttering some cries of rage which were soon stifled; the others hoping at least that under the military government of the new Cromwell, as they then called him, the Revolution and France would not be conquered for the advantage of the Bourbons, the English, the Austrians, and the Russians.

¹ LANNES. Born at Lectoure, in Normandy, in 1769, the son of a poor mechanic. He served first in the Pyrenees. In 1795, was chief of brigade under General Lefebvre. Was employed by Bonaparte in the affair of the Sections, and afterward joined the army of Italy. Distinguished himself at Millesimo, and was the first man across the bridge of Lodi. Napoleon himself being second. In Egypt, he was foremost in every danger, fought desperately at Aboukir, and was severely wounded at Acra. He returned to France with Napoleon, and assisted in overturning the Directory.

He was one of the best of Napoleon's generals, though at first his during predominated over his judgment.—Camp and Court of Napoleon II.

A single act of resistance, not by force, but by legal means, was offered to the 18th of Brumaire. The president of the criminal tribunal of the Yonne, named Barnabé, following the example of the ancient parliaments, refused to register the law of the 19th of Brumaire, constituting the provisional government. This magistrate, denounced to the legislative commissions, was charged with having refused to perform his duties, suspended, and removed from his seat. He submitted to his fate with resignation and dignity.

The speedy defeat of these attempts at resistance allowed the government to rescind a measure, which was in contradiction with its prudent policy. On a report from Cambacérés, minister of justice, stating that order was re-established in the departments, and that the laws were everywhere executed without impediment, the transportation decreed against the thirty-eight individuals, and the confinement at Rochelle of eighteen others, were commuted into mere surveillance, and this, too, was soon discontinued.

This measure was soon eclipsed by the series of sensible, judicious, and vigorous acts which marked the new government. La Vendée had, in its turn, created some uneasiness. A recent rising had been attempted toward the end of the Directory. But the accession of General Bonaparte completely changed the face of things, and the views entertained in all parts of the Republic. The leaders of the new royalist insurrection had been excited to take up arms as much by the late severities of the Directory, as by the hope of the speedy overthrow of that government. But, on the one hand, the repeal of the law of hostages, the liberation of priests, the grant of life to the shipwrecked emigrants, had a conciliatory effect; while, on the other, the attainment of General Bonaparte to power put an end to all hope of witnessing the dissolution of the order of things which had sprung from the Revolution. The 18th of Brumaire had been productive of a change of sentiment in La Vendée, as in other quarters, and given birth to feelings altogether new.

The royalist chiefs, some of whom were fighting in the fields of La Vendée, while others were in Paris engaged in political intrigues, worked up, like every party which seeks to overturn a government, to a continual activity of mind, and incessantly in quest of new combinations for rendering their cause triumphant, conceived that there might perhaps be some way of coming to an understanding with General Bonaparte. They thought that so eminent a personage could not be very desirous of figuring for a few days on the shifting stage of the French Revolution, only to disappear, like his predecessors, in the abyss opened beneath their feet; and that he would much rather occupy a place in a peaceable and regularly constituted monarchy, of which he would be the ornament and support. They were, in short, so credulous as to hope that the part of Monk would suit a man who considered even that of Cromwell as not great enough for him. They availed themselves of the medium of one of those foreign diplomatic agents, who, under the pretext of studying the country to which they are accredited, dabble in all the underhand intrigues of parties; and thus obtained an introduction to General Bonaparte. Messrs. Hyde de Neuville, and D'Andigné,¹ were the royalists who ventured upon this step.

It is unnecessary to demonstrate how very erroneous the judgment which they had formed of General Bonaparte must have been. This extraordinary man, now sensible of his strength and his greatness, would not be the servant of any party. If he was not fond of disorder, he was fond of the Revolution; if he did not believe in the full extent of liberty, he wished at least to carry out, to its fullest extent, that social reformation which it aimed at accomplishing. He desired, therefore, to appropriate the triumph of this revolution; he desired the glory of bringing it to the close, of causing it to end in a peaceable and regular state of things: he desired to remain the leader of it, under, it mattered not what title, and with, it mattered not what form of government. But, to submit to be an instrument in the hands of any power, other than that of Providence, he had already too much glory, and was too conscious of his own powerful superiority.

He received, therefore, Messrs. Hyde de Neuville and D'Andigné, listened to their insinuations, more or less perspicuous as it might be, declared frankly his intention of putting an end to persecution, of reconciling the different parties to the government, but of suffering none to become ascendant save that of the Revolution itself, of the Revolution in its best signification. He declared to them formally his resolution to treat with the chieftains of La Vendée on reasonable terms, or in default of that, to exterminate them to a man. The interview therefore led to nothing unless it were the making the royalist party better acquainted with the character of General Bonaparte.

While these communications were in progress between General Bonaparte, and some of the friends of the Bourbons in Paris, others were going forward in La Vendée itself between the insurgent leaders and the generals of the Republic. Toward the close of the Directory when no one knew to whom obedience was due, a sort of slackness nearly akin to disloyalty crept into the ranks of the army which guarded La Vendée, and more than one republican officer, doubting the continued existence of the Republic, had begun to turn their eyes toward the royalist faction. Every thing having changed, on the accession to power of General Bonaparte, these communications, previously dangerous, now became useful to the state, and the parleys took a different turn.

¹ HYDE DE NEUVILLE. D'ANDIGNÉ. Two agents of the Bourbons in Paris; they were received by Napoleon, and engaged to bring over the Vendean chiefs.

Hyde de Neuville appeared a young man of intellect, ardent, without being passionate. Andigné appeared a madman.—Gourgaud, Mémoires i 127.

The royalist chiefs, who had been bringing over to their party the officers of the Republican army, were in their turn brought over by those very officers to the government of the Republic. It was not difficult to convince them how trifling must be the hope of conquering the conqueror of Italy and Egypt; and how great on the contrary was that of obtaining at his hands a mild and restorative sway which should render the condition of all parties grateful and peaceable. Such language failed not of success. There was, at this crisis, a wise, conciliatory, and faithful general, at the head of the army of the west; a man, much employed by General Hoche,¹ from the period of the first pacification of La Vendée—General Hedouville.² He grasped at once all these clues, and offered to place them in the hands of the new Consul.

He took possession of them instantly, and ordered General Hedouville to treat with the Vendean leaders. These leaders, intimidated by the presence of General Bonaparte at the helm of affairs, showed themselves well disposed to treat. It was difficult to sign a capitulation, and to agree upon the articles thereof without some delay; but an armistice did not present the same objections. It was proposed to sign one forthwith. It was accepted on behalf of the government, and in a few days Messrs. de Châtillon, d'Autichamp, and de Bourmont signed a suspension of hostilities for La Vendée and a part of Brittany. It was proposed moreover that application should be had to Georges Cadoudal and to M. Frotté, in order to the adoption of the same in Morbihan and Normandy.

There was no loss of time in this action of the new government, for it was concluded in the beginning of Frimaire, about twenty days after the installation of the Provisional Consuls. It gave general satisfaction, and led to the idea that the pacification of La Vendée was nearer than in truth it was.

Some rumours of the same nature, with regard to foreign powers, led also to the hope, that under the lucky star of Bonaparte, the prompt re-establishment of European peace might be expected.

As it has been already stated at the opening of this book, Prussia and Spain alone were at peace with France; the first always showing a degree of coldness, the second of embarrassment, in her connection with us. Russia, Austria, England, and all the small powers dependent on them, whether in Italy or Germany, waged deadly war against the French republic. England, to whom the question of war was but a question of finance, had solved that question to her satisfaction, by establishing an income tax which gave her abundant revenues. She was resolved, therefore, to continue the war, in order to gain time for the seizure of Malta, which she was blockading; and for the reduction, by means of a blockade likewise, of the French army in Egypt. Austria, in the possession of all Italy, preferred risking all to surrendering that conquest. But the chivalrous Paul the First, who had rushed into warfare under the inspiration of his mad enthusiasm, had recently seen his arms disgraced at Zurich, and had therefore conceived a violent resentment against all the world, but especially against Austria. He had been persuaded into the belief that she was the sole cause of this misfortune; for her soldiers, who ought, according to a concerted movement, to have advanced upon the Rhine and left Switzerland to the Russians, had abandoned the position of Zurich too hastily, and left Korsakoff exposed alone to the blows of Massena; who, when he had overthrown Korsakoff, had little to do in overpowering Suwaroff. Paul the First saw, in this, the act of an interested, perhaps of a treacherous ally. Distrust once awakened, all naturally appeared to him every day more suspicious. He had, he said, taken arms only to support the weak against the strong, and to replace on their thrones the princes whom the French republic had cast down. Then Austria had hoisted her own standard everywhere in Italy, and had not recalled to that country any of the dethroned princes. He began saying to himself that, acting from pure generosity, he was the dupe of his allies, who acted solely from interested motives. Fickle to excess, he gave himself up to these new sentiments, as violently as a short time before he had surrendered himself to feelings directly opposite to these. One last fact had exasperated him in the highest—that the Russian flag had been struck at Ancona, and the Austrian ensign hoisted in its place. It was but the misconduct of an inferior officer, but the wrong, such as it was, grievously incensed him.

The sentiments of absolute princes, in spite of all their pretensions to secrecy, escape as readily as those of free nations. Those can, in truth, be no more easily restrained than these. This new result of the battle of Zurich was beginning to be known in Europe, and

¹ HOCHÉ. Born in 1768. At fourteen, a stable boy in the employment of Louis XVI. At sixteen, entered the French guard. In 1790, carried them over to the people. Exchanged into the municipal guard; and in 1792 was a lieutenant. Served with Dumouriez in Holland. Defended Dunkirk against the Duke of York. In 1793, general of division and commander of the army of the Moselle.

After a series of splendid successes, he drove the Austrians out of Alsace, fell under the suspicions of the Directory, was banished to Nice, arrested and imprisoned in the Conciergerie, was liberated, conquered and pacified La Vendée. In 1796, appointed commander of the Irish invading army, his armament was dispersed by a storm. In 1797, appointed commander of the army of the Sambre and Meuse, and in four days won three pitched battles and five skirmishes. Died at twenty-nine, of consumption.—Biographie Moderne.

Victories, a great pacification, a genius equal to all things, a probity without a stain, a universal idea that he alone could have competed with the conqueror of Rivoli, and the Pyramids, that his ambition would have remained republican, and proved a barrier to that ambition which pretended to a throne; in one word, high achievements, high conjectures, twenty-nine years—these things make his memory. It is surely beautiful enough; let us not regret that he died in youth.—Honourable George Sidney Smythe.

² HEDOUVILLE was born in 1755. He had achieved nothing particularly remarkable at this time. Bonaparte subsequently sent him as French ambassador to the court of Russia.

that was not the least advantage we derived from it.

Austria and England had, on this news, redoubled their attentions to Paul the First. They had loaded Suwaroff, the invincible Suwaroff—as he was called until he met Massena—they had loaded him, I say, with honours of every kind; but not by that had they calmed the vexation of the Russian general, or the resentment of the Czar. An entirely new manifestation, on the part of Paul the First, gave rise to apprehension that he was ere long about to abandon the coalition.

In the outburst of his first zeal for the coalition, he had declared war on Spain, because she made common cause with France, and had been on the point of declaring it on Sweden, Denmark, and Prussia, because those cabinets chose to remain neuter. He had broken all relations with Prussia. But since the late events he appeared to be much softened with regard to these courts, against which he was at first so bitter, and he had even sent to Berlin a diplomatist strictly in his confidence, who was to go thither in the character of a private traveller, but with the secret charge of re-establishing relations between the courts of France and Prussia.

We had at that time in Berlin a discreet and able agent, M. Otto,¹ who, since that time, has been so fortunate as to attach his name to the most important acts of the epoch. He had informed the government of the new state of things. It was indeed evident that, if peace were considered more desirable than war, the key of the crisis was at Berlin. Spain, thrust by her geographical position into a corner of Europe, and by the weakness of her government into a corner as to politics, could be of no utility. But Prussia, situate in the midst of the belligerent powers, having continued neutral in spite of their remonstrances, ill-regarded at first by all the cabinets during the early heat of the coalition, but judged more favourably as they grew calmer—Prussia was rapidly becoming a centre of influence, the more so as Russia seemed ready to approach her. What had been termed pusillanimity, was now called wisdom. This court, should she take up with energy the part which seemed to be thrust upon her by events, might serve as a bond of union between France and Europe, might even impose her mediation on the rest; a mode of action, at a later day, much used, and with much profit; the interposing, namely, between exhausted adversaries and gathering all the fruits of a war, one has no waged, by a peace which he has dictated. Had she dared to do this, never from the days of the great Frederic would she have played a nobler part.

There was, at this time, on the throne of Prussia, a young king, of honourable principles and upright intentions, a sincere lover of peace, who never ceased to deplore his father's error in dissipating by an insane war against the French Republic, the military glory, and vast treasure accumulated by the great Frederic. At this moment, being in amicable relations with the French Republic, he profited of them to recruit by his economy the treasures left by his great uncle, and wasted by his father. At the king's side was a minister of talent, M. d'Haugwitz,² endowed with the highest talent for evading difficulties; like his master, a partisan of peaceful policy, but more ambitious than he, and believing that from a well-directed neutrality greater aggrandisement might accrue to Prussia than from war itself. At this time, that might have been true. He urged his master, therefore, to assume actively the part of Mediator and Pacificator of the Continent. This part doubtless was an arduous one for the young and timid Frederic William, but this prince could have played it to a greater or less extent, and have assumed a portion, if not the whole of it.

General Bonaparte having perceived all this immediately applied himself eagerly to the proposition of the court of Berlin. It had, at a previous period, been useful to him to be a member of the Institute; so that he could figure under that title in certain solemnities in which it did not suit him to appear politically, especially in the celebrated fêtes of the 21st of January. It was now useful to him to be a general, and to have aids-de-camp whom he could send whither it seemed good to him. The idea occurred to him of following the example of princes ascending the throne, who announce their accession by the mission of great dignitaries. He in fact did the same thing, with less pomp, despatching one of his aides-de-camp to Berlin, a step which a statesman of a purely military character might certainly venture on taking, without transcending the privileges of his office.

Among those who served him in this capacity was one, prudent, discreet, intelligent, uniting perfect manners to an agreeable exterior. This was Duroc,³ who had returned from Egypt with his general, bearing on his brow a ¹ OTTO. Born at Strasburg, in 1753. Was mentioned to the government by the university of that city as a capital man in the diplomatic line. From 1777 to 1778 secretary of legation to Bavaria. Then secretary of legation to the United States, then minister of France to the same country until 1792. In 1793, having returned to France, head of the first political division in the administration of foreign affairs, until 1795; after which he was secretary of the embassy, and then chargé d'affaires at Berlin until 1800.—Biographie Moderne. H.

² HAUGWITZ. Prussian minister. A man of decided character and talents. H.

³ DUROC was a native of Nancy, in the department of La Meurthe. The son of a scrivener. Napoleon found him at the siege of Toulon, and interested himself in him immediately. He became his chief aid-de-camp, afterwards a leader of brigade, distinguished himself at the siege of Lissos; accompanied Bonaparte to Egypt, and returned thence with him in 1798.—Biographie Moderne.

I have heard the emperor say at other times that, in his whole career, Duroc alone had possessed his blind confidence, and received all the outpourings of his heart. Duroc was not brilliant, but he had excellent judgment, and performed essential services, which his own modesty, and their own nature, conspired to keep unknown.—Las Cases.

"Duroc," said he, "had lively, tender, and secret feelings, which his exterior coldness led no one to expect. I was long without knowing him, so exact and regular was his conduct. It was only when my day's work was ended, and I was thinking of repose, that his began. Chance or accident only caused me to know him. Duroc was pure and moral, perfectly disinterested in receiving, and as generous in dispensing, favours"—Las Cases Opinion of Napoleon.

of the glory of the pyramids. The new Consul commanded him to repair immediately to Berlin, to carry thither his compliments to the King and Queen of Prussia, to present himself there as one merely charged with a mission of courtesy and deference, but to take the first opportunity of explaining the last revolution which had taken place in France, to set it forth as a return to order, to all wholesome usages, and, above all, to pacific intentions. Duroc was directed to flatter the young king, and to let him perceive that he would be accepted willingly, should he desire it, as the arbiter of future peace. The Republic relying on the victories of the Texel and Zurich, and on all those for which the name of General Bonaparte might be esteemed a pledge in future, could, without fearing for her dignity, present herself with the olive of peace in her hand.

While he was despatching Duroc to Berlin, General Bonaparte performed in the name of the Provisional Consuls, several other acts, which abroad must have borne the same interpretation. First of all, having delayed for some time the accession of M. de Talleyrand to foreign affairs, he at last called him to that office. No person more conciliatory, or better fitted to treat with Europe; more skilled to please, or even to flatter her; could have been placed there, and that too without lowering the French cabinet from its elevated position. We shall have other occasions for painting this singular and remarkable character. It will be enough to say at this moment that the choice alone of this person clearly proved that, without falling from energy into weakness, the government was passing from the politics of passion to the politics of calculation. There was nothing in M. de Talleyrand, even to the exquisite elegance of his manners, which was not an advantage to the new position which the government was desirous of assuming with regard to foreign powers.

General Bonaparte made some other diplomatic appointments conceived in the same spirit. Although M. Otto, who had been chargé d'affaires at Berlin since M. Sieyès had left that post, was an excellent agent, still he was but a chargé d'affaires. Another situation was assigned to him, in which he had the power of rendering himself very useful, and in his place General Beurnonville,¹ an old friend of La Fayette,² who had for a long time been a prisoner of Austria, and one of those members of the minority of the French revolution who had, in 1789, sincerely espoused the cause of the Revolution, was appointed.

General Beurnonville was a frank soldier, loyal, open-hearted, moderate in his opinions, and perfectly suited to the representation of the new government. For Austria, whose prisoner he had been for a long time, he entertained a degree of hatred, which was well calculated to render him popular at Berlin, where nearly the same sentiments were felt toward that power, as in the times of Frederick the Great.

We had as our representative at Madrid an old demagogue, without the slightest influence, who has left no name behind him in the diplomatic career into which chance alone cast him. He was replaced by a member of the constituent assembly, a prudent, intellectual, learned man, who has figured honourably in the diplomacy of the times; this was M. Alquier. To conclude, at Copenhagen, where the principles of maritime neutrality, openly violated by England, might lead to the growth of feelings, which it would be wise for us to cultivate, M. Bourgoing was nominated, in place of a creature of the Directory, Grouville³ by name. The choice in all these cases was excellent, and very proper, as indicating the spirit of prudence and moderation which was beginning to prevail in the relations of France with foreign powers.

To the choice of these men, the Consuls were desirous of adding some actions which might serve as a reply to a reproach widely spread

¹ BEURNONVILLE, PIERRE RYEL DE. General of division, war minister, member of the Conservative Senate, &c., &c. Born in 1753, at Champignerol, intended for the church but entered the army. Served under Dumouriez with distinction—war minister in 1793. Was sent to arrest Dumouriez at St. Amand, but was himself arrested and carried before Clarfalt, and detained at Olmutz until 1795. In 1797, was appointed to command the French army in Holland. In 1799, made inspector-general, and assisted Bonaparte in the revolution of the 9th and 10th of November, 1799.

² LA FAYETTE. Born in Auvergne. He volunteered his services to America, very early in the war of the Independence. Returned to France a major-general and a republican. He insisted, after the union of the three orders, on the removal of the troops from Paris. On the 15th of July, was appointed president of the Parisian National Guard. At the time of Louis XVI.'s flight he was accused by the Jacobins of aiding it, and by the royalists of causing his arrest. He shortly afterward resigned the command of the National Guard. Took the command of the central army at Metz, in 1793, was beat at Philippsburgh, but joined Gouvion. Attempted to persuade the king to leave Paris and repair to the army. After the catastrophe of August the 10th, he endeavoured to excite the army in favour of the king, and though he at first succeeded, he soon fled in distrust. He was declared an emigrant—treated as a prisoner by Austria and Prussia; and imprisoned first at Magdeburgh and then at Olmutz. In 1799, he was liberated at the request of Napoleon, withdrew to Hamburgh, and after the 18th Brumaire, retired to his estates, which were restored to him. The farther facts of his life, as regarding the consulate and empire, will be found in the text; but it may be as well to state that, in August, 1831, he landed at New York on a visit to the United States, and was received throughout the country with the warmest enthusiasm. He passed through the twenty-four states in a sort of triumphal procession, all parties uniting to do him honour. He was sent home by the nation in the frigate Brandywine. In December preceding, Congress had made him a grant of 200,000 dollars and a township of land, "in consideration of his important services and expenditures during the American Revolution." In November, 1837, the Chamber of Deputies was dissolved, when La Fayette was again returned a member at the new elections. Shortly before 1830, travelling through Lyons, he was enthusiastically received there. During the Revolution of July, 1830, he was appointed general-in-chief of the National Guards of Paris, and, though not personally engaged in the fight, his name and activity were of great service. When the National Guards were established throughout the whole of France, he was appointed their commander-in-chief. Shortly afterward, he was made a marshal of France. He was soon after distrusted by the government, who feared his republican principles, and resigned his command. His virtues, his purity, and his love of liberty will ever render him a favourite with men.—Encyclopedia Americana.

³ GROUVILLE, a comic poet before the Revolution. The pupil and copyist of Champfort and secretary to the Prince of Condé. He declared in favour of the Revolution, and figured as a member of the society of 1799. He edited "the village paper" under Carutti. Was sent to Ilenmark as minister in 1793, and returned in February, 1796, but was again there in 1799. A weak, vain, cold, narrow-minded man.—Biographie Moderne.

in the courts of Europe, to the end that the French Republic incessantly violated the rights of nations, and the treaties made with her. Assuredly she had violated the rights of nations and her own treaties in a less degree than Austria, England, and all the other courts at war with us; but it was the custom to pretend that no relations could be entertained with a fickle, passionate government, incessantly represented by new men, who never held themselves bound either by their own engagements, or by the usages of the public right of Europe. This reproach might have been cast back with more justice against the European cabinets, which had done worse, without the excuse either of revolutionary passions, or of continual changes of government. To give a more just idea of the policy of the Consuls, Bonaparte performed a first act of justice towards the unhappy knights of Malta, to whom promises had been made on the seizure of their isle, that those of their order who spoke the French language should not be treated in France as emigrants. Yet they had not hitherto been permitted to enjoy this condition of their capitulation, whether as regarded their persons or their properties. General Bonaparte caused all the advantages of that capitulation to be granted to them.

With regard to Denmark also, he adopted a measure of excellent effect, and of equitable benevolence. There were, in the French ports, many Danish vessels, stopped under the Directory, in consequence of representations touching the rights of neutrals. They were reproached with not having caused the rights of maritime neutrality to be respected. With having allowed the English to visit them, and to seize the French property which composed their cargoes. The Directory had declared that it would make them undergo precisely the same violence which they had borne at the hand of England, in order to compel them to defend more energetically the principles of the law of nations, in virtue of which they sailed the ocean. This would certainly have been an act of justice, if, having the power to make their rights respected, they had not chosen to exert it. But the poor people did as alone they were able to do. And it was hard to punish them for violence on one hand, by violence on the other. In pursuance of this system, many of their traders had been arrested. General Bonaparte commanded that they should all be released, in token of a more moderate and more equitable policy.

Duroc, the envoy to Berlin, arrived there speedily, and was presented by M. Otto, who was yet there. According to the strict rules of etiquette, Duroc, a simple aide-de-camp, could not be placed in direct communication with the court. All these rules were, however, set aside in behalf of an officer attached to the person of General Bonaparte. He was received by the king, by the queen, and was constantly invited to Potsdam. Curiosity had as large a part as policy in this eagerness: for glory, beyond its own glitter, has also its material advantages in business. To see, to listen to the aide-de-camp Duroc, was, as I may say, to approach, though still at a distance, the extraordinary man who occupied the world. Duroc had assisted at the battles of the Pyramids, of Mount Thabor, of Aboukir. A thousand questions were proposed to him, to which he replied moderately and simply. He appeared gentle, polite, moderate, deeply devoted to his general; and he conveyed the most favourable impression of the line of conduct which that general imposed on those about him. Duroc's success at Berlin was complete. The queen showed him the highest consideration, and on all sides the French Republic began to be spoken of in the most favourable terms. Duroc found the young king, very well pleased at seeing a new government arise in Paris, combining strength with moderation, very much flattered at being an object of attention at once to France and Russia, very desirous of playing the part of mediator, but at the same time more desirous than capable of doing so, and showing at all times great zeal and ardour to accomplish that end.

The success of this journey occupied all the courts of Europe, and resounded even to Paris. The idea of approaching peace began to circulate among the minds of all. A very specious circumstance, though really of very small importance, contributed strangely to the spread of this opinion.

The French and Austrian armies were face to face along the Rhine, and on the crests of the Alps and Apennines. On the Rhine they were divided by an obstacle sufficient to hinder any serious operation. For a passage of the Rhine by either party was a bold stroke, such as is tried only when a campaign is about to commence. Now it was the month of Frimaire, that is to say, December. It could not therefore be thought of. Skirmishes on the banks of the river became a mere wanton waste of blood.

For that frontier, then, an armistice was readily arranged. As to that of the Alps and Apennines, it was a different question. In the midst of that broken country, a well-combined operation in this or that valley might at any moment secure an enviable position for the resumption of hostilities. It was not desirable, therefore, to tie up the hands of the government in that quarter, and no armistice was made. But no attention was paid to any except that recently signed, touching the Rhine; and in the number of happy changes, which the world pleased itself at that time by expecting from the new government, was included the possibility, nay, more, the probability of an immediate peace.

In all public calamities there is some real, and some imaginary evil, the one tending to make the other insupportable. It is much accomplished, to put an end to the imaginary ill; for thereby the sensation of the real ill is diminished, and patience is imparted to the sufferer to await the cure, and, what is yet more, a disposition is given him to believe therein. Under the Directory, it was a settled matter, that nothing more was to be expected from a weak and inconsiderate government, which, for the suppression of factious proceedings, was willing to have recourse to violence, without obtaining any of the benefits of strong measures.

Every thing that proceeded from it was taken in ill part, no good was expected from it, no one would even believe it, when by chance it did accomplish some small matter. Victory—for in its last days of existence victory had appeared to return to it—victory, I say, which would have been counted as glory to others, had not sufficed to gain for it the smallest honour.

The accession of General Bonaparte, from whom men had accustomed themselves to hope all things in consequence of his success, had altered this tendency. The imaginary evil was cured. Confidence was restored, every thing was now taken in good part. Assuredly, the facts were good in themselves, for it was good to deliver up the hostages, to discharge the priests, and to show a pacific disposition toward Europe; but the world was predisposed to receive them as good.

A symptom of reconciliation, such as the reception of an aide-de-camp, or an armistice without any consequences, like that signed recently touching the Rhine, were hailed as pledges of peace. Such is the magic influence of confidence! To new-born governments it is all in all; and, as to that of the consuls, it was all-powerful already. Moreover, money flowed into the treasury, and from the treasury was sent to the armies, which now, content with this first satisfaction, patiently waited for that which was promised in future. In the presence of a force reputed to be superior to all chances of resistance, all parties yielded; the oppressors without the hope of persecuting farther, the oppressed trusting that they should now obtain toleration. The good already accomplished was doubtless great; but all that, which time had not permitted to reach accomplishment, expectation added as perfect.

One thing was already spread far and wide, from the daily report of those who had worked with the young consul. It was said that this soldier, above whom was rated no general of the present age, if any of the past, was a consummate manager of affairs, a clear-headed politician. All the leading men, with whom he had surrounded himself, and to whom he had often listened with attention, themselves in turn enlightened by the justice and rapidity of his perceptions, never came from his presence without being subjugated and filled with admiration. This they admitted the more willingly, because within a few days it had become the fashion both to think and to speak thus. Sometimes a false and unreal merit has been seen to captivate the public eye for a moment; to fascinate all minds, and extort from them the most incredible exaggerations. But sometimes again it happens that real merit, true genius, inspires the same sort of caprice, and that caprice then becomes a passion.

It was but a month since General Bonaparte had possessed himself of the government, and yet the impression already made on all around him by his puissant intellect was no less profound than it was general. The good Roger-Ducos would not surrender his opinion of him. The humorist, Sieyès, little wont to yield to fashion, especially when he was not himself its favourite, admitted his superiority, and paid him the sincerest homage, by suffering him to act his pleasure. To those who admired him from conviction, were added those who admired him from interest; who, seeing in General Bonaparte the evident head of the new republic, set no bounds to the expression of their enthusiasm. He had, however, among his admirers those who were truly sincere, Messrs. de Talleyrand, Regnault de St. Jean d'Angely,¹ Rœderer,² Boulay de la Meurthe,³ Defermon,⁴ Real,⁵ Dufresne, &c., who repeated everywhere that such promptitude, such certainty, so wide a grasp of intellect, so marvellous an energy, had never been seen before. And it is true, that what he had effected in a month in all the departments of the state was immense, and—what is rarely the case—that the truth in this instance equalled the utmost scope of flattery.

On all sides he was looked upon as the man to whom the new constitution was bound to allot the greater share of executive power. No one wished for a Cromwell—that must be admitted to the honour of the worthy characters of that time; and the friends of the general were wont to say aloud that the parts of Cæsar and Cromwell were worn out and unworthy the genius and virtues of the young saviour of France. All parties wished to see such a concentration of authority in his hands, with certain guaranties in behalf of liberty, as would enable him to govern the Republic prosperously and mightily. Such was the desire of the moderate revolutionists, at that time the most numerous party. The ultra-revolutionists were determined to discover in the young general a Cromwell or a Cæsar, yet desired, at the same time, for the preservation of their own heads, or of their rational property, that he should have time granted him enough to drive away the Bourbons, and the

¹ REGNAULT, a barrister, deputy of the tiers-etat of St. Jean d'Angely to the States-General. At first attached to the popular party, but afterwards inclined to the royalists, and published a paper, Le Courier de Versailles, in their favour. He was an eloquent speaker, and mingled in all the business of those stirring times. In 1796 he attached himself to Bonaparte, followed him to Milan and Malta, and in 1799 was chosen a member of the council of state.—Biographie Moderne. H.

² RŒDERER, whose probity and noble sentiments he, Bonaparte, admired.—Gourgaud.

Counsellor in the parliament of Metz, sent thence as deputy of the tiers-etat, joined the revolutionary party. He proposed the abolition of religious orders, opposed the Catholic, as the national religion, and defended the Duke of Orleans. In 1798 he truckled to all parties, but finally compromised himself by siding with the king. After this he kept himself very quiet until the 18th Brumaire, when, with Volney and De Talleyrand, he was most strenuous in bringing on the revolution of that day.—Biographie Moderne. H.

³ BOULAY DE LA MEURTHE, a barrister at Nancy at the period of the revolution, the cause of which he embraced with moderation, and continued to act throughout those stormy times, with dignity, consistency, and honour.—Biographie Moderne. H.

⁴ DEFERMON DES CHAPPELLIERES, a lawyer of Bretagne, deputy of the tiers-etat from Rennes. A moderate and consistent reformer throughout the revolution.

⁵ REAL, a native of the Austrian Netherlands. Public accuser to the criminal tribunal of Aug. 10, 1793. Then substitute for the attorney of the communes. Declared in favour of the revolution of May 31. Was very zealous in promoting levies against La Vendée. Was many times in great danger during the reign of terror, &c., for his defence of the Montagne, of the committee of No tes, the Vendemiaire, Royalists, &c. Active in the revolution of the 18th Brumaire.—Biographie Moderne. H.

Austrians. The royalists asked him to save them from the revolutionists, and to reconstitute the kingly power; nor were they without certain vague hopes that, after having reconstituted it, he would replace it in their hands, and they were disposed, in that case, to pay him for the restoration by assigning him the part of Constable to Louis the XVIII., should he insist on it.

Thus all parties conceded to him the supreme power, more or less absolutely, for a longer or shorter period, and under different views. Sieyès, the new legislator, had therefore the task of assigning him his place in the constitution which he was preparing. But M. Sieyès was a dogmatist, as a legislator; labouring according to the nature of things, as he understood them, and not according to circumstances, still less according to the character of any man, be he whom he might. This will appear from what follows:

M. Sieyès, while his indefatigable colleague was swaying the helm of state, had at length applied himself to his allotted task. To give a constitution to France—not one of those ephemeral constitutions, the absurd productions of factious ignorance and factious passion, but a learned constitution, one founded on his observations of society and the lessons of his experience—this had been the dream of his life. In his anxious and solitary meditations he was ever busied with this. He had thought it over amid the sincere but unreflected impulses of the Constituent Assembly, amid the grim furies of the Convention, amid the weakness of the Directory. In every epoch he had altered and remodelled his work; at length he had fixed it, and once fixed, nothing could induce him to alter his plan. He would sacrifice nothing to the circumstances of the times, not even to the greatest of those circumstances, Bonaparte; whose station it was nevertheless necessary that he should designate in a style suited to the genius and character of him who was to occupy it.

This singular legislator, always musing, but writing scarce more than he acted, had never written out his constitution. It was in his head, and he had now to produce it thence. Nor was this altogether easy to him, anxious although he was to see it produced and converted into law. He was urged strenuously to make it known, and he resolved at last on communicating his ideas to one of his friends, M. Boulay de la Meurthe, who took upon himself the task of transcribing it as fast as he should learn it from their conversations together. It is by these means that this remarkable conception was collected accurately, and handed down to posterity, of which it is well worthy.

M. Sieyès had made a powerful effort of mind toward the reconciling republican and monarchial principles; toward borrowing from each, that which each possessed most useful or most necessary. But thus borrowing, he had distrusted both too much. He had taken infinite precautions against the rule of demagogues on the one hand, of despots on the other. He had produced thus a wise and complicated work, but one in which all the parts depended one on the other. And if this constitution, remodelled by and for General Bonaparte, should lose one of its counterpoises, its result could only be, contrary to the wish of its author, a pure despotism.

The first care of M. Sieyès in his combinations, was to keep them thoroughly defended from all passions of demagogues. Without entirely stripping the nation of that vast participation in public affairs, which it had enjoyed so unhappily for itself, he wished to leave it such powers only as it could not abuse. One word, which, perhaps, for the first time was in the mouth of every one, the term representative government, conveys an exact idea of what state men's minds were in at that epoch. It was meant by that term that the nation ought to take part in the government, only through intermediate hands; that is to say, that it ought to be represented; and, as we shall soon see, it was very indirectly that it was intended to be so.

The elections, under the Directory, had brought forward, in turn, the royalists at one time, the Jacobins at another, and it had been found necessary to exclude the former violently on the 18th Fructidor, the latter on the 22d Floreal. Moreover, the system of elections, and, above all, of direct elections, was greatly suspected by every one. Perhaps had they dared to reduce the whole number of electors to a hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand, they might have tried once more to brave the agitation of an election. But an electoral body reduced to a lower rate than ours would, perhaps, have wounded the spirits of men without reassuring them. Two hundred thousand electors granted to a nation which had been enjoying universal suffrage would have appeared an aristocracy; and at the same time the electors, however small their number, naming their members directly, with liberty to yield to all momentary passions, would have appeared a renewal of those constant reactions, which had been seen under the Directory. Direct but limited election, as it exists now among us, was not to be thought of in any combination. M. Sieyès, with his usual dogmatism, had made to himself a maxim. "Confidence," he used to say, "should arise from beneath, and power ascend from aloft." He had conceived, therefore, in order to realize this maxim, the system of national representation which I am about to lay before my readers.

Every individual of twenty-one years, being a French subject, was obliged, if he wished to enjoy his rights, to have himself inscribed on certain rolls, termed the civic register. This would form a number of five or six million citizens, admitted to the exercise of political rights. They were intended to assemble in their arrondissements, a territorial definition which did not as yet exist, but which was to be established, and to select every tenth man of their number. This appointment of the tenth man would give a primary list of from five to six hundred thousand persons. These five or six hundred thousand persons were to assemble again in their departments, and again selecting every tenth from their number, were called upon to form a secondary list of fifty or sixty thousand citizens. These again making a last selection, and once more reducing themselves to a tenth, would constitute the last list, which would be limited to five or six thousand candidates. These three lists were called lists of notability. The first, of five or six hundred thousand individuals, was called the list of notability of the communes. Hence were to be chosen the members of municipal administrations, those of the councils of the arrondissements, and the administrators answering to these, such as mayors, the officers whom we now call sub-prefects, judges of the first instance, &c. The second list of fifty or sixty thousand individuals, was called the list of notability of the departments, and hence it was that the members of the councils of the departments, the officers now called prefects, the judges of appeal, &c., and, in a word, all functionaries of that class should be appointed. To conclude, the third and last list, of five or six thousand persons, composed the list of national notability, whence were to be taken, of necessity, the members of the legislative body, all the dignitaries of high rank, councillors of state, ministers, judges of the court of cassation, &c., &c. M. Sieyès, borrowing a figure from geometry, called this system a pyramid, to give an exact idea of this scheme of national representation, broad at the base and narrow toward the summit.

It will be seen that, without giving the nation the right of designating itself the members who should represent it, or the functionaries who should govern it, M. Sieyès limited his scheme to the formation of a list of candidates, from which should be drawn equally the representatives of the country, and the agents of the government. Each year the mass of citizens were to assemble, in order to strike off from the lists the names of those who should be unworthy to figure there, and to replace them by others. It is to be remarked that, if this power of designation were very indirect, it embraced not only the members of the deliberative assemblies, but the executive officers likewise. It was at the same time greater, and less than what ordinarily exists in the system of representative monarchy. At the same time, all those agents called to fulfil functions clearly special; all such as suppose no political confidence, accountants for instance; and all those agents called to the performance of duties so difficult, that merit, when it is found, ought to be appointed to them at once wherever it is found, such as generals, ambassadors, and the like—all those agents, I say, were not to be chosen of necessity from the lists of notability.

We have displayed the method by which M. Sieyès, following his maxim, expected to cause confidence to arise from beneath. We are now about to see how he would make power descend from aloft.

Under the influence of momentary impressions, he dreaded the power of election, because he had seen passionate electors name representatives as passionate as themselves. He renounced this method, therefore, and desired that from these lists of notability, formed by the public confidence, the legislative and executive powers should designate their own members, and thus compose themselves. But, before entering into the mode of formation of these powers, it will be necessary to describe their organization. The legislative power was to be organized thus: first, the legislative body proper, placed between two bodies opposed one to the other, the tribunate and the council of state; then, apart from these and above them both, the conservative senate.

The legislative body was to be composed of three hundred members, hearing the laws discussed, but not debating themselves, and voting on them in silence. Now we shall see how and among whom the discussion was to be carried on.

A body of one hundred members, called the tribunate, with the duty of representing in this constitution the spirit of liberality, innovation, and contradiction, was bound to receive communications and propositions relative to laws; was bound to discuss them publicly, and to vote on them, but so far only as to ascertain whether it should urge their adoption or rejection on the legislative body. It was then bound to name three of its members, who should maintain before the legislative body the opinion which had prevailed within itself.

A council of state, the origin of that which now exists, but more considerable in importance and in attributes, was attached to the government, in order to digest the projected laws. It presented them to the legislative body, and sent three of its members to discuss them in opposition to the members of the tribunate. Thus, the council of state pleading in the affirmative, and the tribunate in the negative, supposing the latter to have voted against the law, the legislative body cast a silent vote to adopt or reject. Its vote alone gave the character of law to the propositions of the government. The council of state was, moreover, bound to complete the laws, by enactments necessary to their execution.

Last of all, we come to the senate. This body, composed of one hundred members, took no part in the work of legislation. Its duty was, either originating the action itself, or on the denunciation of the tribunate, to break any law or enactment of the government which should appear to it unconstitutional. On this account, it was called the conservative senate. It was intended to be composed of men who should have attained a ripe age; who should ipso facto by their admission to the senate be disqualified from any active duty, being of consequence exclusively confined to their duty of conservators; and who should have a considerable interest in its well performance, for it was M. Sieyès's intention that they should be liberally endowed.

Such was the distribution of the deliberative powers; and now of the mode of their formation.

The senate composed itself, electing its own members from the list of the national notability. Again, it appointed the members of the legislative body, of the tribunate, of the tribunal of appeal, choosing them by ballot from the same list of national notability.

The executive power was also the author of its own formation, choosing all its agents in that one of the three lists of notability etc responding to the functions for which it should be necessary to provide. It took the ministers, the councillors of state, in short all the superior agents, from the list of national notability. It took from the list of notability of departments, first of all, those councillors of departments, who, like the council of state, were considered as being purely administrative authorities. It took thence, moreover, the prefects and functionaries of that territorial definition. Lastly, it found in the list of notability of communes, the municipal councils, the mayors, and all the officers of the same rank.

Thus, as M. Sieyès desired to have it: "Confidence arose from beneath, power descended from aloft."

But in the same manner as there was a supreme creator above the legislative power, which was the senate, so must there be above the executive power a supreme creator, who should name the ministers, who were thereafter to name the subordinate functionaries, down to the last step of the scale. At the head of the executive power, therefore, there was to be an originating power. M. Sieyès had given to this officer a title analogous to his office, naming him the grand elector.—This supreme magistrate was limited to the performance of a single act. He was to choose two superior agents, alone in their rank and in the nature of their office; styled, one, the consul of peace, the other the consul of war. These should name the ministers, who, on their personal responsibility, should choose from the lists of notability all the agents of power; who should, in a word, govern, administer, and carry on the whole business of the state.

A magnificent existence was destined to the grand elector. He was the originating principle of the government, and was moreover its external representative. That inaction, to which, for the purpose of securing their impartiality, M. Sieyès had limited his senators, and which he had endowed with an annual income of one hundred thousand livres in the national domains—that inaction, I say, which, for a similar reason, he had imposed on the grand elector, was, in his case, yet more richly salaried than in that of the senators; since his function was to represent the whole republic. M. Sieyès proposed to assign to him an income of six millions, sumptuous habitations, such as the Tuileries in Paris, and Versailles in the country; and yet more, a guard of three thousand men. It was in his name that justice should be executed; that the laws should be promulgated, and the acts of government performed. It was to him that foreign ministers should be accredited; it was his signature that should invest the treaties between France and foreign powers with their binding character. In one word, he was destined to combine with the important duty of choosing the two active heads of the government, the brilliancy, vain as it may be called, of external representation. In him was to shine all the luxury of a polished, an elegant, a magnificent nation. Now, was this grand elector himself to be elective or hereditary? If the latter, he was a king, and monarchy would be re-established in France. But M. Sieyès, whether he wished this or not, dared not to propose it openly. It was necessary, therefore, to elect, by the most impartial body of the state, the senate, that supreme magistrate, who was raised to rank so sublime, only to render him as impartial as possible in the two choices which he was to perform.

A last and formidable disposition of power completed this complicated system.

The senate, which had the power of annulling every unconstitutional act, law, or measure of the government, received, in addition to this the power of tearing the grand elector from his office by naming him a senator in his own despite. This power M. Sieyès called absorption. And this power the senate could exercise on any citizen, whose talents or importance should be deemed perilous to the republic. By this plan, a recompense was given to the citizen thus compelled to inaction by absorption in the senate; the rich leisure, namely, and the importance attached to members of that body, which, unable to act itself, could yet, by its veto, paralyze and prevent the action of all others in the state.

In this singular, but profound conception, who cannot perceive a dim resemblance, perchance intentionally darkened, to a representative monarchy? The legislative body, the senate, the grand elector, were, in fact, a lower house, an upper house, and a king; the whole resting as a base on a species of universal suffrage; but the whole fabric loaded with so many precautions, that the elements of democracy, aristocracy, and royalty were admitted. It is true, into this constitution, but admitted only in order to be annulled. The lists of notability, from which all the deliberative bodies, and all the executive functionaries were to be derived, were in fact universal suffrage—universal, but null and void; for they composed so wide a range of fitness for office, that the obligation to choose within this circle was, in fact, an absolute liberty of choice, from the whole nation, granted to the government and senate. The mute legislative body, hearing the laws discussed, but unable itself to discuss them, having conjoined with it the tribunate, charged with the duty of discussion, and opposed therein to the council of state, was a sort of house of commons, cut in two, one half having the right of voting, the other of discussing measures, and both halves annulled, as it were, by the separation—since the former was exposed to the danger of falling asleep in silence, the latter to that of exhausting itself in fruitless agitation. The senate, nominating itself and all the deliberative bodies, naming the chief of the executive power, and, if need were, absorbing him in itself—the senate, all powerful thus far, yet deprived of all active duties, taking no part in legislation, limited in its scope to the breaking an unconstitutional enactment—the senate, reduced thus to a sort of inactivity, for the sake of keeping it disinterested, and animated only by a spirit of conservatism—the senate, I say, was but a learned, though exaggerated imitation of an aristocratic peerage, taking little part in the movement of business, sometimes arresting it by its veto, and receiving into its number those who, after a stirring career, come willingly to seek repose in the bosom of a grave, influential, honourable body. The grand elector, to conclude, was, in fact, royalty itself, reduced to a part of small action, yet still considerable, that, namely, of choosing the real heads of the government. It was royalty, hampered, however, by infinite precautions against its origin and duration, for it issued, as it were, from the senatorial room, and might be returned thither in emergency. In a word, this universal suffrage, this legislative body, this tribunate, this senate, this grand elector, so composed, so weakened, so neutralized, one by the other, bore evidence to a prodigious effort of human capacity, in the combination of all known forms of government, and in the abrogation of them all by dint of subsequent precautions.

It must be confessed that representative monarchy, with less pains and slighter effort, by confiding more fully in human nature, has, for two centuries, given a lively yet not destructive freedom to one of the first nations in the world. Simple and natural in its method, the British constitution admits royalty, aristocracy, democracy; then, having admitted them, it leaves them free to act, imposing on them no condition, but that they shall act and rule in concord. It does not limit the king to this prerogative or to that; it does not create him by election to nullify him, when created, by the same. It does not interdict active functions to the peerage. It does not prohibit the right of speech to the elective assembly. It does not grant universal suffrage, in order to abrogate it, by rendering it indirect. It leaves royalty and aristocracy to spring from their natural source, hereditary descent. It admits a king; it admits an hereditary peerage; but on the other hand it gives the nation the right of designating directly, according to its pleasure or passion of the moment, an assembly, owning the sole right of granting or withholding the supplies, without which royalty cannot rule; and, therefore capable of compelling it to select, as the actual directors of the government, men who have gained the confidence of the public.

All that the legislator Sieyès aimed at effecting, is here almost infallibly accomplished. Royalty, aristocracy, have no farther power, than he desired that they should have; they merely check too sudden or too violent impulses of the popular will. The elective assembly, full of the passions of the people, but restrained by two other powers, in reality chooses the true chiefs of the state, gives them the government, upholds them in it, or expels them from it, if they cease to fulfil its expectations. This is a true and simple constitution, because it is the offspring of nature and of time; not, like that of M. Sieyès, the learned but artificial scheme of a mind disgusted with monarchy by the last Bourbon reigns, and terrified of republics, by ten years of storm and strife.

Now, then, let us imagine calmer times, let us imagine this constitution of M. Sieyès put peaceably into action at a period when the necessity for a powerful hand, like that of General Bonaparte, at the helm, should not have overruled all other considerations. Let us imagine this vast notability established, this senate freely drawing from it the bodies of the state, and the heads of the government, what would have been the consequence?

Ere long the nation would have felt no interest in the renovation of those lists, which were, in fact, but a powerless method of expressing its wishes. Those lists would have become nearly permanent. The senate would have chosen thence, at its own will, the bodies of the state, and the grand elector; and having the power of nominating the executive chief, or of abrogating his office at any moment, holding him thus in absolute dependence. The senate would have become nearly all in all—It would have become, what? A Venetian aristocracy, with its book of gold, its pompous and powerless doge, whose only privilege was that of annually espousing the Adriatic sea. Most curious spectacle, and worthy of deep meditation!—M. Sieyès, a deep and lofty spirit, sincerely attached to the liberty of his country, had run through, in the last ten years, that circle of agitations, terrors, and disgusts, which had brought down most of the republics of the middle ages, and the most celebrated of them all, Venice, to a golden book, and a nominal chief magistrate. He had come, therefore, to the choice of a Venetian aristocracy, constituted for the benefit of the men of the Revolution; for during ten years he limited the privilege of figuring on the lists of notability to those who had held office of some kind since 1789; and he desired, moreover, to reserve to himself and three or four distinguished persons of the day, the right of nominating, for the first time, the members of all the different bodies of the state.

But aristocracies cannot be made at a moment's notice. It is despotism only that can be so created. Society, harassed as it then was, could repose only in the arms of one puissant individual. All was about to be approved, all to be received, of this extraordinary constitution, with the exception of the grand elector, richly endowed, and apparently powerless. He was to be replaced by an active and energetic head; and, a single spring only altered, the complicated machine of the constitution would, without any acquiescence of its author, be changed into that imperial sway which we have seen for fifteen years, governing France, with a conservative senate, and a mute legislature, in a manner glorious indeed, but not for that the less despotical.

When M. Sieyès, by a great personal effort, had succeeded in drawing out, from the depths of his mind, all these combinations, which had remained buried as it were there for so long a time, he exposed them to his friend, M. Boulay de la Meurthe, who committed them to writing, and to different members of the two legislative assemblies who spread them around on all sides. The two legislative commissions had divided themselves into sections, and in each of the two was found a section of the constitution. It was to these two actions combined that M. Sieyès, when he could make himself master of his own thoughts, offered his system. It seized at once all spirits by the novelty, the singularity, the infinite art of its combinations.

At first, the interests of M. Sieyès's auditors were perfectly well satisfied, for he had, as I have just shown, adopted a temporary disposition, which was entirely necessary.

With the avowed object of saving the Revolution, by upholding the power of the men who had brought it about, he proposed a resolution, nearly similar to that by which the convention had perpetuated itself in the two councils of the Ancients and the Five Hundred. He desired, moreover, that all the men who, since the year 1789, had performed any public duties, who had been members of the different assemblies, whether of the legislature, the departments, or the municipalities, should be borne of right on the lists of notability, and that these lists should not be remodelled within the space of ten years. Moreover, Messrs. Sieyès and Roger-Ducos, and General Bonaparte, were to select, for the first time, the individuals of the bodies of state, according to the right which they gave to themselves in making the new constitution. But it is worthy of remark, that all the new men who were returned at the elections, animated by the spirit of reaction, which at that time was general, and yielding to the common habit of blaming whatsoever they had not themselves a hand in doing, expressed openly their hatred to the measures and the men of the Revolution, even while they united in its principles. M. Sieyès, then, had taken his precautions against the necessity of a second 18th Fructidor, by securing the practical operation of his constitution in hands of which he felt sure. The ideas of M. Sieyès seemed to be such as would prove satisfactory to all interests. Already every one thought himself sure of being a senator, a legislator, a state councillor, or a tribune, and all these offices were richly salaried. Interested motives apart, the combinations seemed, moreover, to be as able as they were new. Men are easily moved to enthusiasm in behalf of military genius—but are moved quite as easily by any thing which bears the stamp of intellectual depth. Sieyès, the legislator, had his own, as Bonaparte, the general, his own enthusiasts. The lists of notability appeared the happiest of combinations, especially in the state of discredit into which the elective system had fallen, since the elections which had returned the Clichéens,¹ excluded by the revolution of Fructidor, and the Jacobins, excluded by means of the Scissions.² The council of state and the tribunate, pleading the one in the affirmative and the other in the negative before a mute body of legislature, pleased those minds which, weary of discussion, urgently sought for repose. The senate, placed so loftily, and with an office so useful to the maintenance of the general good, and capable of ostracizing citizens, too eminent or too dangerous for the state, had also numerous admirers.

The grand elector, alone, appeared an absurdity to men who, not having considered the English constitution deeply, could not comprehend the object of having a magistrate limited to the single duty of choosing the superior agents of the government. They thought the power too trifling for a king, and the show too great for the simple president of a republic. No one, in short, thought the place fitted for the person destined to hold it, that is to say, for General Bonaparte. The place had too much outward splendour, and too little real power. Too much outward splendour, because it was necessary to avoid alarming men's imaginations by rendering the return to monarchical principles evident. Too little real power, because it was necessary that a man, charged with the entire reorganization of all France, should have almost unlimited authority. Certain spirits, incapable of appreciating the disinterestedness of a deep thinker, who had only aimed at making his conceptions harmonize with each other, and who had never thought at all of framing a constitution with views of personal advantage—certain spirits, I say, affirmed that the office of grand elector could not have been invented for a character so active as that of General Bonaparte, and that from the beginning M. Sieyès could only have intended it for himself, destined to his young colleague the office of war consul. That was a base and malevolent conjecture. M. Sieyès united to great strength of imagination, a remarkable quickness of observation, and he esteemed too correctly his own personal position, and that of the conqueror of Italy, to believe, for one moment, that he could have been that elective king, if he might so be called, and Bonaparte no more than his minister. In all this, he had obeyed solely the spirit of system.

Other interpreters, less malevolent than these, believed, in their turn, that M. Sieyès, in fact, intended the place of grand elector for General Bonaparte, but with the intention of fettering his hands; and, above all, of speedily causing him to be absorbed in the conservative senate. For this, the friends of liberty bore him no ill-will. But the partisans of General Bonaparte could not speak of this invention of the grand elector without uttering loud outcries, and among these, Lucien Bonaparte,³—who has, by

¹ CLICHÉENS. The chief strength of the royalist party lay in the club of Cliché, which acquired as preponderating an influence at this epoch as that of the Jacobins had done at an earlier stage of the Revolution. Few among their number were in direct communication with the royalists, but they were all animated with hatred at the Jacobins, and an anxious desire to prevent their regaining their ascendancy in the government. May, 1797.—Alison, Hist. Eur.

² Thus fell the club of the Jacobins, the victim of the crimes it had sanctioned and the reaction it had produced. Within its walls all the great chances of the Revolution had been prepared, and all its principal scenes rehearsed. From its energy the triumph of the democracy had sprung, and from its atrocity its destruction arose: a signal proof of the tendency of revolutionary violence to precipitate its supporters into crime, and render them at last the victims of the atrocities which they have committed.—Alison, Hist. Eur.

³ LUCIEN BONAPARTE. Napoleon's second brother, born at Ajaccio in 1775. At fifteen he was taken to France by M. Semonville, who made him a zealous revolutionist and clubbist. In 1793, when Corsica was given up to the English by Paoli, he fled to Provence. In 1794 was appointed to the civil administration in the army of the Maritime Alps, and married Christine, the daughter of M. Boyer, innkeeper, at St. Maximin. In 1795 he was appointed commissary at war for the Belgic provinces. In 1797 he was nominated to the council of Five Hundred by the electors of the Liamone, his native dis-turns, served and injured the head of his family, but both capriciously, without consistency, without moderation, at one time playing the brother enraptured of his brother's glory, at another the citizen inveighing against despotism—Lucien, Bonaparte was the most violent declaimer against the project of M. Sieyès. He said aloud, that there should be a republican president, a council of state, and little more. That the country was weary of fools, and called for none but men of action. These inconsiderate propositions were of a nature to produce the worst results, but fortunately no one attached much weight to the words of Lucien.

General Bonaparte, even in the midst of his incessant labours, had heard the reports spread around him concerning the projects of M. Sieyès. He suffered his colleague to act his pleasure, in accordance with a kind of partnership in functions which had been agreed on between them, and he would not mix himself in the constitution, until the time should arrive when it would be his duty to digest it definitively, promising it to himself, that he would then arrange, to his own taste, the place destined for his own occupation. Notwithstanding this, the reports which harassed him on all sides, irritated him in the end, and he expressed his displeasure, with his customary vivacity of language—vivacity, much to be regretted, which he could not at all times control. The disapprobation which he expressed concerning some portions of the projected constitution even reached the ears of its author. M. Sieyès was deeply afflicted at this. He imagined, in fact, that after he had once lost, through the ignorance and violence of former times, the opportunity of becoming the legislator of France, he should again lose it through the despotical humour of the fellow-labourer whom he had given himself when he brought about the revolution of the 18th of Brumaire. Although wanting in intrigue and energy, he yet set himself strenuously to conquer, one by one, the members of the two legislative sections.

Nevertheless, his own friend, M. Boulay de la Meurthe, and two intimate acquaintances of General Bonaparte, Messrs. Rœderer and De Talleyrand, wishing to keep up good feeling between men so important, employed themselves actively in bringing them to terms. M. Boulay de la Meurthe had accepted the office of transcribing the ideas of M. Sieyès, and had become his confidant in the scheme. M. Rœderer was a former member of the Constituent Assembly, a man of intellect, a true publicist, after the fashion of the eighteenth century, much addicted to reasoning on the origin and organization of society, and to making projects for constitutions, combining with all this monarchical predilections of the strongest kind. M. de Talleyrand, endowed with the ability to comprehend and appreciate minds even the most opposite to his own, was equally observant of the active energetic genius of young Bonaparte, and of the speculative genius of the philosopher, Sieyès. He felt a lively inclination toward each of these. He believed farther, that the two men mutually stood in need each of the other's aid, and he felt a warm interest in bringing the affairs of the new government to a successful issue. Messrs. Boulay de la Meurthe, Rœderer, and De Talleyrand employed themselves, therefore, in reconciling the general and the legislator. An interview was appointed, which was to take place at General Bonaparte's house in the presence of Messrs. Rœderer and De Talleyrand. It was accomplished, but ended in nothing. General Bonaparte was under the influence of the reports which he had heard, concerning the functions of the grand elector, an inactive personage liable to absorption in the senate. M. Sieyès, on the contrary, was full of the disadvantageous expressions which had been attributed to the general, and which had doubtless been exaggerated. They came together, therefore, with unfavourable dispositions, displayed to one another their ill-feelings only, and addressed to one another the most cutting expressions. M. Sieyès, to whom it was indispensable to be calm in order to bring forth his ideas in their proper light, was unable at this time to explain them with the proper clearness and connection. General Bonaparte, on the other side, was rude and impatient. They behaved ill, each to the other, and parted almost enemies.

The conciliators, now alarmed, applied themselves to repair the ill-effects of the interview; they told M. Sieyès that he ought to have argued patiently, to have taken every pains to convince the general, and above all, to have made concessions. They told the general that more management was necessary than he appeared to imagine; that without the support of M. Sieyès, and his influence with the council of Ancients, he, General Bonaparte, would never have been able to obtain, on the 18th of Brumaire, that decree which had put power into his hand—that M. Sieyès, as a political character, had immense power over the minds of men; and that, in case of a conflict between the legislator and the general, many people would pronounce in favour of the legislator as the representative of revolution and liberty oppressed by the sword. The first moment was unfavourable to the effecting a reconciliapartment. In 1798 he argued for the toleration of Catholicism. In 1799 he strenuously opposed Jourdan's motion that the country was in danger, and combated the idea of a dictatorship. On Napoleon's return to France, he presided at all the private meetings preparatory to the revolution of the 18th Brumaire. On that celebrated day, he was president of the council of the Five Hundred, and it is to him that the success of this revolution, in the progress of which he displayed conduct, courage, and ready wit, may be chiefly ascribed. He was rewarded for these services by the office of minister of the interior. In this, though but twenty-five years old, he displayed much ability—Court and Camp of Napoleon.

Joseph, in any country, would have been the ornament of society; Lucien, in like wise, that of any political assembly.—Opinions of Napoleon.

I saw Prince Lucien, with good opportunities of judging his character after the return from Elba. It would have been difficult for any person to exhibit sounder or more striking political opinions; or a devotion more absolute, with better intentions.—Las Cases

He wrote a poem of 30,000 lines, called Charlemagne, of no merit at all. His unequal marriage probably operated, in as great a degree as his opposition to his brother's will on some points, to disqualify him for a crown.

non. A little time was requisite to that end. Messrs. Boulay de la Meurthe and Roderer endeavoured to contrive some new scheme for the executive power, which should remove the two points of difficulty on which Bonaparte seemed to be inflexible—the inactivity of the grand elector, and the threat of ostracism suspended over his head. At first they thought of a consul, assisted by two colleagues, who should sit with him—then of a grand elector, similar to the officer of M. Sieyès, who should name the two consuls of peace and war, preside at their deliberations, and hold the casting vote.

This was not enough to satisfy General Bonaparte, and too much by far for M. Sieyès, whose whole scheme of government it would have subverted. Every time that it was proposed to M. Sieyès to give the chief of the executive power a direct participation in the government, he replied, "It is our ancient monarchy which you wish me to re-establish, and I will none of it."

He would in fact admit only the royalty of the British constitution, and that shorn of the royal title, the perpetuity of office, and the hereditary succession. They were completely at issue; and M. Sieyès, with that proneness to be discouraged, which is peculiar to speculative temperaments, when they encounter obstacles opposed to them by the nature of things, said that he would give up the whole, leave Paris, retire to the country, and leave young Bonaparte, revealed to the eyes of all men, alone, in his newborn despotism.

"He wishes to go," said the general. "Let him go! I will cause a constitution to be digested by Roderer; I will propose it to the two legislative sections, and thus satisfy public opinion, which asks urgently for a settlement of the matter." He was in error, when he spoke thus; for it was yet too early to show France his sword thoroughly unsheathed. He would have met resistance of which he little dreamed.

Nevertheless, these two men who, despite their instinctive distrust, had succeeded in coming to a mutual understanding for a moment, in order to effect the revolution of the 18th of Brumaire, were destined again to come together for the formation of a constitution. The rumours which had gained circulation aroused the legislative commissions. They knew what expressions Lucien Bonaparte had uttered, how decided a tone the general took in all the matter, how greatly M. Sieyès felt disposed to abandon the whole project. They said, therefore, among themselves, and with much show of reason, that it was themselves, in the end, to whom the care of selecting a constitution was especially entrusted; that it was for them to fulfil their duty, to digest a project, to present it to the consuls, and to compel them forcibly to an agreement, after having endeavoured to bring about a reasonable understanding between them.

They set themselves to work, therefore; and as several of the members who composed them had received some of his ideas from M. Sieyès, and appreciated them, they adopted his plan as the base of their operations. With regard to the spirit of his system, the adoption of all his ideas, save one only, would have annoyed him as deeply as the rejection of the whole. It was, however, an important point that the project of M. Sieyès should be adopted as the base of the new constitution. Wherefore, in the end, he became somewhat better satisfied; and General Bonaparte, seeing that the sections had possessed themselves of their proper functions and were discharging them resolutely, moderated his conduct very sensibly. This moment was seized to bring about a new conciliation. There was a second interview between M. Sieyès and the general, in the presence of Messrs. Boulay de la Meurthe, Roderer, and De Talleyrand. This time the two principal speakers were calmer and better disposed to listen to each other. Instead of rushing to a shock, as the first time, by showing their ill feelings as of preference, they endeavoured, on the contrary, to come to terms, by showing the coincident points of their opinions. M. Sieyès was moderate and full of tact; the general displayed his customary good sense and originality of thought. The matter under discussion was the state of France, the vices in preceding constitutions, and the precautions necessary to be taken, in the formation of a new one, for the prevention of the past disorders. On all these matters they naturally agreed. They parted then, well satisfied with each other, and with mutual promises that, when the sections should have completed their work, they would assemble them in order to adopt or modify their propositions, and at length get rid of the provisional government with which the world was growing dissatisfied. M. Sieyès henceforth was well convinced that, with the exception of his grand elector, and some attributes of his conservative senate, his constitution would be adopted entire.

In the first ten days of Frimaire—from the 20th of November to the 1st of December—the sections completed their labours. General Bonaparte invited them to his house, to form meetings at which the consuls should be present. Some members of the sections looked upon that summons as little conformable to their dignity; and yet, deciding that it was their business to get rid of difficulties and to concede much to a man who was so necessary to them, went to his house.

The sessions commenced instantly. At the first, M. Sieyès was called upon to disclose his project, since this project was the base of the labours of the sections. He opened it with a power of thought and language which produced the liveliest impression on all present. "All this is very fine, and very profound," said the general. "Nevertheless there are several points which require a serious discussion. But let us proceed in order. Let us deal with each portion of the project necessarily and in its place, and let us choose a secretary. Citizen Daunou,¹ take the pen."—M. Daunou became thus the secretary and author of the new constitution. This labour lasted during several sittings, and the following dispositions were resolved upon.

¹ DAUNOU was born at Boulogne. In 1791, member of the Oratorical Society, grand vicar to the constitutional bishop of the Pas-de-Calais. Sent to the convention in 1792. On the trial of Louis XVI. voted for his confinement.

The lists of notability of the communes, the departments, and the nation, were successively adopted. These reduced the popular action so completely, by rendering it indirect, that they could not fail to be agreeable both to the apprehensions of the moment, and to the tastes of General Bonaparte. Two accessory dispositions, the one agreeable, the other contrary to the ideas of M. Sieyès, were adopted. It was determined that the functionaries of all ranks should not be necessarily chosen from the lists of notability, until the constitution should have designated them by name. That they should choose from them, in fact, the members of the deliberative bodies, the consuls, ministers, judges, administrators, was extremely well; but for generals and ambassadors—that appeared indeed extravagant. On this point, all parties were agreed. The second disposition related, not to the base of the project, but to the necessity which existed for adapting it to the present state of things. Instead of delaying the remodelling of the lists until the expiration of ten years, it was to be deferred to the year IX, that is, to the end of the one year. And it was added that all the individuals of the great bodies of the state should be named forthwith, by an act of the constituent power, and that the individuals thus named should be borne as of right on the first lists. The revision, instead of being annual, should be triennial.

Hence they passed to the organization of the great powers. The maxim of M. de Sieyès, "Confidence must arise from beneath, and power descend from aloft," prevailed from the first to the last. It was aloft that the right of selection was placed, but with the obligation of selecting out of the lists of notability. The senate of M. de Sieyès was adopted, as well as his legislative body, placed between the council of state and the tribunate. The senate had the power of choosing from the lists of notability; first, the senators themselves, then the members of the legislative body, of the tribunate, of the tribunal of cassation, of the commission of accounts—since called the court of accounts—and, to conclude, the chief or chiefs of the executive power. Nevertheless, and this was a considerable reduction of their power, it was determined that the senate should name no senator save on the presentation of three candidates, one designated by the consuls, the second by the legislative body, and the third by the tribunate. As to the council of state, that body, forming a part of the executive power, should, it was resolved, be nominated by that power itself. Independently of the right to make the most important nominations, the senate also received the supreme attribute of breaking all laws or acts of the government which it should deem unconstitutional. It should, on the contrary, have no part in the making of laws, nor should its members exercise any active function.

The legislative body, mute as M. Sieyès proposed that it should be, should hear three councillors of state, and afterward three tribunes argue on opposite sides, and should then vote, without debate, on the proposals of the government.

The tribunate alone should have the privilege of debating publicly on the laws, but it should only vote, in order to determine which side it should take when pleading before the legislative body. Its vote, though it were negative, should not prevent the enactment of the law, if adopted by the legislative body. The tribunate should not have the origination of legal propositions, but might propound its wishes. It might receive petitions, and send them up to the different authorities which they should concern.

The senate should be composed of 80 members, instead of 100, as M. Sieyès had at first desired. Of these, 60 should be named forthwith, 20 in the ten years next ensuing. The legislative body was to be composed of 300 members; the tribunate, of 100. The senators were to have 25,000 francs of annual salary; the legislators 10,000f.; the tribunes 15,000f. Up to this point, the project of M. Sieyès was adopted entire, except that a few reductions had been made in the authority of the senate. But his plan was now to undergo a considerable alteration in the organization of the executive power.

This was the capital point, and that on which General Bonaparte was inflexible. M. Sieyès, already resigned to the idea that this part of his plan would be set aside, was still requested to state his views. He proposed, therefore, in presence of the united commissions, the institution of the grand elector. No one, it must be admitted, not even General Bonaparte, had at that time reflected sufficiently on the organization of the executive power under a free government, to be able to comprehend the depth of this conception, or to seize the analogy which it presented to the king of the English monarchy. But General Bonaparte, had his mind even discovered this analogy in the question, would not have accepted it on any terms, from motives entirely personal, and easy enough to be comprehended. He strenuously criticised this grand elector. He said concerning his richly-endowed indolence, that which all kings say, only with less intelligence and with less foundation than he; for in the face of a disordered society to be reorganized, of sanguinary factions to be subjected to authority, of a world to be conquered, it is natural enough that he should have wished to reserve all the labour ment during the war, and his banishment on the restoration of peace. Was proscribed with the Girondins. Re-admitted to the Convention in 1791, and elected secretary soon after. In 1795, he was appointed a commissioner to organize the laws of the constitution of 1793. Member and president of the Council of Five Hundred. In 1798, he was intrusted with the organization of the Roman republic. In the same year delivered the solemn discourse on the foundation of the republic. Was an active promoter of the revolution of the 18th Brumaire, and was rewarded for his services therein by being appointed one of the commissioners to organize the new constitution. Biographie Moderne and honour to his own genius. But if in those early days of his consulate, when it appeared that there was so much to be accomplished, he was, perhaps, wise in refusing to permit his talents to be fettered, he must at a later day, in the sublimity of his misfortunes at St. Helena, have regretted that so much liberty was given him to exercise them beyond measure. Restricted in the employment of his faculties, he could not, it is true, have performed deeds so mighty; but then he would have attempted none so extravagant. And, it is probable, that the sceptre and the sword would have remained, until death, in his glorious hands.

"Your grand elector," said he to M. Sieyès, "is a pageant king, and the day for pageant kings has passed away. Where is the man of intellect and heart who, for an income of six millions and a lodging in the Tuileries, would endure such a life of useless idleness? What! nominate men who shall act, and not act himself!—absurd! And again, do you imagine that you can compel your grand elector by these means to take no share in the government? If I were that grand elector, be very sure that I would easily effect all that, which you desire that I should not. I would say to the two Consuls of Peace and of War, if you do not appoint such a man, or if you do not adopt such a measure, I dismiss you. And so I would oblige them to walk according to my will. I would become the master by a stratagem."

Here General Bonaparte himself, with his wonted sagacity, fell into the truth; and admitted that the inaction of the grand elector was not in truth a state of nullity. For this supreme magistrate possessed, in certain moments, the means of rendering himself all powerful on the arena whereon the various parties were struggling for the mastery, by withdrawing the power from these, to confer it upon those. But this high superintendence, possessed by the royalty of England over the government—reduced, in fact, to the power of casting into the scales of contending ambition the preponderating weight of its decisive will—was not suited to that young and ardent man. And he must be pardoned therefor, since it was neither the time nor the place for constitutional royalty.

The grand elector perished under the sarcasm of the young general, and under an influence far greater than that of any sarcasm—the potency of present necessity. The truth is, that an absolute dictatorship was at that moment requisite; and the authority bestowed on the grand elector was far from meeting the emergencies of the case.

There was another point in the institutions proposed by M. Sieyès, which General Bonaparte rejected as strenuously as this, because he saw in it a stratagem aimed against himself. It was the power granted to the senate of absorbing in itself not the grand elector only, but any distinguished citizen, at whose greatness it might choose to take umbrage.

The general would not that the power should exist which, after years of eminent service, might bury him alive in the senate, and reduce him to a forced inaction, recompensed by a salary of twenty-five thousand francs. He was satisfied on this score, likewise. And this was the organization of the executive power which was definitively adopted.

A first consul was created, accompanied by two others, to conceal, in some degree, the absolute power of the first. This first consul had the direct and sole nomination of the members of the general administration of the republic; of the members of all the councils, whether of communes, departments, or municipalities; of the administrators since styled prefects and sub-prefects, of the municipal agents, &c. He had the nomination of all officers of the army and marine; of the foreign ministers, of all the civil and criminal judges, with the exception of the judges of peace, and the members of the court of cassation. He could not displace judges once nominated. Perpetuity of office was substituted to election as a guaranty of independence for these.

Beside the nomination of all individuals in the administration, the army, and the judiciary, the first consul had the whole government in his hands; the direction of war and of diplomacy. He signed all treaties, except that they were subject to the discussion and adoption of the legislative bodies, in the same mode as the laws. In these different functions he was to be assisted by two other consuls, who had a voice in consultation only, but who might enter their opinions in a register of deliberations kept for that purpose. These two consuls were evidently appointed merely for the purpose of diverting attention from the immense authority conferred on General Bonaparte—an authority which was already very long, and might well become perpetual; for the three consuls were chosen for ten years, and were indefinitely re-eligible to office.

Something was still retained of M. Sieyès's absorption. The first consul, quitting his office, whether by dismissal or otherwise, became a senator ex officio, or in other words, was excluded in future from the performance of public functions.

The two other consuls, not having exercised this plenary power, were free from the compulsory acceptance of this opulent annihilation, and did not become senators without their own consent. The first consul was endowed with a revenue of 500,000 francs, each of the others with 300,000. All three were entitled to lodgings in the Tuileries, and a consular guard of honour was assigned to them.

Such were the principal dispositions of the celebrated constitution of the year VIII. M. Sieyès thus saw the authority of his senate diminished, and an all-powerful chief substituted for his powerless grand elector—changes, which caused this constitution to give way at a later day, not to an aristocracy, but to a despotism.

This constitution contained no declaration of rights; but by means of certain general dispositions it assured individual liberty, the inviolability of the citizens' dwellings, the responsibility of ministers, and of all inferior agents, excepting, in the case of the latter, that the prosecutions must be previously approved by the council of state. It provided that a law might, in certain departments and in certain extraordinary cases, suspend the action of the constitution, corresponding to that which we have since termed the declaration of a state of siege. It secured pensions to the widows and children of military men; and then returning, as it were, to ideas proscribed long ago, it set up as a principle, that national rewards might be granted to men who should perform eminent services. This was the germ of an institution, which has since that time become famous, the Legion of Honour.

The project of M. Sieyès contained two fine and powerful ideas, both of which have been retained in our administrative organization—the territorial circumscription of arrondissements, and the councils of state.

M. Sieyès ought, therefore, to be held the author of all the administrative circumscriptions of France. He had already devised and procured the adoption of its division into departments. He procured, on this occasion, that administrations of arrondissements should be substituted, as a far less numerous and a far more convenient medium between the commune and department, to those of the cantons, which numbered five thousand. The principle of this only was laid down in the constitution; but it was determined that ere long a law on this principle should reform the system of French administration, and put an end to the anarchy of the communes, of which a lamentable picture has already been presented to the reader. There was to be appointed a tribunal of the first instance in every arrondissement, and a tribunal of appeal in several departments combined.

The second of the creations of M. Sieyès, which belongs to him as his own, is the council of state, a deliberative body attached to the executive power, preparing laws, upholding them in presence of the legislative power, adding to them the standing orders which should accompany all laws, and rendering justice administrative. This is the most practical of all his conceptions, and it deserves, with the preceding, to survive the present age, and to exist in far futurity. Let us say so much to the honour of the legislator. Time has swept away all the ephemeral constitutions of the republic; but the only parts of those constitutions which have survived were his work. All was not finished when the dispositions of the new constitution were determined. It was indispensable to add to these the individual representatives of these powers, to find them in men of the Revolution, and to designate them in the body of the constitutional enactment. It was necessary, then, after all the dispositions, which have been enumerated, were digested, it was necessary, I say, to turn to the choice of individuals.

General Bonaparte was nominated First Consul for ten years. It would not be correct to say that he was chosen, so much was he indicated by his position. He was received, rather, from the hands of victory and necessity. His situation once fixed, it was next desirable to find a position for M. Sieyès. This great person loved business little, and secondary parts yet less. It was not fitting that he should be the assistant of the youthful Bonaparte, and he refused in consequence to be the second consul. It will soon appear what place, more conformable to his character, was assigned to him. M. Cambacères,¹ an eminent lawyer, who had acquired great importance among the political persons of the time, by much learning, tact, and prudence, was chosen second consul. He was at this moment minister of justice. M. Lebrun,¹ a distinguished writer, who had formerly digested the Maupeou edicts, esteemed, under the ancient regime, one of those men disposed to wise reforms, yet always faithful to the cause of moderate revolution, very well informed on matters of finance, and too gentle to be violently contradictory—M. Lebrun was named third consul. M. Cambacères could assist General Bonaparte in the administration of justice; M. Lebrun could second him admirably in that of finance; and both could aid him much without giving him any inconvenience. It was impossible to have associated men together who were better calculated to compose the new government; and from the choice of these naturally flowed all the rest, in the organization of the executive power.

The next step was to proceed to the composition of the deliberative bodies. And here was readily discovered the part naturally suited to M. Sieyès. It had been inserted as a written clause in the constitution, that the senate should select all the members of the deliberative assemblies. But it remained to be determined, who should compose the senate, for the first time. It was resolved by an especial article of the constitution, that Messrs. Sieyès and Roger-Ducos, who would now cease to be consuls, united with Messrs. Cambacères and Lebrun, who were about to become consuls, should nominate the absolute majority of the senate—that is, 31 members out of the 60. The 31 senators thus elected were then to choose by ballot the 29 other senators remaining to be appointed. And the senate, once completed, was entitled to fill up the legislative body, the tribunate, and the tribunal of cassation.

By means of these different combinations, General Bonaparte found himself the chief of the executive power; but a sort of prudence was observed, at the same time, in excluding him from the composition of the deliberative bodies destined to control his actions. This case was committed more particularly to the Legislator of France, to M. Sieyès, whose active part was henceforth finished, and to whom the presidency of the senate was secured as a retreat from business. The positions of all parties were thus properly assigned, and appearances saved thereby.

¹ The emperor said that in Cambacères and Lebrun he had chosen two men of merit, two distinguished persons, both wise, moderate, capable, but of dispositions precisely opposite.

The former was the defender of abuses, of prejudices.

of ancient institutions, of a return to hereditary honours, distinctions, &c. The latter, cold, severe, insensible, striving against all these things, yielding to them without illusion, and naturally falling into Ideology.—Opinion of Napoleon, Las Cases.

It was now decided that the constitution should be submitted to the vote of the whole nation, by means of registers opened in the offices of the mayors, justices of peace, and notaries, and in the courts of record of the several tribunals; and that until the acceptance should be received, concerning which no one appeared to entertain any doubts, the First Consul, the two quitting, and the two entering office, should proceed to the various duties with which they were charged, in order that, on the first of Nivose, the great powers of the state should be constituted, and ready to put the new constitution into practice. This was indispensable, in order that the dictatorship of the Provisional Consuls, at which some spirits began to take umbrage, should be brought to a close; and that the general impatience of all parties, to have at length a definitive government, should be satisfied. For, in a word, every one ardently desired a just and stable government, which should assure strength and unity of power, without strangling liberty; and under which all honest and capable men, of all ranks, and of all parties, might find their proper place. These wishes, it must be admitted, might possibly have been gratified under the constitution of the year VIII. It would, indeed, have satisfied them completely, but for the violence to which an extraordinary genius subjected it at a later date; a genius, which, for the rest, favoured as it was by circumstance, would have easily overcome stronger barriers than could have been opposed to it by the legislative handiwork of M. Sieyès, or any other that could at that time have been imagined.

The constitution, adopted during the night of the 12th and 13th of December—21st and 22d of Frimaire—was promulgated on the 15th of December, 1799—24th Frimaire of the year VIII—to the great satisfaction of its authors and of the public also.

It charmed all spirits by the novelty of its ideas, and the cleverness of its devices. Every one reposed hopes in it, and in the men who were about to put it into execution.

It was preceded by this preamble.

"Citizens, a constitution is offered to you.

"It brings to a close the uncertainties which the provisional government caused in our foreign relations, in the domestic and military condition of the republic.

"It places, in the institutions which it has established, the first magistrates whose devotion appears necessary to its activity.

"The constitution is founded on the true principles of representative government, on the sacred rights of property, equality, and liberty.

"The powers which it institutes, will be strong and stable; such as they ought to be in order to guaranty the rights of the citizens, and the interests of the state.

"Citizens, the Revolution is settled on the very principles with which it began. It is ended."

Two men, such as General Bonaparte and M. Sieyès, crying out, in 1800, the Revolution is ended! How singular a proof of the illusions of the human spirit! Nevertheless, it must be admitted that something was then ended—that something was anarchy!

With all those, who had put their hands to this work, the joy at seeing it completed was great. Some of the ideas of M. Sieyès had been rejected, but his constitution had, nevertheless, been accepted almost entire, and, unless by a power absolute as that of Solon, Lycurgus, or Mahomet—a power which no man could obtain in our era of doubt and distrust, wherein all confidence in individuals is destroyed—it was scarce possible for one person to transfuse a larger portion of his own thoughts into the constitution of a great people. And such as it was, if the conqueror of Marengo had not introduced into it at a later period two considerable changes, the hereditary imperial sway added, and the tribunate subtracted, this constitution might have shown forth a career, other than the triumph of absolute power. M. Sieyès, after having placed in the hands of General Bonaparte the sword which had served to overturn the Directory, and after having made a constitution, was about to deliver France over to the devouring activity of the young Consul, and to withdraw himself into that meditative inaction which he preferred to the anxious turmoil of business.

The new First Consul now wished to give to the legislator of France a testimonial of national gratitude. He caused a proposition to be made to the legislative commissioners to vote him the estate of Crosne as an honorary gift. This gift was voted and announced to M. Sieyès with the noblest expressions of public gratitude; and M. Sieyès accepted it with lively satisfaction, for, notwithstanding his unimpeachable probity, he was sensible of the enjoyments of a large fortune, and he could not but be touched by the delicate and elevated forms with which this national recompense was voted to him.

After this, every thing was so arranged that the constitution should be put in force in the first days of January, 1800—Nivose of the year VIII—or, in other words, in the first days of the last year of that eventful century.

BOOK II.

INTERNAL ADMINISTRATION.

Definitive Constitution of the Consular Government—Composition of the Senate, of the Legislative Body, of the Tribunal, and of the Council of State—Declaration of the First Consul to the European Powers—Public offers of Peace to England and Austria—Proclamation addressed to La Vendée—Opening of the First Session—Symptoms of Opposition in the Tribunal—Speeches of the Tribunes Duveyrier and Benjamin Constant—A considerable majority adopts the Project of the Consuls—Numerous Laws of Organization—Institution of Prefectures and Sub-prefectures—Creation of Tribunals of the First Instance, and of Appeal—Closing of the List of Emigrants—Re-establishment of the Right of making Wills—Law of Receipts and Expenditures—Banque of France—Consequences of the Negotiations with Europe—Refusal of England to listen to Propositions of Peace—Warm discussion on the subject in the British Parliament—Austria returns a gentler, but no less positive, refusal than England—Necessity of re-commencing Hostilities—Unable to reconcile the belligerent Powers, the First Consul tries to attach Prussia to himself, and explains himself to her frankly—He sets him strenuously to terminate the war with La Vendée before opening the Campaign of 1800—Position of Parties in La Vendée—Conduct of the Abbé Bernier—Peace of Montfaucon—Messrs. d'Autichamp, de Châtillon, de Bourmont, Georges Cadoudal go to Paris, and visit the First Consul—M. de Frotté is shot—Final Submission of La Vendée—The Troops are marched to the Frontier—Peaceable Termination of the Session of the Year VIII—Police Regulation touching the Press—Funeral Ceremony on the Occasion of the Death of Washington—The First Consul takes up his residence in the Palace of the Tuilleries.

THE Fourth of Nivose, in the year VIII—25th December, 1799—was the day fixed for the entrance of the consuls on their duties, and for the first assembling of the conservative senate. Numerous nominations must be made previously to that moment, for it was necessary to constitute at once the executive power and the senate, before either of them could act.

General Bonaparte, who was charged with the nomination of the executive power; Messrs. Sieyès, Roger-Ducos, Cambacérès, and Lebrun, charged with the selection of the senators, who were, in their turn, to appoint the legislative body, and the tribunal, were besieged by innumerable solicitations of all kinds. It was the object, indeed, of the petitioners to obtain the office of senators, of members of the legislative body, of tribunes, of councillors of state, of prefects; and, in truth, these high offices, all distributed at once, all amply endowed, had much wherewith to tempt ambition.

Many ardent revolutionists, enemies of the 18th Brumaire, were already much appeased in their opposition. Many of those doubters, who decide only after success has clearly declared itself on one side, began to speak aloud. There was at that time, as indeed there always is, an expression current, which perfectly described the state of men's minds. It was necessary, men said, to show themselves. It was necessary to show that, far from wishing to create obstacles to the new government, they were ready to help it to conquer those who beset it. The whole of which amounted to this—that they were desirous of attracting to themselves the attention of the five persons who composed it, and who were intrusted with all the nominations. There were even petitioners who, in order to obtain admission to the tribunal, promised absolute devotion to the consular government; though, at the same time, they were firmly resolved beforehand to give it their strongest opposition.

When, in revolutions, the fire of passion begins to subside, it is always the case that avidity succeeds to violence, and from terror men pass suddenly to disgust. If acts of exalted virtue, if deeds of heroism did not occur to conceal by their splendour all the sad details; and, above all, if the vast and beneficial results, which social revolutions procured for nations, did not compensate the present evil by the immensity of future good, it would be necessary to turn away our eyes from the spectacle such revolutions offer to the world. But they are the test to which Providence subjects human societies in order to their regeneration. And we ought, therefore, to observe carefully, and, if we can, profitably, their picture, by turns so repulsive and so sublime.

It seems that the stir among all ambitious men was so marked as to strike the editors, and to occupy their pens. Even the Moniteur, which was not at that time the official journal, but which became so a few days afterward—on the 7th of Nivose—judged it expedient to wither this baseness in the bud.

"Since the constitution," it said, "has created a quantity of places richly endowed, how many persons are there not in motion! How many faces, little known, in haste to show themselves! How many long-forgotten names, stirring again beneath the dust of the Revolution! How many proud republicans, of the year VIII, diminishing themselves in order to creep into the notice of the powerful man who can give them place! How many Brutuses begging office! How many petty talents magnified! How many slender services exaggerated! How many bloody stains disguised! This astounding change of scene has occurred in a moment. Let us hope that the hero of liberty, he who has yet borne no stamp in the Revolution but of benefits conferred, will see these manœuvres with the disgust which they must inspire to every elevated soul; and that he will not suffer a crowd of obscure or dishonoured names to enwrap themselves in the splendour of his glory."—Moniteur of the 3d of Nivose.

Let us, however, draw our picture justly, omitting neither the good nor the evil; and do not let us imagine that this view was that of the whole nation. If there were men who debased themselves, and others, who, without debasing, bestirred themselves at least, some, on the contrary, awaited with dignity the call which the government was sure to make on their enlightenment and zeal. If M. Constant, for instance, solicited his admission to the tribunate with great urgency and many professions of devotion to the family of Bonaparte, Messrs. De Tracy,¹ Volney,² Monge,³ Carnot,⁴ Ginguéné,⁵ and Ducis,⁶ solicited nothing, and left the care of comprising them in this vast distribution of public offices to the free-will of the constituent power.

¹ BENJAMIN DE CONSTANT DE RESECQUE, born in Lausanne in 1767, and one of the most distinguished orators and authors of the French Revolution, was the son of a general in the Dutch service. Was educated at

On the 24th of December—the 3d of Nivose—the new consuls met, in order to proceed to the composition of the council of state, and thus to place themselves in a position to install the government, on the 25th of December—the 4th of Nivose. Messrs. Sieyès and Roger-Ducos, the consuls retiring, and Messrs. Cambacérés and Lebrun, the consuls entering into office, repaired afterward to the Luxembourg in order to nominate the half of the senate, with the addition of one, in order that the senate might also assemble on the following day, complete itself, and proceed to the composition of the great deliberating bodies. The council of state was divided into five sections. The first of finance, the second of civil and criminal legislation, the third of war, the fourth of the marine, the fifth of the interior. Every section was to have a councillor of state as presiding officer, the whole council to have the First Consul, or in his absence one or the other of his colleagues, Cambacérés or Lebrun, as president.

Every section was charged with digesting the projects of the law, or the regulations relative to the business it was competent to perform. These projects and regulations were destined afterward to be debated in general assembly of all the sections combined. The council of state was charged, moreover, to pronounce on all debatable points of the administration, and to decide all questions of competency, whether between the civil tribunals and the administration, or between the tribunals themselves. These are the privileges which it enjoys to this very day. But it had then the obligatory duty of digesting laws, and the exclusive right of discussing them before the legislative body, and, farther yet, the cognisance of great questions of government, and sometimes even of foreign politics; as will appear from certain examples to be adduced hereafter. The council of state was then, at this epoch, not only a council of administration, but an actual council of government.

Some members of this body were, moreover, charged, in different capacities, with certain special powers of administration, to which it was desired to attach greater importance, or to ensure more particular care. Such were public instruction, the treasury, the state domains, the colonies, and the public works. The councillors of state, charged with the direction of these different parties, were placed under the authority of the competent minister. The members of the council of state, largely endowed, were destined to receive each twenty five thousand francs as salary, and the presidents thirty-five thousand. Such sums, as it is well known, were at that time far greater than they now are, in proportion. Places in the council of state were coveted far more than places in the senate, for with the same salary and equal consideration, the councillors of state were admitted, as much as the ministers themselves, to the management of the most important affairs.

The principal members of this great body were, in the section of war, Messrs. Lacuée,⁷ Brune,⁸ and Marmont.⁹ In the section of the Brunswick and studied the law. At the period of the Revolution, went to Paris, and, with equal courage and sternness of purpose, opposed both anarchy and despotism. In 1797, he distinguished himself much by his oratory, was elected to the office of tribune. He was one of the principal causes of the appointment of De Talleyrand to the foreign office. His boldness of speech and writing rendered him odious to the First Consul, who turned him out of office in 1802.—Encyclopædia Americana. H.

² TRACY, DESTUTT DE, a consistent liberal, and friend of Volney. H.

³ VOLNEY, CONSTANTINE FRANÇOIS CHASSEBEUF, Count de. Peer of France, born at Craon in Brittany, in 1755. Travelled and lived many years in Syria. Published a celebrated work there-on. In 1789, Deputy of the tiers-etat of Anjou. In 1791, published his delictual work called Le Ruinée. Suffered persecution, and was imprisoned ten months during the reign of terror, but was liberated on the fall of Robespierre. Visited the United States in 1795, returned home in 1798. And was made senator under the new constitution. It appears that he would have been second consul, but that his opinions were too liberal to please Napoleon.—Encyclopædia Americana. H.

⁴ MONGE. A member of the French Institute. By the patronage of Condorcet was made minister of the Marine, and temporarily of War, also; in which capacity he signed the death-warrant of Louis XVI. January 19, 1793, member, and in 1794, secretary and president of the Jacobins' club, though accused of favouring the Girondins. In 1794, employed in making an inventory of maps, medals, &c. connected with the marine. In 1798, sent to Italy to superintend the plunder of works of art. In 1799, member of the senate. A personal friend of Napoleon.—Biographie Moderne. H.

⁵ CARNOT. See note to p. 4.

⁶ GINGUENÉ, PIERRE LOUIS. Born at Rennes in Brittany, in 1748, of a poor but an ancient family. Acquired some distinction in painting, poetry, and music. In 1791 and 1793, he was connected with Grouvelle in publishing the Faibles Villages, and from 1793 to 1795 published a Moniteur. From 1794 to 1807, he published The Decade

Philosophique, Littéraire, et Politique, a consistent and impartial paper, which almost alone preserved its character throughout the whole Revolution. Director-General of the public schools until 1798, when he was sent ambassador to Turin. On his return, a member of the tribune, but rejected by the senate for opposing Napoleon in 1802.—Encyclopædia Americana. H.

⁷ DUCIS, JEAN FRANÇOIS. A French dramatic writer, famous for his attempt to adapt Shakespeare to the French theatre. He also wrote the Edipe chez Admète in imitation of the Greek. Abufar, or the Arabian Family, is his best piece. His style is harsh, but his sentiments dignified and noble. He was private secretary to Louis XVIII., and never swerved from his faith to him. When almost starving, refused the place of senator with a large salary, and the cross of the Legion of Honour offered him by Bonaparte. He lived long enough to rejoice at the restoration of his king.—Encyclopædia Americana. H.

⁸ LACUÉE, J. G., the younger. Born at La Massana, in 1753. Captain in the Dauphin's regiment. Syndic attorney to the department of Lot and Garonne, and deputy to the legislature. While in the assembly, moderate, and engaged chiefly on military matters. In 1792 opposed Dumouriez. In 1790 accused of rebellion against the authorities of Toulon. In 1791 escaped proscription. In 1795 nominated to the Council of Ancients. In 1797 member of the committee of inspectors. In 1789 went out of this council, and was re-elected into the Five Hundred. Declared in favour of the revolution of the 18th Brumaire.—Biographie Moderne. H.

⁹ BRUNE, C. M. A. Son of a barrister at Brives la Gaillarde. At the period of the Revolution was a printer, and also a man of letters. A member of the Cordeliers and friend of Danton. Arrested July, 1791, when La Fayette dispersed the mob. In 1793 joined the revolutionary army in the Gironde. He distinguished himself elsewhere, and at Arcola. In 1797 he was appointed commander of the army of Switzerland. In 1799 left the army of Italy for that of Holland. On the news of the 18th Brumaire, sent in his own and his army's adhesions to the consuls.—Biographie Moderne. H.

¹⁰ MARMONT, AUGUSTUS-FRÉDÉRIC-LOUIS VIKING DE

marine, Messrs. de Champagny, Ganteaume,¹ Fleuriu.² In the section of finance, Messrs. Defermon, Duchatel, Dufresne. In the section of justice, Messrs. Boulay de la Meurthe, Berlier, Real. In the section of the interior, Messrs. Røderer, Cretet, Chapal.³ Regnault de St. Jean d'Angely, Fourcroy.⁴ The five presidents appointed were Messrs. Brune, Ganteaume, Defermon, Boulay de la Meurthe, and Røderer. It would have been impossible, indeed, to compose this body of names more distinguished, of talents more real or more diversified. It must be admitted that the French Revolution had been prodigiously fruitful in men, in all departments, of ability, and if it were desired to take no note of exclusions declared by factions, the one against the other, the means were ready for composing a government the most varied, the most capable, and, let us add, the most glorious, that can be imagined. This it was which the new Consul attempted. He chose, for example, to the department of finance, M. Devaisnes, much accused of leaning to royalty, but having in his own line much practical knowledge, which had been before, and was thereafter, of great utility to the state.

On this 24th day of December—the 3d of Nivose—Messrs. Sieyès, Roger-Ducos, Cambacérès, and Lebrun, assembled in order to designate the twenty-nine senators who, with the two consuls retiring, should constitute the number of thirty-one. The list had been naturally prepared beforehand. It contained the most respectable names. Messrs. Berthollet,⁵ Laplace—he had recently retired from the ministry of the interior—Monge, Tracy, Volney, Cabanis,⁶ Kellerman,⁷ Garat,⁸ Lacedepè.⁹ Ducis. The last refused the nomination.

The following day, the 25th of December—4th of Nivose—the council of state assembled for the first time. The consuls, accompanied by the ministers, were present at the sitting. A projected law was discussed for the regulation of the relations of the great bodies of the state, one with the other; other projects were also agreed on, as requisite to be prepared for presentation at the approaching session of the legislative body.

The senate again assembled in the palace of the Luxemburg, and completed itself by the election of twenty-nine new members, who, added to the thirty-one already chosen, carried the whole number of the senators up to sixty. It will be remembered that this number was intended, at a later period, to be increased to eighty. In this supplementary list again there were included some of the proud-est celebrities of France, Messrs. Lagrange,¹⁰

Born at Chatillon-sur-Seine in 1774, of a noble family. At fifteen he entered an infantry regiment, but soon quitted that arm for the artillery. At Toulon attracted the observation of Napoleon. He distinguished himself at Lodi, Castiglione, and St. George. Married the daughter of the banker Perrezeau. Accompanied Napoleon to Egypt: was the first man who landed at Malta. Commanded the 4th demi-brigade at Alexandria, and made governor of that town when Napoleon advanced on Syria. Returned home with Napoleon, and served him on the 18th of Brumaire.—Court and Camp of Napoleon.

Vanity destroyed Marmont, said he, posterity will justly brand his life, but his heart is worth more than his renown.—Opinion of Napoleon. Las Cases. H.

¹ Rear-admiral GANTEAUME. The officer on whom, after the terrible day of the first of August, the command of the shattered remains of the fleet at the mouth of the Nile had devolved. Ganteaume was, I am convinced, from the whole history of his career, a very brave and enterprising officer.—Brenton's Naval History of Great Britain.

² FLEURIU, CHARLES-PIERRE-CLARET, Count of. Born at Lyons in 1738. Entered the navy at thirteen, and served with credit through the Seven Years' War. He and the watchmaker, Berthoud, invented the sea chronometer, the utility of which he fairly established in 1768 and 1769, while in command of the frigate Iris. In 1790 he was minister of the marine. During the heat of the Revolution he devoted himself wholly to pursuits of science. In 1797 he became a member of the Council of Ancients, and afterwards of the council of state.—Encyclopædia Americana. H.

³ CHAPAL, JEAN ANTOINE CLAUDE. Count of Chanteloup, peer of France. Born in 1756. Devoted himself to medicine and science. Rendered himself conspicuous as a revolutionist in the assault on the citadel of Montpelier. In 1793 called to Paris by his chemical knowledge. Furnished from the factory at Grenoble 3500 pounds of gunpowder per diem. In 1798 was made member of the Institute. Assisted in the revolution of the 18th of Brumaire, and in 1799 was appointed by the first consul councillor of state.—Encyclopædia Americana. H.

⁴ FOURCROY, ANTHONY FRANÇOIS DE. A celebrated French chemist. Born in Paris. In 1784, after having attained great celebrity as a man of science, he was made professor of chemistry in the Jardin du Roy. Sent deputy from Paris to the National Convention, but did not take his seat until after the fall of Robespierre. In 1794 he was a member of the Committee of Public Safety. In 1795 of the Council of Ancients. In 1797 he resigned his seat, and in 1799 was appointed by Napoleon to the council of state.—Encyclopædia Americana. H.

⁵ BERTHOLLET, CLAUDE LOUIS, Count de. Member of all the scientific academies of Europe, and one of the most eminent theoretical chemists of the age. Born in Savoy in 1748. In 1764 was professor in the normal school in Paris. In 1768 sent to Italy to superintend the plunder of the works of art. He followed Bonaparte to Egypt, and returned with him in 1799. After the 18th of Brumaire was made a member of the Conservative Senate.—Encyclopædia Americana. H.

⁶ CABANIS, PIERRE JEAN-GEORGES. Physician, philosopher, literateur. Born at Cognac in 1737. Went to Warsaw, in his 16th year, as secretary to a Polish lord. A personal friend of Mirabeau and Condorcet. Member of the senate from 1799 to his death, in 1806.—Encyclopædia Americana.

⁷ KELLERMAN. Born at Strasburg in 1735. Entered the Confians legion as a hussar in 1752. He was appointed to command the army of Moselle; formed a junction with Dumouriez and drove back the allies from Valmy in 1792, thereby deciding the fate of France and of Europe until 1813.—Encyclopædia Americana.

His son was a distinguished man likewise, and it is his charge of cavalry to which some have attributed the victory of Marengo.

⁸ GARAT, D. J., the younger. A man of letters. The tiers-etat of Labour sent him to the states-general, and, though he seldom appeared in the convention, he made known his opinions through the Journal de Paris. He is accused strenuously of having abstracted papers exculpatory of the king. In 1793 he was minister of the interior, and justified Roche and Hebert. He was in some danger during the reign of terror. In 1794 commissioner of public instruction. In 1798 sent ambassador to Naples. In 1799 favoured the revolution of the 18th Brumaire, and was made a senator.

Garat, possessed of talents, found the secret of getting himself spoken of as a writer void of sense. Endued with domestic virtues, he was supposed a wicked being.—Biographie Moderne.

⁹ LACEDÈDE, B. G. E. A celebrated naturalist, born at Agen in 1756; a pupil of Buffon and Daubenton. In the Revolution, member for the department of Paris. In 1799 took the oath of hatred to royalty in the Council of Five Hundred. In October, 1799, was made member of the Institute of Bologna and afterwards appointed to the conservative senate by Napoleon.—Biographie Moderne.

N. B. The other names either have been noted above, or are those of men comparatively obscure.

¹⁰ LAGRANGE, L. DE. A celebrated geometrician, born at Turin, of French parents. Frederic the Great induced him to settle at Berlin. On his death he returned to Paris, where he received a pension of 6000 livres, which was several times withdrawn and restored. In 1794 a member of the committee on education. In 1799

Darcet,¹ François de Neufchâteau,² Daubenton,³ Bougainville,⁴ the banker Perrégaux, and, to conclude, a very ancient name, M. de Choiseul Praslin.

On the following days the senate was occupied by the composition of the legislative body and of the tribunate. To the legislative body were admitted the moderate men of all the periods of the Revolution, members of the Constituent Assembly, of the Legislative Assembly, of the National Convention, and, lastly, Deputies of the Five Hundred.

Care was had to choose in the different assemblies men who had aimed but little at fame, success, or agitation, in state matters, reserving for the tribunate those well known for tastes directly opposite. The three hundred names, therefore, which composed the legislative body, could not be conspicuous for their brilliancy, and in this numerous list it would be difficult to find two or three which are known to this day. Among them, however, was the modest and brave Latour d'Auvergne,⁵ a hero worthy of antiquity for his virtues, his great deeds, and his noble end.

The hundred names of the tribunate chosen with an intention very natural, but before long bitterly regretted, of making room, namely, for all active and stirring spirits, spirits enamoured of renown—these hundred names, I say, contained celebrities, some of which are, it is true, somewhat effaced, but not forgotten even to-day, while I am writing; such as are Messrs. Chenier,⁶ Andrieux,⁷ Chauvelin,⁸ Stanislaus de Girardin, Benjamin Constant, Daunou, Riouffe,⁹ Berenger,¹⁰ Ganih, Ginguéné, Laromiguière, Jean Baptiste Say,¹¹ &c.

The composition of these bodies once finished, the quarters destined for their reception were next to be prepared. The Tuileries were reserved for the three consuls, the Luxembourg was devoted to the senate, the Palais-Bourbon to the legislative body, and the Palais-Royal to the tribunate. A sum of some hundred thousand francs was voted to render the Tuileries habitable, and until the necessary works should be performed, the consuls occupied the Lesser Luxembourg.

General Bonaparte had done much already since his return from Egypt. He had overthrown the Directory, and had acquired a sway, inferior in appearance to constitutional royalty, though vastly superior to it in reality. But he was scarcely master of that authority, and it was necessary that he should legalize his possession of it by useful works and great actions. There remained to him, therefore, vast things to be done; and his first efforts at reorganization were but an effort—a happy effort without doubt, but one which still left in the country great disorders, deep suffering, restrictions on the treasury, misery in the army, the flames of civil war in La Vendée, doubt among the neutral powers, and real desperation in carrying on the struggle among the belligerents. And yet, this assumption of power, coming after his first works, and preceding the vast labours, of effecting which thereafter he entertained ample confidence, had charms enough for his ambitious heart.

He performed, in order to celebrate his installation into his government, a train of measures carefully matured, which were full of deep policy, of evident and sensible joy, and of that generosity which is inspired by contentment into every lively and benevolent soul.

nominated to the Conservative Senate, in which he sat until 1806.—Biographie Moderne.

¹ DARCET, JEAN. An eminent French chemist, born at Douaelt, in Guenne, in 1725. He devoted himself to chemistry, and among other discoveries, demonstrated the combustibility of the diamond. During the reign of terror his life was saved by Fourcroy, who got his name obliterated from the lists of Robespierre. In 1799 member of the Conservative Senate, in which office he died, in 1861.—Encyclopædia Americana.

² FRANÇOIS DE NEUFCHÂTEAU, N. Born in Lorraine in 1750. He devoted himself almost entirely to letters. In 1783 nominated attorney-general to the chief council of the Cape of St. Domingo. In 1789 joined the revolutionary party. In 1791 deputed to the legislature. He held a variety of offices throughout the Revolution, but without obtaining any very great eminence, except for his literary talents, by which he deserved and acquired a high rank.—Biographie Moderne.

³ DAUBENTON, J. L. M. Born in 1716, at Montber. A physician, naturalist, and fellow-student of Voltaire. His life was entirely devoted to science. He was appointed a member of the Conservative Senate, and died of apoplexy in 1799.—Biographie Moderne.

⁴ BOUGAINVILLE, DE. Born in 1730. Celebrated for his voyage round the world. In 1790 received the command of the squadron at Brest, where he distinguished himself. Manifested great attachment to Louis XVI. and was constantly about his person. Was arrested, but spared in 1793. In 1799 the Council of Five Hundred presented him as a candidate for the Directory. In 1799 he was made a conservative senator.—Biographie Moderne.

⁵ LATOUR D'AUVERGNE, THEOPHILUS DE. One of the bravest soldiers mentioned in history, born at Carhaix, in the department of Finistère, in 1743. Was aid-de-camp to the Duke de Crillon at the siege of Mahon. He was among the first to join the standard of the Revolution, and distinguished himself above 8000 grenadiers in the Pyrenees. Higher appointments were offered to him, which he never would accept, saying that he was only fit to lead a column of grenadiers. He fell gloriously at Newburg in 1803, with the army of the Rhine, having been named not long before, First Grenadier of France, by the First Consul. His head was embalmed and carried at the head of his company in a silver box. His name was always called when the regiment was mustered, and the bravest grenadier answered "died on the field of honour."—Encyclopædia Americana.

⁶ CHENIER, M. J. Born in 1762, at Constantinople; son of the French consul. In 1789 pleaded for the total liberty of the press. Wrote many revolutionary dramatic pieces. Voted for the death of Louis XVI. In 1793 opposed the terrorists and procured the erasure of Talleyrand's name from the list of emigrants. A member of the Council of Five Hundred. Engaged in all the various acts of the Revolution up to 1799, when he became a tribune. He had some genius as a writer.—Biographie Moderne.

⁷ ANDRIEUX. A distinguished French dramatist. Born at Strasburg in 1759. In 1798 entered the legislature for the department of the Seine. After the 18th Brumaire became a tribune.—Encyclopædia Americana.

⁸ CHAUVELIN, FRANÇOIS, MURQUIS DE. Born in 1770. In 1791 was aid-de-camp to Rochambeau. In 1792 was appointed, at Dumouriez's suggestion, ambassador to England. Was imprisoned during the reign of terror, but liberated on the 9th of Thermidor. Appointed by the senate to the tribunate. A friend of Benjamin Constant.—Encyclopædia Americana.

⁹ RIOUFFE, H. A man of letters. Fled from Paris in 1793. Went to Bordeaux, where he was arrested by Tallien and imprisoned in Paris until after the fall of Robespierre. In 1799 a member of the tribunate, and offended his colleagues by too violent praise of Bonaparte, and having the air of defending him when no one attacked him.—Biographie Moderne.

¹⁰ BERENGIER. The celebrated poet and song-writer.

¹¹ SAY, JEAN BAPTISTE. A distinguished political economist, born at Lyons in 1769. One of the establishers of the Decade Philosophique. In 1799 a member of the tribunate.—Encyclopædia Americana.

N B. The other names, either noted before, or comparatively unworthy of notice.

These measures followed one another from the 25th of December—4th of Nivose—the day on which the consular government was installed, to the 1st of January, 1800—11th of Nivose—the day on which the first legislative session was opened.

First, an act of the council of state of the 27th of December—the 6th of Nivose—decided that the laws which excluded the relations of emigrants, and the former nobility, from public functions, were abrogated ad ipso facto, such laws being contrary to the spirit of the new constitution. A certain number of individuals belonging to the revolutionary party, were ordered, as I have stated, to be transported or imprisoned in compliance with an act, not sufficiently considered, which was passed a few days after the 18th of Brumaire.

Transportation and imprisonment had been commuted for strict superintendence of the police. This superintendence was itself suppressed by a decree of the 5th of Nivose. After this reparation made to those who had not even endured the first severity of the act, the First Consul granted one yet more important, and more necessary, to the victims of the Directory, and of the governments anterior to it. Those who had been transported without trial were regularly authorized to return to France, with no condition, except that of residing in the places indicated. This disposition was applied to all the persons proscribed at any time, but especially to those of the 18th Fructidor. Messrs. Boissy d'Anglas,¹ Dumolard,² and Pastoret,³ were recalled and authorised to live, the first at Annonay, the second at Grenoble, the third at Dejon. Messrs. Carnot, Portalis,⁴ Quatremere de Quincy,⁵ Simeon, Villaret-Joyeuse,⁶ Barbé-Marbois,⁷ Barère,⁸ also recalled, were permitted to live in Paris. The

¹ BOISSY D'ANGLAS, FRANÇOIS ANTOINE. A barrister in the Parliament, maître d'hôtel of Monsieur. In 1789 deputy of the tiers-etat from Annonay. At first was tolerably moderate. In 1791, one of the minority in favour of the right of men of colour. At the trial of Louis XVI. voted for detention until deportation should be necessary. Kept himself aside during the reign of terror, and did not re-appear in the tribune until the 9th of Thermidor, year II—July, 1794. In February, 1791, he procured an act for the free exercise of all forms of religion. In the same year took charge of the provisioning of Paris, and on the insurrection of the 1st Prairial displayed great firmness, being in the chair, above twenty muskets being aimed at him, and the head of the deputy, Feraud, on a pike, being thrust in his face. In the same year he voted for the abolition of all barbarity from the revolutionary laws, for the recall of De Talleyrand, and the reunion of Holland. He opposed the amnesty for the crimes of the Revolution, consistently advocated all liberal measures, and was sentenced to deportation on the 18th of Fructidor, year V—Sept. 4th, 1797—but escaped, was recalled to France as above.—Biographie Moderne. H.

² DUMOLARD, J. V. A lawyer of Grenoble. Born at Vigille, in Dauphiny. Appointed to the legislature at the age of twenty-five by the department of Isere. For a time was rather a violent revolutionist, but became more moderate. In 1792 he tried vainly to defend the queen, and the justice of peace Larivière. He was nearly assassinated by the Jacobins for opposing the accusation of La Fayette. He consistently and strenuously opposed all cruel, all impious, all destructive measures, in short, all the measures of the Jacobins. Was sentenced to deportation in 1797, but escaped, and was not deported to Cayenne. But subsequently delivering himself up, was carried to Oleron. Recalled by the consuls as above.—Biographie Moderne. H.

³ PASTORET, EMM. CL. JOS. PIERRE. Born at Marseilles in 1756. An advocate before the Revolution. In September, 1790, appointed by Louis XVI. minister of the interior. In 1791 deputy from Paris to the legislature. He was rather a moderate revolutionist, opposing some atrocities, though he voted for the amnesty of revolutionary crimes. He opposed the accusation of La Fayette. Took no share in the reign of terror, and, becoming more moderate, was one of the firmest defenders of the Clichons in 1795. Spoke eloquently in favour of the fugitive priests, and opposed the marching of troops to Paris by the Directory. Banished to Cayenne, but escaped, and went to Oleron, in 1798, whence he was recalled, as above, by the consul in 1799. He was a voluminous, elegant, and perspicuous writer.—Biographie Moderne. H.

⁴ PORTALIS, J. E. M. Born at Bausset. A lawyer before the Revolution. Sent in 1795 to the council of Ancients by the department of Seine. Constantly showed himself adverse to the directorial party, and displayed a character full of nobleness and moderation. In 1796 made a report for the erasure of the lists of emigrants. Opposed Latouche's speech against priests, and, in fact, all violent and Jacobinical measures. Sentenced to transportation in 1797, but escaped, and was recalled, as above.—Biographie Moderne. H.

⁵ QUATREMERE DE QUINCY, ANTOINE CHRYSTOWNE. An ancient counsellor of the Chatelet. Embraced the cause of the Revolution with moderation. He was the reporter of the cause of Favras. He opposed all violence, and his abhorrence of the Terrorists led him to head one of the sections in the insurrection of the 13th Vendémiaire, 1798, for which he was sentenced to death by the Terrorists, but escaped. In 1796 he reappeared in public, and, by his continued hatred of the Jacobin party, drew on himself the sentence of deportation in 1797, from which he escaped, and was recalled, as above, in 1799.—Biographie Moderne. H.

⁶ VILLARET-JOYEUSE, LOUIS THOMAS. A French vice-admiral. Served at first in the infantry. Left the army in consequence of a duel; entered the navy; was employed under Suffren; distinguished himself in India; commanded a frigate there, and was taken by the Scapila, but afterwards exchanged. In 1788 declared for the Revolution. From 1793 to 1798 commanded the French fleets with distinction. Was persecuted by the Jacobins for his moderation. In 1796 quitted the marine. In 1797 deputy from Morbihan to the council of Five Hundred. Declared against the Terrorists; was sentenced to deportation, escaped the first search, and was sent to Oleron. Recalled by the consuls in 1799.—Biographie Moderne. H.

Admiral Villaret. An officer of great merit of the old school. Villaret was a gentleman of high polish, and one of the best officers Suffren had in his fleet in the East Indies; he was a man of talent and bravery.—Brenton's Naval History of Great Britain.

He commanded 26 ships of the line, and 8 frigates, in Lord Howe's action of the 1st of June, 1794, against 24 British ships of the line and 7 frigates. In his flag-ship, the Montagne, 130, he engaged the English admiral in the Queen Charlotte, 100, and lost 300 men in killed and wounded; Jean Bon St. André, the revolutionary commissioner of the French people, running below at the first broadside, and continuing in the cockpit during the whole action. Villaret lost seven ships of the line, six taken and one sunk, but saved the American Convoy.—Brenton, N. H.

⁷ BARBÉ-MARBOIS. Born at Metz, and was made Governor of St. Domingo. In 1791 was sent by the king to the diet of Ratisbon, and the next year to Vienna with M. de Noailles, the ambassador. He returned to France, and remained in obscurity until 1795, when he was sent by the department of the Moselle to the Council of Ancients. Was an enemy of the Directory, and transported to Cayenne in 1797; but was recalled, as above, in 1799.—Biographie Moderne. H.

⁸ BARÈRE, BERNARD DE VIEUXAC. Born at Jasbez, of a respectable family. In 1789 deputed to the tiers-etat from Bigorre. In 1798 defended the perpetrators of the massacre of September. Voted for the death of Louis, and congratulated the people on the tyrant's death. He declared for the Montagnards, and for a while displeased Robespierre and that party. He was again a member of the Committee of Public Safety, became its habitual organ, and proposed in its name most of the measures which signalized the reign of terror. The banishment of the Bourbons; trial of the queen; exhumation of the French kings at St. Denis; the death of all alarmists; the prohibition of a deputy to defend himself before sentence; the slaughter of English and Hanoverian prisoners, and the massacre of the garrisons of Condé and Valenciennes. And when this last decree was not executed, he used these words, "Temporize today, they will murder you to-morrow. No, no, none but the dead are to be trusted!" He uttered a violent eulogium of Robespierre the day before his fall, but then truckled to the other party. He was afterward condemned to deportation; but was not sentenced. Was not in-care taken in collecting at the capital, although it were not their place of birth, such men as Messrs. Carnot, Simeon, and Portalis, proved sufficiently that it was the intention of government to employ their talents.

Other measures were adopted with regard to worship and the free exercise of that right. On the 28th of December, it was directed that the edifices destined to religious ceremonies should continue to receive that destination, or should receive it anew, in case they had not been restored already to the ministers of the different creeds. Certain local authorities, wishing to hinder the exercise of Catholicism, had forbidden the opening of churches on Sunday, and authorized it only on the tenth days. These municipal decrees the consuls broke; and added to the restitution of religious buildings, the free faculty of using the various days appointed holy by the various creeds. Nevertheless, they did not as yet venture to put a stop to the ceremonies of the theophilanthropists, which took place in the churches, on certain week days, and which the Catholics regarded as profanations.

The consuls caused the formula of the obligation entered into by priests to be modified. They had been formerly required to take a special oath, binding them to the civil constitution of the clergy—an oath which bound them, as some said, to a legislation contrary to the laws of the church.

It was now proposed to make them take a simple promise of obedience to the constitution of the state, a thing which none of them could refuse to do, without refusing that obedience to Cæsar which is strictly prescribed by the laws of the Catholic church. This is what was afterwards called the promise, as opposed to the oath, which immediately recalled many priests to the altar. Those who had sworn, had already obtained the favour of the government. It was now the turn of those who had not sworn.

To conclude, to the measures of this kind the new First Consul added one which should, in the eyes of all the world, be attributed to him directly, because it recalled relations which were in some sort personal to himself. He had negotiated with Pius VI., the late pope, and signed, at the gates of Rome, the treaty of Tolentino. He had, from the year 1797, affected great regard for the head of the Catholic church, and had received from him marked testimonies of good will. Pius VI. who died at Valence in Dauphiny, had not yet received the honours of burial. His mortal remains were deposited in a sacristy in that town. General Bonaparte, on his return from Egypt, saw Cardinal Spina, at Valence, and promised him that he would soon remedy so discreditable a piece of forgetfulness.

As early, therefore, as the 30th of December—the 9th Nivose—he caused a decree to be issued by the consuls, resting on the noblest considerations.

"The consuls," thus ran this document, "considering that the body of Pius VI. has been deposited in the town of Valence, deprived of any funeral honors;

"That, if this old man, venerable for his misfortunes, was for a little time the enemy of France, it was but that he was led astray by the councils of men who worked upon the weakness of his old age;

"That it is for the honour of the French nation, and in conformity with its character, to pay the highest marks of consideration to a man who occupied one of the loftiest dignities on earth;

"The consuls decree, &c., &c." And here followed dispositions ordering, at the same time, funeral honours to the pontiff, and a monument which should declare the rank of the buried prince.

This demonstration produced, perhaps, a greater effect than more humane measures, because it struck and astonished imaginations accustomed to very different spectacles. So that an immense crowd hurried to Valence, to take advantage of the authority accorded to them to make a religious demonstration.

The catalogue of revolutionary festivals contained one very unhappily conceived. It was that which celebrated the 21st of January. Whatever might be the opinion of men with regard to the tragical events recalled to mind by that date, it was a barbarous festival, having for object the commemoration of a bloody catastrophe. General Bonaparte, under the Directory, had manifested a strong indisposition to appear at it; not that he dreamed at that day of paying deference to royalty, which, thereafter he was destined to re-establish, but that he did not love publicly to brave those passions which he did not share.

Having now become the head of the government, he caused a decision to be entered by the legislative commissions, that there should be but two of these festivals; that, namely, of the 14th of July, the anniversary of the first day of the Revolution, and that of the first day of Vendemiaire, the anniversary of the first day of the republic. "These days," he said, "are imperishable in the memory of our citizens. They have been accepted by all France with unanimous transports, and they awaken no recollection likely to introduce division among the friends of the republic."

It required all the power, and all the boldness likewise, of the head of the new government to venture on a train of measures which, just, politic, and moral in themselves, appeared nevertheless, to many excitable spirits, as many preliminary steps toward a complete counter-revolution. But in accomplishing all this, General Bonaparte had taken care, at one time, to set, himself, the first example of forgetfulness of political hatreds; at another to awaken, in its most stirring shape, that sentiment of glory, by which he led the men of that day, and diverted them from base factious cluded in the law of amnesty, and being appointed to the legislature in 1797, was formally expelled. Was included in the act which recalled all the exiles in 1799.—Biographie Moderne.

The whole annals of the Revolution do not exhibit a baser or more bloody heart than Barrère. He had neither courage nor consistency. His talents were as trifling as his conduct was vile and shuffling, and we shall look in vain for one redeeming trait in his character.

fury. Thus General Augereau had offended him by unbecoming conduct on the 18th of Brumaire; nevertheless, he named him commander of the army of Holland.

"Prove," he said, in a letter which has been subsequently published, "Prove, in all the acts which your command will justify you in performing, that you are above all those miserable party differences, the conflict of which, during the last ten years, has caused the convulsions which tore all France asunder. Should circumstances oblige me to make war in person, feel sure that I will not leave you in Holland, and that I never shall forget your glorious day's work at Castiglione."

At the same time he took the first step toward the foundation of the Legion of Honour, in the institution of arms of honour. The French spirit of democracy which attached an idea of horror to all personal distinctions, could then, at the most, admit only of recompenses for military services. As a consequence of the first article of the constitution, the First Consul decided, that for every brilliant action, a musket of honour should be voted to every infantry soldier, a carbine of honour to every cavalry soldier, grenades of honour to every artilleryman, and, to conclude, a sabre of honour to officers of all ranks. To the institution which was voted on the 26th of December—the 4th of Nivose—the First Consul added positive actions. On the following day, he decreed a sabre to General St. Cyr,¹ for the brilliant battle he had lately fought in the Apennines. "Receive," he said to him, "in testimony of my satisfaction, a handsome sabre, which you will always wear on days of battle. Let the soldiers know, who are under your orders, that I am well pleased with them, and that I hope to be so, yet more, in future." To these acts, which announced his assumption of the reins of government; which marked the character that government was to bear; and which caused his intention of placing himself above all party spirit to display itself in lively colours, the First Consul immediately added measures of far greater importance, as well with regard to La Vendée, as to foreign powers.

An armistice had been signed with the Vendéans, parleys had been opened with them, and yet the pacification did not advance. General Bonaparte had left little doubt in the minds of the royalists, who had applied to him, in order to sound his intentions, and to learn whether he would not be satisfied to become the restorer, the support, and the first subject of the house of Bourbon. He had speedily undeceived them, by showing himself irrevocably attached to the cause of the French Revolution. This frankness in his declarations had not rendered the reconciliation, which had been set on foot, the more easy. The Ven-deans hesitated; they were placed between the fear with which the energy of the new government assailed them, and the urgency of the emigrants in London, who were authorized to promise, in behalf of Mr. Pitt, arms, moneys, and a disembarkation on their coasts.

It was on a new insurrection in La Vendée that England especially relied. She was meditating an attempt, similar to that which had been made on Holland, on that part of our coasts. The ill-success of the latter had not discouraged her, and she urgently asked the Emperor Paul for the aid of his troops, though, in fact, with but small hope of obtaining it. Prussia, indeed, which was beginning to display a sort of interest in the consular government, never ceased repeating to Duroc, and to M. Otto, the French chargé d'affaires, "Get done with La Vendée; for it is there that they will aim the most dangerous blows at you."

General Bonaparte knew this well. Independently of the injury La Vendée was doing to the armies of the republic, by absorbing a portion of their force, the civil war appeared to him not only a misfortune, but a sort of dishonour to the government, for it proved a deplorable state of internal affairs. He had taken, therefore, the most effectual measures to bring it to an end. He had recalled from Holland a part of that army, which, under General Brune, had recently conquered the Anglo-Russians. He had united to it a portion of the garrison of Paris, which he had no hesitation in diminishing considerably, supplying the want of material force by the influence of his name. And thus he had succeeded in bringing together in the west an excellent army of about sixty thousand men. General Brune was placed at the head of that army, with a strong recommendation to retain, as his principal lieutenant, the wise and conciliatory Hédouville, who held all the threads of the negotiation with the royalists in his hands. The name of General Brune was a sufficient reply to those who reckoned on a second descent of the Anglo-Russians. But before striking a decisive blow, as he proposed to do, in case the conditions of pacification should be rejected, the First Consul thought himself bound to address a proclamation to the Vendéans on the very day of his installation.

On the 29th of December—the 8th of Nivose—he caused a proclamation and decree of the consuls to be transmitted to the department of the west, in these words—"An impious war threatens a second time to enkindle the departments of the west. The duty of the First Magistrates of the Republic is to prevent its progress, and to extinguish it on the very hearth; but they desire not to have recourse to violence, until they shall have exhausted the means of persuasion and justice."

¹ ST. CYR, LOUIS GOUVION. Born of respectable parents in the department of La Meurthe, in 1764. In his youth, he was destined for a painter, and visited Rome in order to study the old masters. Previously to the Revolution he returned to France, and entered the army as a private volunteer. He was soon afterward sent with the troops to the Rhine. In 1793, he was a general of division, and distinguished himself on several occasions. In 1798, he served in Italy under Massena, and, when an insurrection of the army drove that officer out of Rome, the Directory gave him the command, and he soon restored discipline. In 1799, he passed to the army of the Rhine under Moreau, took Fribourg, and contributed to the victory of Hohenlinden. In the autumn of the same year, he attacked the Austrians with an inferior force at Borea, near Gavi and Novi, drove them across the Arqui and took 1500 men and several cannon. This is the victory alluded to in the text.—Court and Camp of Napoleon.

Making a distinction between the guilty men, sold to the foreigner and enemy, and for ever irreconcilable to the republic, and the misguided citizens, who had only made war in order to resist cruel persecution, the First Consul called their attention to all the acts which would tend to reassure these last, such as the revocation of the law of hostages, the restitution of the churches to the priests, the permission to all men to observe the Sabbath as they pleased. He promised, in the second place, a complete and perfect amnesty to all those who should submit and abandon the assemblies of insurgents, and lay down the arms furnished by England. But he announced, also, that force would be immediately put forth sternly against those who should persist in insurrection. He announced the suspension of the constitution, that is to say, the employment of extraordinary jurisdictions in places where insurgent bands should continue to show themselves in arms. "The government," said the proclamation of the consuls, in its conclusion, "will pardon, will show mercy to repentance. Its indulgence will be complete and absolute. But it will strike any person who, after this declaration, shall presume still to resist the sovereignty of the nation. But no! henceforward we will acknowledge but one sentiment, the love of country. The ministers of a God of peace shall be the first movers of reconciliation and concord. Let them speak to the hearts of men the language they have learned in the school of their master. Let them go into the temples, which are reopened to them, and offer the sacrifice which shall expiate the crimes of war, and the blood which she has caused to be shed."

This manifestation, supported by a formidable force, was of a nature to produce the most powerful effect, especially when coming from a new government, entirely clear from all the excesses and crimes which had afforded a pretext for the civil war.

After having proceeded thus, with reference to internal enemies, the First Consul, addressing himself to the external foe, resolved to make solemn advances to two of the powers which had not as yet shown any symptoms of relenting toward France; but which, on the contrary, appeared desperately bent on war; I mean Austria and Great Britain.

Prussia had very kindly received, as we have seen, the aide-de-camp Duroc, and did not cease from giving daily to the First Consul the liveliest testimonies of sympathy. Satisfied with her own relations with him, she desired the success of his government against anarchy, the success of his arms against Austria. As to the project of rendering herself a mediator, she always cherished the idea thereof, but dared not to take the first step; thinking the moment of peace still far off, and being unwilling to take a step, the results of which could not be foreseen at so early a period.

¹ SEMONVILLE, HUGUET DE. Councillor in the parliament of Paris; attached to the popular party; a friend of La Fayette. In 1792 ambassador of the French Republic to Genoa. He was appointed minister to Turin and Constantinople, but the King of Sardinia and the states of Venice and Genoa refused to suffer him to enter their territories. In May, 1793, he was sent by the Directory as minister plenipotentiary to the Pope. The Emperor of Germany violated the law of nations, by causing him to be arrested near the Lake of Chiavenna, with immense treasures destined as presents to the Sultan. He was detained a close prisoner until 1795, when he was exchanged at Bale for the daughter of Louis the XVI. After the 18th of Brumaire he was first put in nomination for the council of state, and afterward appointed ambassador to Holland, whither he went in January, 1800. — Biographie Moderne.

VOL. I.—8

Any person, in fact, who closely observed the state of things in Europe, could easily discover that, in order to disunite the bonds which attached Austria to England, there must needs be another campaign. The court of Madrid had also seen with satisfaction the accession of General Bonaparte; because, with him at the helm of state, it appeared to her that the French alliance would at once be more honourable and more profitable. But the horizon did not clear up completely in any quarter. General Bonaparte resolved then, on the very day on which the constitution formally invested him with a new character, to address himself publicly to those powers which were decidedly hostile, in order to put them in the wrong if they should refuse. After that, it would be at his option to undertake war, with the world's opinion on his side.

First of all, he gave orders for the departure of the French agents, whom I have mentioned above, and who had not yet left Paris, because it was desired that they should be accredited in the name of a government definitively constituted. General Beurnonville therefore set out for Berlin; M. Alquier for Madrid; M. de Semonville¹ for the Hague; M. Bourgoing for Copenhagen. General Beurnonville was entrusted with a well-conceived piece of flattery to the King of Prussia, which was, to request, at his hands, a bust of the Great Frederic, destined to be placed in the great gallery of Diana in the Tuileries. The First Consul was causing the images of all great men, who were objects of his admiration, to be disposed in this gallery. M. Alquier, who bore to Madrid the most caressing speeches to the king and queen, was charged also with the duty of presenting a gift to the Prince of Peace, who, although at that time no longer the minister, still possessed considerable influence. This gift consisted of splendid arms, manufactured at Versailles, which was then celebrated for the perfection of its fabrics throughout all Europe.

This done, the First Consul directed his attention to the measure projected, with regard to the two hostile courts of England and Austria. In general, it has been the custom to conceal overtures of this kind, in order to avoid the humiliation of a refusal. General Bonaparte, however, in speaking to England and Austria, wished to speak to the whole world; and to that end, it was necessary for him to make a solemn overture, which, departing entirely from wonted usages, should address itself to the hearts of the sovereigns themselves, either to flatter or embarrass them. Therefore, instead of causing his notes to be forwarded to Lord Grenville, or to M.

Lord Grenville was at this time the English minister for foreign affairs. The mode of this communication probably, caused suspicion, rather than conciliation.

Thug it he wrote directly to the King of England and the Emperor of Germany two letters, which the ministers of those courts were charged to deliver forthwith to their respective sovereigns.

The letter to the King of England ran in the following terms:

"Paris—5th Nivose, year VIII—Dec. 26, 1799.

"Called, sire, by the wishes of the French nation, to occupy the first magistracy of the Republic, I judge it well, on entering my office, to address myself directly to your majesty.

"Must the war, which for the last eight years has devastated the four quarters of the world, be eternal? Are there no means of coming to an understanding?

"How can the two most enlightened nations of Europe, stronger already and more powerful than their safety or their independence requires, sacrifice, to ideas of vain-glory, the well-being of commerce, internal prosperity, and the peace of families? How is it, that they do not feel peace to be the first necessities, as the first of glories?

"These sentiments cannot be strangers to the heart of your majesty, who governs a free people, with the sole aim of rendering it happy.

"Your majesty will perceive only in this overture the sincerity of my desire to contribute efficaciously, for the second time, to a general pacification by this prompt advance, perfectly confidential, and disembarassed of those forms, which, perhaps necessary to disguise the dependence of weak states, reveal, when adopted by strong states, only the wish of mutual deception.

"France and England, by the misuse of their powers, may yet, for a long period, retard, to the misery of all nations, their exhaustion. But I venture to say, that the fate of all civilized nations is connected with the termination of a war which has set the whole world in flames.

"Signed, BONAPARTE,
"First Consul of the French Republic."

On the same day, the French consul addressed the following letter to the Emperor of Germany:

"Having returned to Europe, after an absence of eighteen months, I find a war kindled between the French Republic and your majesty.

"The French nation has called me to the occupation of the First Magistracy.

"A stranger to every feeling of vain-glory, the first of my wishes is to stop the effusion of blood which is about to flow. Every thing leads me to foresee, that in the next campaign numerous armies, ably conducted, will treble the number of the victims, who have already fallen since the resumption of hostilities. The well known character of your majesty leaves me no doubt as to the secret wishes of your heart. If those wishes only are listened to, I perceive the possibility of reconciling the interests of the two nations.

"In the relations which I have formerly entertained with your majesty, you have shown me some personal regard. I beg you, therefore, to see in this overture, which I have made to you, the desire to respond to that regard, and to convince your majesty more and more of the very distinguished consideration which I feel toward you.

"Signed, BONAPARTE,
"First Consul of the French Republic."

Such was the mode by which the French consul announced his accession to power, whether to the factions which divided France or to the foreign cabinets in coalition against her. He offered peace, being prepared to compel it forcibly, should he fail to obtain it amicably. It was his intention to employ the winter in carrying on a short and decisive campaign in La Vendée, in order that he might have the power, thereafter in the spring, of throwing back upon the Rhine and Alps those troops which, after the settlement of domestic peace, would be again disposable for foreign operations.

While waiting these results, on the first of January, 1800—11th of Nivose, year VIII—he opened the legislative session, and determined to consecrate that session of four months to the preparing, by means of good laws, the administrative organization of France, which was yet scarcely commenced. He had of late substituted his brother, Lucien, to the learned Laplace, in the internal administration; and in the ministry of justice, M. Abrial,² a very honest man of business, to M. Cambacérés, who had become consul.

On the first of January, 1800, the Senate, the Legislative Body, and the Tribunal assembled. The Senate chose M. Sieyès, as their president—the Legislative Body, M. Perrin des Vosges—the Tribunal, M. Daunou.

Numerous drafts of laws were immediately laid before the Legislative Body.

There reigned at this period a species of anxiety concerning these deliberative assemblies, thus newly combined. Men were weary of agitation, athirst for repose. They had recovered from that keen taste for political eloquence, which had so much enthralled all France in eighty-nine, when Mirabeau,³ Bar-

¹ THUGUT. Foreign minister of Austria. He was the son of a poor boatman at Linz. By the energy of his parents, he was sent to the school of Oriental languages at Vienna, where his abilities attracted the notice of Maria Theresa, who thenceforth became his warm patroness. At fifteen he was sent as interpreter to the Austrian ambassador at Constantinople. Thence he gradually rose to the portfolio of foreign affairs. He resided long at Paris, and was intimate with Mirabeau, but was ever a steadfast opponent of republican principles, an honourable, upright, energetic, patriotic statesman.—Milton's History. H.

² ABRIAL, ANDRÉ-JOSEPH. Born in 1750 at Annonay, in the department of Ardèche. Now count and peer of France. Studied law in Paris, embraced the principles of the Revolution, and was for a long time commissioner of the executive power in the Courts of Cassation. In 1799, he organized the republican government of Naples.—Encyclopædia Americana. H.

³ BARNAVE, ANTOINE PIERRE JOSEPH MARIE. A distinguished French orator. Born at Grenoble in 1761. The son of a rich procurer. He was a Protestant and a lawyer. Deputy of the tiers-etat, and early showed himself an open enemy of the court. After the arrest of the royal family, he became much more moderate. He defended La Fayette, maintained the inviolability of the royal person. He opposed the ordinance against refractory priests, lost all influence with the revolutionists, and was guillotined in 1793.—Encyclopædia Americana. H.

nave, Maury,¹ and Cazalès,² opened to her a new career of glory, in the rostrum.

The dis^{tin} to advocates was universal. There was a perfect rage for men of action, capable of giving France victories and peace. Nevertheless, they had not yet resolved on the establishment of absolute power—they did not yet wish to strangle all liberty, or to stifle all sage discussion. If the power of action, which a new legislator had introduced into the constitution, by the creation of a First Consul, and the appointment to that office of the greatest captain of his age—if, I say, that power was incompatible with liberty, men were prepared to sacrifice the former. But every one would have been delighted if the reconciliation of liberty with a strong government should prove feasible. It was not vulgar agitators or obstinate republicans who reasoned thus. It was the wise, enlightened spirits, who would not have the Revolution so soon belie herself, and that so completely. Wherefore indifferent spectators asked curiously of each other, while good citizens asked with heartfelt anxiety, how the tribunate, the only body which had the power of debate, would bear itself toward the government; and how the government would endure opposition, should opposition arise.

When any reaction declares itself, however general it may be, it cannot carry every one with it; and those whom it does not carry with it, it irritates and even disgusts. Messrs. Chenier, Andrieux, Ginguéné, Daunou, Benjamin Constant, who sat in the Tribunate; Messrs. De Tracy, Volney, and Cabanis, who sat in the Senate, even while they deplored the crimes of the reign of terror, were not disposed to admit that the French Revolution was in the wrong, when compared to its opponents. Monarchical and religious opinions, which were returning into their view, offended them, especially by the immoderate haste with which the retrocession to ancient opinions was operating. They were discontented to a degree which they cared not to disguise. The greater part of these men were sincere. Strongly attached to the Revolution, they approved the whole of it, if it were not the blood and spoliation, and would on no account consent to that which they fancied they could discover in the deep foresight of the new dictator. Let the persecution of the priests be abandoned; well! But let them not be so far favoured as to be replaced at the altar. This was too much for the faithful followers of the philosophy of the eighteenth century. Let somewhat more of unity and power be conceded to the government; well, again! but let not that care be carried so far as to the establishment of monarchical unity for the benefit of a soldier. That was in their eyes going much too far. For the rest, as it always happens, their motives were different. If such were the opinions of Messrs. Chenier, Ginguéné, Daunou, Tracy, Cabanis, they could not be those of M. Constant, who certainly had drawn from the society of the family of Necker,³ in which he lived, neither an aversion to religious ideas, nor an exclusive taste for the French Revolution. Admitted to the Tribunate, thanks to the solicitations of his friends, he had become within a few days the most active as well as the most intelligent of the new opposition. He was moved by his sneering spirit, and yet more by the discontent of the Necker family, in which he participated. Madame de Staël,⁴ who represented at that time, in her own person only,

¹ MAURY, JEAN SIFFREY. Born of obscure parents, in Provence, in 1746. He took orders, and soon received a benefice. His eulogy of Fénélon and his great eloquence won him court favour, which he repaid by exerting all his courage and eloquence in behalf of the throne, in the States-General. In 1789, so much was the popular indignation raised against him, that, on leaving the Assembly, he was greeted with shouts of "To the lamp-post with the Abbé Maury!" and the crowd would probably have hanged him, had he not replied promptly, "Here he is! here is the Abbé Maury! Do you think, when you have put me in place of the lamp, that you will have more light?" A repartee which made them laugh and saved his life. In 1793, he retired to Rome, and, in 1794, was made bishop of Montefascone and Corneto and cardinal. During the Revolution, he remained peaceably at Rome, aloof from its horrors, which he reprobated strongly in his pastoral letters.—Encyclopædia Americana.

² CAZALÈS, DE. Son of a counsellor of Thoulous, captain of the regiment of Flanders horse-chasseurs. Deputy of Rivière Verdun to the States-General, where at he was one of the most strenuous defenders of the monarchy, and displayed oratorical abilities which made all parties consider him one of the most eloquent members of the Constituent Assembly. He vigorously opposed the union of the three chambers, and, when told that Louis desired it, he cried out that, if the monarch wished to ruin himself, it was necessary to save the monarchy. He several times humbled Robespierre in the Tribune, and, in 1790, when Menou accused the ministers of having betrayed the people, he opposed him with the memorable words, "I also accuse the ministers, but it is of having betrayed the royal authority." He fought a duel with Barnave, in the same year. On the flight of Louis XVI. for Varennes, he was arrested, but liberated by the Assembly, when he escaped to England. Returned to Paris in 1795, when he was again obliged to fly. He served the French princes in Germany, in the campaign of 1793, when he again returned to England, where he remained until 1803.—Encyclopædia Americana.

³ NECKER, JAMES. Minister of finance, born at Geneva in 1734. Entered the banking-house of his uncle, M. Vernet, in Paris, and speedily became one of the richest bankers in France. In 1769 he was the advocate of the East India Company against Morillet and Lacrosette, and distinguished himself by his talent. He gained a prize in the French Academy by his Eloge de Colbert, and published a work on the exportation of grain, which gained him much celebrity. In 1776 he was made controller of the Royal Treasury, and soon became controller-general. He was not successful in his administration, and retired, in 1781, to his estate at Copet, near Geneva. He was recalled in 1788. Favoured the convocation of the States-General, and the double representation of the tiers-etat, which was the first death-blow to the monarchy of France. He was again dismissed and ordered to leave France within twenty-four hours. He was again recalled, after the storming of the Bastille, but his opinions were as moderate as his policy was feeble. He was not the man to contend with Mirabeau. In 1790 he left Paris never to return, unmixed and unregretted.—Encyclopædia Americana.

⁴ MADAME DE STAËL HOLSTEIN. ANNA LOUISA GERMAINE, Baroness de Necker. This celebrated woman and most distinguished female writer of her own, if not of any age, is too well known to require a long notice. She was the daughter of the celebrated Necker, and one of the most pleasing traits in her character was her unbounded love and veneration for her father. In 1786 she married the Baron de Staël Holstein, Swedish Ambassador at the Court of France, a man older than herself. At first she was a violent favourer of liberty, but was early disgusted with the excesses of the Revolution, and narrowly escaped the guillotine. The incident alluded to in the text, which caused her bitter personal hatred to Napoleon, relates to an interview with him shortly after his return from Egypt, when on her asking him "Whom he considered the most eminent of women?" He replied, "The most prolific." She never forgave him; and he hated her for her literary attacks with unrelenting animosity.

that illustrious family, had greatly admired General Bonaparte; and it would have been very easy for him to have won over completely a lady, whose lively imagination rendered her particularly sensible to all that was great and noble. But although endowed with wit, as largely as with genius, he had wounded, by some rude expressions, the self-esteem of a woman whom he disliked, because he considered that her pretensions were unsuited to her sex; and by these means had produced in her heart a bitter irritation, which, if not formidable, was yet annoying to him. Every error, how light soever, brings its fruits after it. The First Consul was about to receive the fruits of his error, at the hands of those who were within the influence of Madame de Staël's seductive intellect. M. Constant was of this number.

The Tribune had been established in the Palais Royal, undoubtedly without any particular intention, and merely of necessity. The Tuileries had been assigned to the head of the government. The Luxembourg, formerly occupied by the Council of Ancients, was naturally given up to the Senate. The Palais Bourbon had been allotted to the Body Legislative. The Palais Royal remained, alone, disposable to the Tribune. The disposition to take in ill part the simplest actions was so great, among spirits of a certain order, that they complained bitterly of the choice of this palace, and affected to believe that it had been selected with a view to the debasement of the Tribune, by allocating it to the habitual resort of disorder and debauchery. Certain articles of regulation were in course of discussion in this assembly on the 2d and 3d of January, when suddenly one of its members, M. Duveyrier, rose to speak, in order to complain of some measures, which, as he said, gave annoyance to the proprietors of several establishments which had existed for many years in the Palais Royal. The complainants were not of a very interesting character, and had moreover been fully indemnified. The tribune Duveyrier cried out bitterly against this pretended injustice, and declared that there was an intention to render the national representation unpopular, by rendering it responsible for the severities committed in its name. Then passing to the choice of their place of assembly, he said, "I am not one of those who are offended, because the Tribune has been allocated to this spot, a spot the ordinary theatre of every species of excess and disorder. I see neither danger nor discredit likely to accrue to us from the selection. On the contrary, I give homage to the popular intention of those who decided that the tribunes of the people should sit in the midst of the people, that the defenders of liberty should be placed in the precincts which witnessed the first triumph of that liberty. I thank them for having given us the opportunity of beholding from this very tribunal, the place where the noble Camille Desmoulins, giving the signal for a glorious movement, hoisted that national cockade, our noblest trophy, our eternal rallying-point—that cockade which has witnessed the performance of so many prodigies, to which so many heroes owe the celebrity of their arms, and which we will lay down only with our lives. I thank them for having given us to see places which, should they wish to elevate an idol of some fifteen days, will recall to our minds the downfall of an idol of some fifteen centuries."

This sudden attack produced a lively sensation in the assembly, and very shortly in all Paris. The Tribune proceeded to the order of the day, the majority of the members disapproving such an outbreak. But the effect was none the less, and it was an evil opening for an assembly, which, if it wished to save liberty from the dangers which then threatened it, in consequence of a general reaction, ought to have used infinite management, both as regarded those spirits, ever prompt to take alarm, and the chief of a government as prompt to take offence.

Such a scene could not fail to have ill consequences. The rage of the First Consul was fiercely aroused, and the humble adorers of his growing power uttered fierce cries of anger. Messrs. Stanislas de Girardin, Chauvelin, and others, who did not indeed wish to abdicate all power to the new government, yet greatly disapproved this untimely opposition, spoke at the next sitting, and proposed, in order to correct the effect of the discourse of the tribune Duveyrier, to take a sort of oath to the constitution.

"Before proceeding to our work," said M. de Girardin, "I think that we ought to give the nation a distinguished proof of our attachment to the constitution. I will not propose to you to take an oath to support it. I know, and you all know, the fruitlessness of oaths; but I think it desirable that, on accepting our functions, we should promise to perform them loyally. Let us follow the example of the Conservative Senate and the Council of State, and thus we shall fix for ourselves the opinion which men shall hold of us. We shall thus silence the malevolence which spreads abroad the cry, even now, that the Tribune is an organized opposition to the government. No! the Tribune is not a focus of opposition, but a focus of light. No! the Tribune does not propose to strive without relaxation against the measures of the government. It is ready, on the contrary, to receive them with joy, when conformable to the public interest.

¹ CAMILLE DESMOULINS. One of the most unmitigated ruffians of the Revolution. A lawyer, born in Picardy, in 1762. His first appearance at the bar was to plead against his own father. He became the bosom friend of Robespierre, excited the people to arms at the Palais Royal, and invented the tri-colour cockade. He assumed the title of attorney-general of the lamp-post. He organized, with Danton, the massacre in the prisons in September. He defended the Duke of Orleans, and afterwards General Dillon, by which he lost his popularity. He was guillotined in 1794, and died raving and blaspheming. — Biographie Minère.

The incident alluded to in the text, is thus related by Alison. "The Palais Royal resounded with the cry to arms, and a leader of future distinction, Camille Desmoulins, armed with pistols, gave the signal for insurrection by breaking a branch of a tree in the garden, which he placed in his hat. The foliage was instantly stripped off the trees, and the crowds decorated themselves with the symbols of revolt." — Alison, i. 76.

The branches were changed for green cockades, and the tricolour was substituted, because green was the colour of the Comte d'Artois.

The Tribunal will exert itself to calm instead of exciting passions. Its moderation ought to interpose itself between all factions, to reunite them into one body, and dissolve their separate organization. It is the moderate men who brought about the 18th of Brumaire, that salutary and glorious day which preserved France from intestine anarchy and foreign invasion. Let us return, in order to preserve the republic, to the principles which gave it birth. But let us avoid returning to the excesses which have so often nearly destroyed it. If we see hence the spot where first men hoisted the signal of liberty, hence, also, we see the spot where were conceived all the crimes, which stained the Revolution with blood. I am far from applauding, on my part, the choice made of this palace for our sittings. I regret it rather. But, for the rest, the recollections which it recalls to mind are happily far aloof. The time of vehement harangues, of appeals to the seditious groups of the Palais Royal, has long passed away. Nevertheless, if certain declamations cannot now destroy us, they may at least retard the return of the state to perfect well-being. Resounding from this tribunal through all Paris, from Paris through all Europe, they may alarm the minds of men, furnish pretexts, and thus retard that peace which we all desire! Peace," added M. de Girardin, "Peace ought to occupy incessantly our thoughts, and when we hold that mighty interest always present before us, we shall no longer permit to ourselves such expressions as sell the other day from one of our colleagues, and which no one of us took up, because they had no application; for in France we recognise no idol." And the orator concluded his discourse, by asking that each tribune should make the following declaration: "I promise to fulfil faithfully the functions which the constitution has assigned to me."

This proposition was adopted. M. Duveyrier, vexed at the scandal which had arisen from his speech, endeavoured to excuse himself, and wished to be the first to make the declaration of which M. Girardin had given the first idea. All the members of the Tribunal hastened to take it after him.

The effect of the first scene was then somewhat repaired. The First Consul took an insurmountable aversion to the Tribunal, which he would have entertained, however, toward any free assembly, using and abusing the privilege of debate. He caused some very bitter observations to be inserted in the Moniteur concerning the tribunes of France and the tribunes of Rome.

The following sittings produced new manifestations, quite as much to be regretted as those which had gone before. The first proposition of the government was intended to regulate the forms to be used in the discussion and adoption of projected laws. This was one of those subjects which had been neglected by the constitution of the year VIII, and left to the legislature. The Tribunal was not, in the intended dispositions, the object of much consideration. The project of the government decreed that the laws should be carried by three councillors of state up to the Legislative Body, that they should then be communicated to the Tribunal, and that, on a fixed day, the Tribunal should be in readiness to discuss them by the voice of its three orators in the presence of the Legislative Body. Nevertheless, the Tribunal was given the privilege of demanding a delay from the Legislative Body, which had the power of deciding whether that delay should be granted. It must be admitted that in this respect the Tribunal was very much slighted, for it was insisted on that it should have performed its task on a stated day, a thing which no one would venture to require even of a section of the council of state, or of the office of a minister. No one at this day would permit himself to fix the day and the duration of any discussion to a deliberative assembly. That is a care left to its own intelligence, and to its zeal, if it be a matter of urgency. But parliamentary usages, which are, like politeness, the growth of custom, could not precede, with us the existence of a representative government. From revolutionary violence the state passed, almost without a period of transition, to military abruptness. The commissions, which had just ceased from exerting all their legislative powers within one month, had, by debating with doors closed, and by expediting laws within four-and-twenty hours, developed yet further the tastes of the First Consul, always desirous of being served and satisfied on the instant. This it is which may explain, without excusing, the inconceivable dispositions of the project of government.

The increasing opposition of the Tribunal, then, which resisted this project, was justified by the right. But, after having commenced operations by an unseemly outburst, it was unfortunate that it should have been compelled to resist the first project emanating from the consuls, for this gave it the appearance of being a faction determined to attack every thing; and to this misfortune was added another, in point of formality, which was vexatious. The most vehement attack proceeded from M. Constant. In a witty and ironical speech, such as he well knew how to deliver, he asked that the Tribunal should have a determinate period for the examination of the projected laws, which should be submitted to it, and that it should not be called to examine them on the instant. He called to mind, on this subject, the peril of those laws of urgency, passed during the Revolution, which had in all cases been disastrous laws. He asked why it was, that so much care was taken to bring the business of the Tribunal so quickly to a termination! why it was, that it was esteemed so hostile, that the passage of the laws through its chamber should be abridged to a minimum of time! "All this," he added, "arises from the false idea that we are a body of opposition, destined to do nothing else than annoy the government incessantly—a thing which is not true, which never will be true, and which will nevertheless weaken us in public opinion. This false notion has impressed all the articles of this project with an uneasy and unmeasured impatience. It has caused these propositions to be presented to us as I may say, on the wing, in the hope that we might be unable to grapple them. It is the desire of government to make them pass through our examination, as if through a hostile army, transforming them into law before we can attain them."

Many acute reflections were intermingled with his long speech, which produced a great sensation. M. Constant had taken especial care to maintain that the Tribunal was not a body especially devoted to contradiction, that it would act in the opposition solely when the public interest should force it to do so. But he had repeated these assertions in such a manner as to obtain no credence, and rather, indeed, so as to make the intent of systematic opposition, which he desired so strenuously, only the more evident.

The tribune, Riouffe, well known for his faithful and courageous friendship to the proscribed Girondists, was one of those men whom the horrors of '93 had so deeply shaken, that they were ready to cast themselves blindly into the arms of the new government, whatever that government might do. He judged it wisest then to refute the attacks of M. Benjamin Constant, which he considered to be ill-timed.

"Marks of distrust," said he, "as injurious as those to which we listened yesterday, would suffice to break off all ulterior intercourse in the relations of man with man; and it would be impossible that authorities destined to live and act together should long be able to treat one with the other, if regard to the decencies of intercourse were not held a sacred duty, from which they should never swerve."

The orator then declared that, for his part, he had the most perfect confidence in the government, and he undertook a true eulogium of the First Consul, but one far too long and far too unmeasured in terms. "When one orator," he said, "praises Camille Desmoulins in this place, and another the National Convention, I will not wrap myself in the silence of conspiracy. I also will praise him whom the whole world praises. Never having heretofore praised any virtue but that which was proscribed, I will now have a new sort of courage—that of extolling genius in the lap of victory and of power. I am proud to see at the head of the republic him who has won at the sword's point for the French nation the right to be styled the Great Nation; I will proclaim him great, clement, and just." M. Riouffe went on comparing General Bonaparte to Hannibal and Cæsar, until his legitimate but ill-timed admiration provoked unpleasant interruptions. Several voices cried out, "Speak of the laws." "I will speak," replied M. Riouffe, "of the man whom the universe admires!" "Speak of the law!" again cried the same voices, and he was compelled to return to his subject. Whether it was that M. Riouffe, provoked by the sincere, but diffuse and unskilful manifestation of his feelings, the impatience of those who interrupted him, or that the admiration which he expressed was not participated by the Tribunal, the effect produced by his speech was unfortunate. M. Chauvelin endeavoured to correct that ill-effect by a speech in favour of the projected law.

He confessed its defects. "But circumstances," he said, "Circumstances which surround us, the state of several departments, which may call for prompt and even urgent measures, powerful political considerations; the calumny which is watching us, the divisions among us, which she already takes delight in recording; the pressing necessity for union among the powers of the state; all these things should engage us to vote the adoption of the project which is presented to us."

The project was then put to the vote, and carried by a majority which ought to have satisfied the government. Fifty-four voices, against twenty-six, decided that the orators of the Tribunal, charged with the duty of speaking before the Legislative Body, should support the law proposed. The Legislative Body received it yet more favourably, and adopted it by a majority of two hundred and three, against twenty-three voices.¹ Nothing could have been desired more favourable. For, in fact, a majority of two-thirds in the Tribunal—a body, the opposition of which decided nothing, since it did not vote on the law—and a majority of nine-tenths in the Legislative Body—the only body whose vote was decisive—ought to have satisfied the First Consul and his adherents, and to have rendered them easy to this last manifestation of the liberal spirit, and indulgent to mere wrongs in matters of form, which, after all, are a right of liberty itself. But the First Consul, who could not be seriously alarmed, appeared to be wounded to the quick, and expressed himself with no sort of moderation or reserve. He began to make great use of the public press, and though he had no regard for it, he nevertheless knew well how to turn it to his own advantage. He caused a very unseemly article to be inserted in the Moniteur of January 8th—18th of Nivose—in which he started, himself, with the idea of demonstrating the want of consistency of this opposition, of proving that it would shrink from nothing that could annoy the government; and then proceeded to attribute this to a desire on the part of some minds to bring about a degree of perfection impossible under human laws; and, on the part of others, to a fondness for making an empty noise and tumult. "Thus," added the official paper, "every thing leads us to the conclusion, that there exists in the Tribunal no combined and systematic opposition—in a word, no real opposition. But every one is athirst for glory—every one wishes to commit his name to the hundred mouths of Fame, and some ignorant folks have not yet learned that consideration is less surely won by eagerness to speak well, than by constancy in serving usefully, if humbly, that public which alone judges and applauds."

This mode of treating one of the great bodies of the state, was unbecoming; it proved, on the part of the First Consul, a disposition to dare all, and, on the part of France, a disposition to endure all. Nevertheless, these impressions yielded rapidly to others. The vast works of the government, in which the Legislative Body and the Tribunal were called to co-operate, soon attracted the attention of all minds, and occupied them exclusively. The First Consul caused two projects of law of the highest importance to be laid before the Legislative Body. The object of one was the administration of departments and municipalities, and became the famous law of the 28th of Pluviose of the year VIII, which established administrative centralization in France. The object of the other was the organization of justice, an organization which has endured to the present day. To these two projects were added others relative to the emigrants, whose fate it was necessary to arrange quickly; to the right of making wills, the re-establishment of which all families demanded; to the tribunal of prizes, which must be erected on account of our relations with neutral powers; to the creation of new accountable officers, admitted to be necessary; and, to conclude, to the receipts and expenditures of the year VIII.

¹ This is not strictly correct. One hundred and eighty is the majority. Two hundred and three, and twenty-three, the votes. I do not choose, however, to alter the text.

The administration of France, as I have stated above, was, in 1799, in the most deplorable condition. There are in every country two kinds of business to be managed—that of the state, which consists in recruiting, taxation, works of general utility, and the application of laws—that of the provinces and communes, which consists in the transaction of all matters of local interest whatsoever. If a country be given up to itself, that is to say, if it be not ruled by a general administration at once intelligent and strong, its first business, that of the state, is not done at all; the second encounters, in the interest of the provinces or communes, a principle of zeal, it is true, but of zeal which is capricious, partial, unjust, and rarely enlightened. Administrations of provinces, or communes, do not surely lack the taste for occupying themselves with that which especially concerns them, but they are prodigal, vexatious, and always hostile to the rule of the community. The tyrannical extravagances of the middle ages had no other origin than this. As soon as the central authority has withdrawn itself from any country, there is no sort of disorder into which the local interests are not ready to cast themselves, their own ruin included. In 1789, the communes everywhere had enjoyed some liberty, and they were in a state of general bankruptcy. The most of the free towns in Germany, when they were suppressed in 1803, were utterly ruined. Thus, without a strong general administration, state business is not done at all, and local business is done ill. The Constituent Assembly, and the National Convention, after having successively remodelled the administrative organization of France, had come to a state of things at last, which was anarchy itself. Collective administrations, on all scales, perpetually deliberating, never acting, having at their elbows agents of the central government, charged to solicit of them either the expedition of state affairs, or the execution of the laws, but deprived of the power of acting themselves—such was on the 18th of Brumaire—the government of the departments and municipalities in its full force. As to the government of municipalities in particular, a sort of municipality of cantons had been invented, which added yet more to the general administrative confusion. The number of communes had been found too great, for it amounted to above forty thousand. Assuredly, the superintendence of so large a number of petty local governments, sufficiently difficult in itself, became impossible to authorities constituted as authorities then were. The prefects are sufficient to the duty now, with the aid of sub-prefects, but only by dint of great application. But let us imagine the prefects, without sub-prefects, and, in their place, small deliberative assemblies, and we shall comprehend the disorder existing under such an administration. These forty and odd thousand communes were reduced, then, to five thousand municipalities of cantons, composed each of the assemblage of several communes into one canton. It was supposed that, by thus combining several communes under one single government, a primary government would be given to them in the first place; and that, in the second, as being brought nearer to the central authority, they would be more subject to its superintendence. There arose from this a confusion more hideous than that which it was desired to bring to a close. These five thousand municipalities of cantons were too numerous, and too remote from the central authority, to be observed by it; and, without being brought near enough to the government, they were vexatiously removed to a distance from the population which they were destined to sway. The administration of communes is intended to be placed as near as possible to their own localities. The magistrate who verifies births, deaths, and marriages; who superintends the police, the salubrity of cities; who keeps in repair the fountain, the church, the hospital of the village or of the town, ought to reside in the village or the town itself—to live, in short, in the midst of his fellow citizens. These municipalities, then, of cantons, had brought about only a useless displacement of domestic authority, without having placed the local business sufficiently under the eyes of the government to allow its superintendence. Add to this, that nothing was done well in those days, owing to the disorder of the times, and it will be evident that this vicious form of institutions, combined with the vicious state of circumstances, necessarily produced confusion.

A last cause of disorder was yet superadded to the rest. It is necessary not only to administer the accounts of the state, and of the communes, but to judge them also. For citizens may have cause of complaint, either when in running a street or road encroachments are made on their property, or when in the valuation of their property, for assessment, it is unjustly valued. Under the ancient regime, the ordinary courts of justice, at that time the only check on the executive authority—as was very clearly expressed by the resistance of the parliaments to the court—the ordinary courts of justice had taken complete possession of all that which may be called the litigious part of the administration. This was a grave evil, for civil judges are ill calculated to the performance of administrative justice, from a want of comprehending its spirit. Our early legislators of the Revolution perceiving that difficulty, clearly thought, that they could solve the difficulty, by giving up all the litigious part of administration to the small local assemblies, to which they had assigned the administration itself. Let us imagine now these collective administrations filling the office of what we now call prefects, sub-prefects and mayors, charged with the performance of all their duties, and with the judgment of all the cases which now belong to the councils of prefecture, and we shall have a tolerable correct idea of the confusion which reigned then on all sides. Even with the spirit of order which is now prevalent, the results would be a chaos. But, when all revolutionary passions were added thereto, we can scarcely picture to ourselves what the chaos was. It was thus that the rolls of contribution never were completed; that the collection of the taxes was in arrear for several years; that the finances were in ruin, the armies in misery. Recruiting only was sometimes carried into effect; thanks to the revolutionary passions which had done the evil, but which had contributed in some degree to repair it; for having, as their principle, an ardent though ill-regulated love for France, her greatness and her liberty, they drove her population headlong into her armies.

It was to a country situated thus, that the First Consul came, as if really sent by Providence. His simple and just spirit, directed by an active and energetic character, might lead to the true solution of these difficulties. The constitution had set at the head of the state a legislative and an executive power: the executive power concentrated almost entirely into a single chief; the legislative power divided among several deliberative assemblies. It was natural to place on each step of the ladder of administration, a representative of the executive power especially empowered to act; and at his side, to control, or perhaps only to enlighten him, a small deliberative assembly, such as the council of a department, of an arrondissement, or of a commune. To this simple, clear, and fruitful idea is due the excellent administration which exists in France at this day. The First Consul proposed that there should be in each department a prefect, empowered not merely to solicit the expedition of state business at the hands of a collective administration, but to expedite it himself—empowered likewise to administer the business of the department, but this in concert with a council of the department, and with the resources voted by the council. As the system of municipalities of cantons was universally condemned; and as M. Sieyès, the author of all the territorial circumscriptions of France, had, in the new constitution, laid down the principle of circumscription by arrondissements, the First Consul thought it well to adopt this plan in order to get rid of the administration of cantons. First of all, the administration of communes was replaced where it should be, that is to say, in the commune, town, or village itself; and between the commune and the department there was created a step of intermediate administration; that is to say, the arrondissement. Between the prefects and the mayor, there grew necessarily then the sub-prefect, charged, under the superintendence of the prefect, with the direction of a certain number of communes, sixty, eighty, or a hundred, more or less, according to the importance of the department. To conclude, in the commune itself, there was a mayor, an executive power likewise, having by his side his own deliberative power in the municipal council; a mayor, a direct and dependent agent of the general authority, for the expedition of state business; and at the same time an agent of the commune as to local business, administering the latter in accordance with the council of the commune; always under the superintendence of the prefect, and sub-prefect, and therefore of the state.

Such is this admirable system of grades, to which France owes an administration incomparable for energy, for precision of action, for regularity of accounts, which is so excellent that it sufficed in six months, as will shortly appear, to bring back order to every part of France, under the impulsion, it is true, of a singular genius, that of the First Consul, and with the favour of circumstances, singular likewise—on every side, there was a wide-spread hatred of irregularity and thirst for order, a disgust for child's play and foolery, and a craving after prompt and positive results.

The question of the litigious portion, that is to say, of administrative justice, yet remained—what officer, namely, should be empowered to see that the contributions imposed should not be beyond the means of the contributor; that the proprietor bordering on a stream or a street should not be invaded or made subject to encroachment; that the contractor of town or state-works should find a judge of his bargains with the commune or the government. A difficult question this! the ordinary courts being admitted as improper for the performing this sort of justice. The principle of a wise division of powers was here employed with great benefit. The prefect, the sub-prefect, and the mayor, charged with the administrative action, might be suspected of partiality, might be inclined to lean toward their own pleasure, since those injured would usually have invoked their juridical power to decide on their own actions.

The councils of the department, the arrondissement and the commune, might be suspected likewise, for they too have generally an interest adverse to the complainant. To render justice, moreover, is a long and continuous work; again, there was no desire to have either permanent councils of departments or of communes. The first consuls wished that they should be assembled for fifteen days, once a year, just long enough to submit their own business to them, to take their advice, and to enable them to vote their expenses. It was necessary, on the other hand, that there should be an administrative tribunal sitting without interruption. A special court was therefore created a tribunal of four or five judges sitting with the prefect, judging with him, acting like a little council of state, enlightening the prefect on matters of justice, precisely as the Council of State enlightens ministers on the same, and still subject to the jurisdiction of the supreme council on appeals. These are the councils which are to this day styled the councils of prefecture, and of which the equity has never been contested.

Such was the government of provinces and communes throughout France. A single chief, prefect, sub-prefect, and mayor, expediting all business; a deliberative council, a council of department, of arrondissement, and of commune, voting the local expenses. Then a little judicial body, placed near the prefect only to perform administrative justice. A government absolutely subordinate to the general government in all state affairs, overlooked and directed, yet having its own views and powers as to the affairs of the departments and communes. Neither order, nor justice, have failed for a moment, since the creation among us of this beautiful and simple institution, that is to say, for half a century—it being understood that the words order and justice, like all other human words, have but a comparative value, and simply must be understood as saying, that, in France, under the head of administration, there is as little disorder, and as little injustice as can well be desired, in a great state.

The First Consul was naturally desirous that the prefects, sub-prefects, and mayors, should be appointed by the executive power, being in fact its direct agents, and it being proper that they should be fully imbued with its will. And as to local affairs, which they are bound to administer in accordance with local views, they were bound also to administer these in accordance with the general spirit of the state. But it would not have been natural that the executive power should nominate the members of the councils of departments, arrondissements, and communes, empowered to control the agents of administration, and to vote their supplies. The constitution itself justified that pretension, as it led to it. Confidence should arise from beneath, M. Sieyès had said; power should descend from aloft. According to that maxim, the nation gave its confidence by inscription on the lists of notability; the supreme authority conferred the power by choosing its agents on those lists. The Senate was empowered to elect all the deliberative political bodies. But the councils occupied about local interests were held to be a part of the general administration of the republic, and the executive power, according to the constitution, was bound to appoint them, chosen from the lists of notability. In virtue then of the spirit, and even of the letter of the constitution, the First Consul had the right of choosing, from the lists of notability of departments, the members of the councils of departments; from the lists of notability of arrondissements, the members of the councils of arrondissements; and, to conclude, from the lists of notability of communes, the members of the councils of communes. This power, which would have been excessive at any ordinary time, was at this moment necessary. Election, in fact, was impossible, for the formation of local councils, as it was for the formation of the great political assemblies. It would have produced nothing but fatal agitation, small alternating triumphs of extreme factions, instead of a peaceable and prolific fusion of all moderate parties—a fusion which was indispensable to the creation of a new society from the reunited fragments of an old society.

The judiciary organization was not less ably imagined. Its double end was to place justice within easy reach of those amenable to it, and at the same time to secure to them, above the local justice, should they choose to have recourse to it, a justice of appeal, distant, but set aloft, and possessing both light and impartiality, as consequences of the distance and the height of its position.

Our first revolutionary legislators had suppressed courts of appeal, in consequence of the hatred they bore to parliaments, and had placed a single tribunal in each department, offering a first degree of justice to those amenable in the department, and a second degree of jurisdiction, a tribunal of appeal, for the neighbouring departments. The appeal had its recourse, not from the lower to the higher tribunal, but from one, to another, adjacent tribunal. Above these were the justices of peace, and above these again the courts of cassation. The single tribunal in each department being oftentimes very far distant from those amenable, the cognizance of the justices of peace had been extended in order to save the citizens from having to resort too often to the chief court. Four or five hundred tribunals of correction had also been created, charged with the suppression of petty offences. The criminal jury sat at the chief place of the department with the central tribunal.

This judicial organization had failed as signally as the municipalities of cantons. The justices of peace, whose cognizance had been extended too far, were above their tasks. The justice of the first degree, by residing at the chief place, was situated too remotely. The court of appeal became almost illusory, because there is no meaning in appeal unless when it is directed to superior enlightenment. Sovereign courts, such as the parliaments were formerly, and as the royal courts of the present day, uniting in their own bodies eminent magistrates, and having around them a famous bar, present a superiority of knowledge to which men are tempted to recur, but to appeal from one tribunal of the first instance, to another tribunal of the first instance, is in itself absurd. The tribunals of police for correction were too numerous, and were, moreover, limited to a single employment. The First Consul, adopting the ideas of his colleague, Cambacérès, to whom he gave, on this occasion, the support of all his good sense and courage, caused the organization which exists to this day to be put into force. The circumscription of the arrondissement, which had just been imagined for the administration of departments, offered a great convenience for the administration of justice. It offered the means of creating a first local judiciary in the midst of those amenable thereunto, with a ready method of recourse to a judiciary of appeal, placed more remote, and higher. A tribunal of first instance was, therefore, created for each arrondissement, forming a first degree of jurisdiction. Then, without any fear of appearing to recreate the old parliaments, they took the measure of creating tribunals of appeal. One for each department would have been too much, as regards number; too little, as regards importance and height of jurisdiction. Twenty-nine were created, which gave them, in point of fact, nearly all the importance of the old parliaments, and they were assigned to the places which had formerly enjoyed the presence of sovereign courts. This was an advantage to restore, to places which had been stripped thereof. These were old depositories of judicial traditions, the fragments of which well deserved to be collected. The bars of Aix, of Dijon, of Toulouse, of Bordeaux, of Rennes, and of Paris, were foci of science and of talent which it was necessary to rekindle.

The tribunals of first instance, established in each arrondissement, were empowered at the same time to attend to the correctional police, which doubled their usefulness, and placed the civil and preventive justice both in the first degree within the arrondissement. Criminal justice, always intrusted to the jury, must needs reside at the chief place of the department, by means of judges detached from the tribunals of appeal, and coming round to direct the juries, or, in one word, to hold assizes. This portion was not completely regulated until a later period.

The justice of peace ought, in consequence of the preceding dispositions, to have been brought back to more limited powers. But the law destined for this reformation was delayed until the next session. For it was impossible to do every thing at once. But it was very desirable to preserve, while improving, that popular, paternal, expeditious, and cheap plan of justice. At the summit of the whole judicial edifice was still maintained with some modifications, and a repressive jurisdiction over all magistrates, the Tribunal of Cassation. This is one of the noblest institutions of the French Revolution; a tribunal which is not intended to judge, a third time, that which the tribunals of the first instance and of appeal have already judged twice; but which, leaving aside the base of the suit, interferes only when a doubt is raised on the true sense of the law; determines this sense by a series of decisions; and thus adds to the unity of the text emanating from the legislature, a unity of interpretation emanating from a supreme jurisdiction, and common to the whole territory.

It is, then, from the year 1800, that wonderfully prolific year, that our judicial organization dates. It has consisted, since that time, of about two thousand judges of peace, popular magistrates, dispensing justice to the poor man at a trivial expense—of about three hundred tribunals of the first instance, one to each arrondissement, dispensing civil and corrective justice in the first degree; of twenty-nine sovereign tribunals, dispensing civil justice on appeals, and criminal justice by detached judges, who go round holding their assizes in the chief place of every department; and, to conclude, of a supreme tribunal, placed above the whole judicial system, interpreting the laws, and completing the unity of legislation, by the unity of jurisprudence.

The two laws of which I have been speaking were too urgent and too well conceived to meet any serious opposition. They were, however, objects of more than one attack in the Tribunal. Very futile cavils were raised against the administrative system proposed. Little complaint was made of the concentration of authority in the hands of the prefect sub-prefect, and mayors, for that was conformable to the ideas of the time; and was imitated from the constitution, which set a single chief at the head of the state. But strong opposition was made to the creation of three steps in the ladder of administration: the departments, the arrondissement, and the commune. It was asserted especially, that the commune should not have been reconstituted, because there would be difficulty in finding mayors sufficiently enlightened. It was nevertheless the restoration of domestic authority, and, in that point of view, the most popular conception that can be imagined. As to the organization of the judiciary, an outcry was made concerning the restoration of Parliaments; and particular complaint was made touching the jurisdiction of the Tribunal of Cassation over the inferior magistrates: all objections unworthy of notice. Nevertheless, both the proposed laws were adopted. The twenty or thirty voices composing the regular opposition in the Tribunal, pronounced against these laws, but three-fourths of the whole declared in favour of them. The Legislative Body adopted them almost unanimously. The law relative to the administration of departments took the date, which has remained famous ever since, of the 28th of Pluviose of the year VIII. That relative to the organization of the judiciary bore date of the 27th of Ventose in the same year.

The First Consul, not wishing that they should remain a dead letter in the code of laws, immediately nominated prefects, sub-prefects, and mayors. He exposed himself indeed to the commission of several errors, as must always be the case when many functionaries are chosen hastily and at once. But an enlightened and vigilant government soon rectifies errors made in a first choice. Now the spirit of its selections was excellent; at once firm, impartial, conciliatory. The First Consul sought out, on all sides, men reputed honest and capable, excluding only the violent, and sometimes admitting even these, if experience and time appeared to have brought them back to that moderation which formed the essential character of his politics. He called to the prefectures, which were important and well-paid places—for the prefects were to receive 12, 15, and as much even as 24,000 francs salary, which was double the salary of the same appointments now—he called, I say, persons who had figured honourably in the great political assemblies, and who clearly displayed the intention of his selections. For me, if they are neither facts nor principles, at least represent both to the eyes of the people. The First Consul nominated to Marseilles, for example, M. Charles Lacroix, ex-minister of foreign affairs; to Saintes, M. Français de Nantes;¹ to Lyons, M. Vermilhac, an ex-ambassador; to Nantes, M. Letourneur, an ex-minister of the Directory; to Brussels, M. de Ponticoulant; to Rouen, M. Buegnot; to Amiens, M. Quinette; to Ghent, M. Faypoult, ex-minister of finance. All these men, and others—who were sought out in the Constituent and the Legislative Assemblies, in the Convention, and in the Five Hundred, who were taken from among the ministers, directors, and ambassadors of the republic—were appointed, in order to raise the character of these new administrative functions, and to give to the government of the provinces that importance which it deserves. Most of these men held their offices during the whole sway of the First Consul and the Emperor. One of them, M. de Jessaint, was still prefect but four years ago. The First Consul chose to the prefecture of Paris M. Frochot; and gave him as a colleague in the prefecture of police, M. Dubois, a magistrate whose energy was very serviceable in cleansing the capital from that swarm of malefactors which party-spirit had vomited into its bosom.

¹ I only give here approximative quantities, because the number of tribunals has varied considerably ever since that date, in consequence of the territorial changes which France has undergone. There are, for instance, at this moment but twenty-seven royal courts, or tribunals of appeal.—Author's note.

The same spirit prevailed in judicial appointments. Distinguished names, chosen from the ancient bar, and the ancient magistracy, were mingled, as much as possible, with recent names, borne by respectable people. When he could embellish his assemblies with celebrated names, the First Consul did not fail to do so, for he loved brilliancy in every thing, and the moment had arrived when he could, without too much danger, borrow from the past. A magistrate named D'Aguesseau headed the list of judicial nominations, as president of the Court of Appeals of Paris, now the Royal Court. These functionaries, as soon as appointed, were ordered instantly to take possession of their offices, and to play their parts in the work of re-organization, with which the young general was constantly occupied, on which he wished to found his reputation, and which, after his prodigious victories, constitutes, in fact, his most substantial glory.

It was necessary to attend to every thing at the same time, in this state of society, upstart, as it was, from its foundation. Emigration, at once so guilty and unfortunate—a fair subject of interest, at once, and abhorrence, since in its ranks there were found both persons cruelly persecuted, and false Frenchmen, who had conspired against their country—emigration, I say, required the particular attention of the government. According to the latest legislation, a decree of the Directory, or of the administrations of departments, was sufficient to place any individual on the list of emigrants. From that moment, the property of that absent individual was confiscated, and if he were found on the soil of the republic, the law decreed his death. A host of individuals, either real emigrants, or only men in concealment, who had not yet been inscribed on the fatal list, either because they had been forgotten, or had not encountered an enemy to denounce them, might still be placed thereon. To place them thereon at once, it was only necessary that such an enemy should appear, and they must then fall beneath the stroke of the laws of proscription. Many Frenchmen lived, therefore, in continual anxiety. As for those who had been inscribed on the lists, properly or improperly, they arrived in great numbers, to procure the erasure of their names. Their rash eagerness attested the confidence they placed in the humanity of the government, while it alarmed certain revolutionists, some of whom were conscious of past excesses, committed upon the persons, while others of them had acquired the property of returning emigrants. This presented a new occasion for disorder; and if it were no longer just to proscribe, neither was it just to expose men, who had taken part in the Revolution, even violently, to a life of anxiety. Absolute security was due to those who had exposed themselves in its cause; for, unfortunately, men are either cold egotists or passionate partisans of the cause they embrace, and in the latter case moderation is not their usual merit.

The call was urgent to provide a remedy for such a state of affairs. The government presented the draft of a law, the first enactment of which was intended to close the famous List of Emigrants. From and after the 4th of Nivose of the year VIII—December 25, 1799—the day on which the constitution went into effect, the list was declared closed; that is to say, that all absence in fact, subsequent to that period, should no longer be deemed emigration, subjecting parties to the penalties thereof. It became lawful in future for any one to absent himself, to pass from France to foreign parts, or from foreign parts to France, without criminality. For it is true, that, during the last ten years, for any one to absent himself was a crime. Liberty to come and go was thus restored to all citizens.

To this first enactment was added the following: individuals more or less liable to be accused of emigration, some of whom had quitted momentarily the territory, others of whom had concealed themselves solely to escape persecution, and who, fortunately, had been omitted from the list of emigrants, could no longer be placed there, except by a decision of the proper tribunals, that is to say, of a jury. To these persons, also, this was, in some sort, a closing of the list, for there was no danger of its being increased by the addition of fresh names, under the prevailing feeling of the tribunals.

In short, while those who had not been in-

¹ FRANÇAIS DE NANTES, a municipal officer there in 1791, when he was sent from the Lower Loire to the Legislative Assembly. There he immediately drew much attention, but was forgotten in the reign of terror.

In 1793 he was re-elected by Isère to the Council of Five Hundred, and was its president in 1799. At a later period than that of the text he was called to the Council of State.—Biographie Moderne.

scribed were left to the tribunals, thus securing to them proper justice, the administrative authority took charge both of those who had been improperly inscribed, and of those who, insisting that they had been so, now claimed the right to be stricken from the list. In this appeared the indulgent feeling of the new government toward them; for the new administrative authorities, imbued with its feeling, could not fail to receive with alacrity claims of this character. To present certificates of residence in any part of France—certificates often false—sufficed in fact to prove that the parties presenting them had been unjustly declared absent; and thus to procure their erasure from the list. Aided by the general inclination which tended to the violation of tyrannical laws, this method was sure to succeed. And in addition to this, emigrants who sought to procure this result, were permitted to return to France under the superintendence of the high police. In the language of the day, this was called "obtaining superintendence:" many availed themselves of the advantage, and the most anxious emigrants obtained in this way the means of anticipating the moment of their erasure from the list. This superintendence became, indeed, to those who availed themselves of it, in the end, absolute restoration. As regarded those emigrants whose names could not be erased from the fatal list, because of the notoriety of their emigration, the existing laws were maintained. The spirit of the time was such that it was impossible to do otherwise; for though compassion was felt for the unfortunate, strong feeling existed against the guilty, who had left the soil in order themselves to bear arms against their country, or to excite the arms of foreigners against her. Besides, under all circumstances, stricken or not stricken from the list, no emigrants had claims upon their property which had been sold. These sales were irrevocable, as well by virtue of the constitution as by the provisions of the new law. Those emigrants only who succeeded in causing their names to be erased, and whose property had been sequestered, and not sold, could reasonably hope to have it restored.

Such was the law proposed, and adopted by an immense majority, notwithstanding some opposition in the Tribunate, by those who deemed it too favourable, and by some who thought it not favourable enough, on the subject of emigrants.

Among the number of legal enactments then in force, and deemed an intolerable tyranny, was the interdiction of the right of testamentary disposition. The existing laws permitted the disposition, by will, of the tenth of the testator's fortune, if he had children, and of the sixth part if he were childless. These enactments were the result of the early revolutionary indignation against the abuses of the ancient French society—an aristocracy, in which paternal vanity sought at one time to enrich an eldest child, at another to outrage the affections of other children, by ill-assorted unions, plundering some to enrich the others. Through an excitement natural to the human mind, instead of restraining the paternal power they had enchained it completely. A father had no longer the power either to reward or to punish. He could, if he had children, dispose of hardly any thing in favour of that one which had deserved all his affection; and, what was more extraordinary, a testator, if he had only nephews, or great-nephews, could only bestow upon them the very trifling portion of a sixth of his fortune. It was a direct outrage on the rights of property, and one of the rigorous measures of the revolutionary regime which was most severely felt; for death is of daily occurrence, and thousands of the dying expired, without power to fulfil the wishes of their hearts toward those by whom they had been attended, nursed, and consoled in old age.

It was impossible, with a view to the reform of such a state of things, to await the preparation of the civil code. A law was passed to establish the right of testamentary disposition with certain limitations. By virtue of this law, a dying father who had less than four children, might dispose of a fourth of his fortune; of the fifth, if he had less than five; and so on in the same proportion. A testator might dispose of the half of his estate, where he had only relations in the ascending lines or collaterals, and the whole of it when he had no relations capable of inheriting at all.

This measure was that most severely handled in the Tribunate; particularly by Andrieux, an honest, sincere man, but possessed of more wit than knowledge. He insisted that they were about to return to the abuse of the right of primogeniture, to all the constraints of the old regime upon the children of a family, &c. The law passed, however, as did the others, by an immense majority.

The government next re-established, by law, a prize court, which had become indispensable to render impartial justice to neutrals, and to bring them back, by better treatment, to intercourse with France. Finally, the attention of the two assemblies was called to the laws of finance.

There was little to be said upon this subject in the Legislative Body; two legislative sections having already reported the necessary laws. The administrative labours which the government had undertaken, in consequence of these laws, with the view of reorganizing the finance, were hardly fit matters for discussion. It was, nevertheless, necessary, for form's sake, to prepare the budget of the year VIII—1799. If the receipts had been regular, if the taxes imposed had been paid with exactitude, and not only paid by the taxables, but faithfully accounted for to the receiver of public moneys, the finances of the state would have been in a wholesome condition. The ordinary taxes might produce about 430,000,000*fr.*; and that was the amount to which it was expected that the public expenses might be reduced in time of peace—the government flattered itself that it would be able to reduce them to much less. Experience, however, soon proved that it was impossible, even in time of peace, to reduce them to less than 500,000,000*fr.*; but it proved, at the same time, that it was easy to raise the taxes to that amount, without augmenting the rates. Putting out of the question the expenses of collection, and incidental charges, the budget at this period would amount, reckoning as is done at the present day, to 600,000,000*fr.* or 620,000,000*fr.*

The insufficiency of the receipts was only great and certain in regard to the expenses of the war; and in this there was nothing extraordinary, for it is so everywhere. No country can ever carry on war with the ordinary revenue of peace. If it could be done, it would amount to proof, that, in time of peace, the taxes had been needlessly increased. But, thanks to the confusion of the past, it was unknown whether, in case of war, the budget would be raised to 600,000,000*fr.*, 700,000,000*fr.*, or 800,000,000*fr.* Some said 600,000,000*fr.*, others 800,000,000*fr.* Every one, as regards this subject, made different conjectures. Experience, indeed, proved that with about 150,000,000*fr.* added to the ordinary budget, the demands of war could be met, at all events with victorious armies, who subsisted on the territory of the enemy. The budget of the year, therefore, was estimated at 600,000,000*fr.*, both of expenses and receipts. The ordinary revenues amounted to 430,000,000*fr.*, and arrears existed of 170,000,000*fr.* This did not, however, constitute the real difficulty. It would have been too much to expect not only to escape from a financial chaos, but immediately to attain an equilibrium of receipts and expenses. The ordinary taxes must first be collected. If this result could be obtained, a certainty would exist of procuring all that would be necessary to meet the most pressing demands, as credit would very promptly revive, and with the assets of different kinds, the creation of which has been heretofore mentioned, the means were at hand to obtain from capitalists the funds necessary for all branches of the administration. It was to this end that M. Gaudin laboured incessantly, aided, against all the difficulties he encountered, by the powerful and steady will of the First Consul. The administration of direct taxes recently established, exhibited the greatest activity. The lists were much advanced towards completion, and already in a course of collection. The obligations of the receivers-general began to be received at the treasury, and were discounted at a reasonable rate. The embarrassment, in regard to this system of obligations, always was the amount of the old paper circulation, which it was difficult to ascertain, especially as regarded each office of general receipt. A receiver-general, who was entitled to receive 20,000,000*fr.*, for example, could not sign obligations for that sum, if he reckoned on having 6,000,000 or 8,000,000*fr.* tendered to him in certificates of arrears, or of requisition, &c. The minister endeavoured to call in this sort of paper, so as to form a calculated average of the amount likely to be presented at every office of general receipt, and to take the obligations of the receivers-general for the amount of specie funds, the receipt of which might be reckoned on at their several offices.

During this same session was created a new class of accounting officers, intended to produce increased accuracy in the rendition of the treasury funds. These were the receivers of each arrondissement. Until this period, there had existed no other intermediate officer between the tax-collector, in direct communication with the tax-payer, and the receiver-general, the head of the operation, unless it were the overseers of receipt—agents of the receiver-general, dependent upon him, and telling the truth only to him. It was, nevertheless, one of the points of transition, at which it was the easiest to observe and calculate the entrance of receipts into the public coffers. This point, however, was unhappily neglected. Special receivers were appointed in every arrondissement, dependent on the state, owing to it the account of what they received and transmitted to the receiver-general, well-informed and disinterested witnesses of the movement of the funds; for it is not they, who derived advantage from the stagnation of the public moneys in the coffers of the accountable officers. By this creation, the advantage of being accurately informed on the state of finances was gained; as well as that of acquiring fresh securities convertible into cash, a thing which now would be of no moment, but which was then important. Furthermore the advantage of finding yet another use in the circumscription of territory into arrondissements, which had but recently been imagined, is to be added to the rest. Already civil and corrective justice, and a considerable share of the administration of the communes had been established in the centre of each arrondissement; by assigning to the same a share also of financial administration, a farther utility was given to that circumscription, at which certain spirits had been inclined to take umbrage, as being a merely arbitrary subdivision of territory. Since, however, on certain accounts it was held to be indispensable, it was the best plan to multiply the uses to which it could be applied, proving thus the reality of that, which, it was insisted, was purely artificial.

The prefects and sub-prefects had orders to hold themselves near the receivers, and to watch, by the inspection of their books, over the correctness of their accounts. We are fortunately no longer reduced to such necessity, but at that period, when every thing was in a mere model form, it was a useful incitement to the accountable officers, to send the prefects and sub-prefects to examine their coffers.

The reorganization of finances could not therefore be advanced more rapidly. But assemblies never appreciate results, until fully realized. All the real benefits that were wrought were not discoverable from the inner seats of the administration. Discussions were held within the Tribunal on the great question of the equilibrium of receipts and expenditures, by much talking at random; complaints were made concerning the deficit; and a thousand systems were proposed, and there were some minds so insensate as to propose that no vote for laws of finance should be taken until the government had found a method of settling the receipts and expenditures in equilibrio. But all these propositions brought about no grand result.

The laws were adopted, as they were proposed; by a great majority in the Tribunal, almost unanimously in the Legislative Body

A institution, worthy of historical mention, was also added to those, of which we have already recorded the creation. This was the Bank of France. The old establishments of discount had fallen, amid the disorders of the Revolution. It was not possible, however, that Paris could do without a bank. In every centre of commerce, wherein there is a certain degree of activity, there must be a monetary accommodation for payments, that is to say, a paper money, and an establishment which discounts commercial bills on a great scale. These two services mutually aid each other, for the funds deposited, in payment of bills of exchange, are the same which are applied to commercial loans in the way of discount. Everywhere, in fact, where there is the slightest commercial activity, a bank must succeed, if it discounts none other than good paper, and if it does not put into circulation an excess of notes. In one word, if it proportions its operations to the true necessities of the place in which it is situated. It is this, which it was necessary to do in Paris, and which, if well done, must of necessity succeed. This new bank was intended to carry on, in addition to its transactions with individuals, transactions with the treasury also, and consequently to receive as great benefit therefrom, as therefor it should perform service. The government called forth the principal bankers of the capital, at the head of whom stood M. Perregaux, a financier whose name is connected with all the great services done to the state; and of them was composed an association for the creation of a bank, which was called the Bank of France, the same which exists to this day. A capital of 30,000,000 was made up for it. Its government was to be by twelve agents, and a directing committee, of three, for which committee a governor was substituted at a late day. It was intended, according to its statutes, to discount commercial bills representing real transactions, but not bills of accommodation; to circulate bank notes redeemable in cash, and to keep itself aloof from all speculations, other than those of discounts and exchange. Faithful to its statutes, it has become the finest establishment of its kind known in the world. It will soon be perceived what it was, that caused the government to give the operations of that bank an impulse so rapid as to decide its prosperity from the first days of its existence. While the consular government, in concert with the Legislative Body, was devoting itself to these grand works of internal administration, the negotiations with foreign powers, whether friendly or belligerent, were continued without interruption. The letter of the First Consul to the King of England was followed by an immediate reply. The First Consul wrote on the 26th of December—the 5th of Nivose. He received an answer on the 4th of January—the 14th of Nivose. It was to this effect, that the English cabinet had already chosen its part, and had no room left for deliberation. England, in truth, might, in 1797, well think of treating and of sending Lord Malmesbury to Lisle, when her finances were embarrassed, when Austria was compelled to sign, at Campo Formio, the peace of the whole continent. But now, when the creation of the income-tax brought back ease and plenty to the Exchequer, now, when Austria was in a state to renew the war with us, and had advanced her armies over to our frontiers; now, when there were prospects of taking from us Malta and Egypt, and of avenging the disaster of the Texel, peace was naturally not much to the taste of that power. She had, besides, a yet stronger reason than this for refusing. It was, that war suited both the passions and interests of Mr. Pitt. This celebrated chief of the British cabinet had made the war with France his mission, his glory, the very foundation of his political existence. If peace should become necessary, it would perhaps become necessary that he should retire. He brought to this struggle that tenacity of character, which united to his oratorical talents, had rendered him a statesman, not very enlightened but very powerful.

The reply could not be doubtful, it was negative and ungracious. The English cabinet did not even do the First Consul the honor of addressing this reply directly to him, excusing themselves by the custom, which by the way is an excellent one, of communicating between minister and minister; they replied by a note from Lord Grenville to M. de Talleyrand. This note, maladroitly, suffered it to appear how much Mr. Pitt was annoyed by this challenge, not to war but to peace, addressed by the First Consul to the King of England. It contained a recapitulation, which had been reproduced eternally for some years, of the causes which led to the commencement of the war. It imputed the first aggression to the French republic, reproached it, in violent language, with the ravages committed in Germany, in Holland, in Switzerland, in Italy; spoke even of the individual acts of plunder committed by generals in the latter country. It added to this reproach, that of wishing to overthrow everywhere, the throne and the altar. Then, coming to the last overtures of the First Consul, the English minister said that these feints of pacific demonstrations were not the first of the same kind; that the different revolutionary governments, successively raised to power, and overthrown within the last ten years, had several times made similar overtures; that his majesty the King of Great Britain could not perceive, in what was passing in France, any change of principles, sufficient to satisfy and tranquillize Europe; that the only change, which could completely reassure it, would be the restoration of the house of Bourbon; that thereby only would it be made apparent that social order was no longer endangered; that, for the rest, the reinstatement of that house would not be absolutely insisted on as a condition of peace with the French republic, but that, until new symptoms should arise, more significant and more satisfactory, England would persist in the war, as well for her own security as for that of her allies.

This unbecoming note, which was disapproved by all sensible men of all countries, did little honour to Mr. Pitt; it showed that he was actuated by passion rather than by reason. It proved that a new government, in order to be respected, must have been very often victorious; for the actual government had gained many victories, and those glorious, yet evidently it had need of more, and those more decisive. The First Consul was not, however, disconcerted, and wishing to profit by the good position which his moderate counsel had given him in the eyes of the world, replied gently but firmly, not again in the form of a letter to the king, but of a despatch directed to Lord Grenville, the minister of foreign affairs. Recapitulating, in a few words, the first events of the war, it proved, with great reserve of language, that France had taken arms solely to resist a European conspiracy, formed against her safety. Admitting the evils which the Revolution had brought upon the whole world, it insinuated, transiently, that those who had attacked the French republic with such bitter fury, might justly reproach themselves as the cause of much of its violence, so often deplored. But, it added, to what good end all these reminiscences? Here is now a government well disposed to put an end to war. Is the war to be eternal, because this or that party was the first aggressor? And, if it be not desired to render it eternal, must there not first be an end made of these endless recriminations? Assuredly it cannot be expected that the re-establishment of the Bourbons can be forced upon France. Is it then becoming to make insinuations similar to those which have been thrown out? What would be said, were France, in her communications, to insist on the restoration of the Stuarts to the throne of England, whence they were ejected only in the last century? But leaving, on one side, these irritating questions, added the note dictated by the First Consul, if you deplore as we do the ills of warfare, let us agree on an armistice; let us designate a town, Dunkirk, for instance, or any other at your option, where our negotiators may meet. The French government puts its passports at the disposal of Great Britain for the ministers whom she may invest with powers to treat.

This calmness of attitude produced the ordinary effect which coolness in one man produces on another in a passion. It provoked, from Lord Grenville, a reply, more keen, more bitter, and with worse reasoning than his first note. In his reply, the English minister endeavoured to palliate the error he had committed in alluding to the house of Bourbon; he answered that it was not for them that England waged war, but for the security of all governments; and declared anew, that hostilities would be carried on without relaxation. His last communication was dated the 20th of January—30th of Nivose. There was not a word more to be said. General Bonaparte, confident in his own glory, had not feared to offer peace. He had offered it without much hope, but in good faith, and he had gained by this step the double advantage of discovering, to the eyes of France, and to those of the English opposition, the unreasonable passions of Mr. Pitt. Happy would it have been, if, in all times, he had combined with his power moderation of conduct so ably calculated as was this.

The communications of Austria were couched in language more becoming, but without giving any greater hope of peace. That power, not believing that the intentions of the First Consul, though pacific, could extend to the length of abandoning Italy in her favour, was resolved to maintain the war. But knowing the conqueror of Castiglione and Rivoli, knowing that she could not reckon surely on victory against such an adversary, she did not choose to shut the door against all possibility of future negotiations.

As if Austria had an understanding with England as to the form, the emperor's reply to the First Consul was conveyed in a note from M. Thugut to M. de Talleyrand. That despatch bore the date of January 15th, 1800—25th of Nivose. The base was the same with that of the English notes. The war, it said, was carried on only to preserve Europe from a general earthquake; nothing more was desired than to see France well disposed to peace. But what guarantee could she give of her new dispositions? It was admitted, withal, that more moderation, both at home and abroad; more stability of views, and more fidelity to engagements undertaken, were hoped for, under the First Consul; and farther, that more chances would result therefrom of a solid and durable peace. This change was to be expected from his great talents. But without saying it directly, it was insinuated that when he should be fully established they would then think of negotiating.

The First Consul acted toward Austria, as he had done toward England. He would not hold himself satisfied by that evasive style of explanation; and, without allowing himself to be discouraged by the vagueness of the reply, determined on compelling the cabinet of Austria to explain itself positively, and either to accept or refuse the proffered peace categorically. On the 28th of February—the 9th of Ventose—M. de Talleyrand was instructed to write to M. Thugut, offering to take for a base of negotiations the treaty of Campo Formio. This treaty, said he, was an act of great moderation on the part of General Bonaparte, toward the Emperor of Austria. For, having it in his power, in 1797, to exact great sacrifices from that prince, by the menacing position of the French army at the gates of Vienna, he had, in the hope of a durable peace, preferred moderate advantages, to others more extensive. He had even, added the French minister, incurred, by his favourable dispositions to the Imperial court, the anger of the Directory. M. de Talleyrand farther declared that the house of Austria should receive in Italy those compensations, which, by the treaty of Campo Formio, had been promised to her in Germany.

In order to comprehend the bearing of the First Consul's propositions, it is necessary to recall to mind that the treaty of Campo Formio conceded to France, Belgium and the Luxembourg; to the Cisalpine republic, Lombardy, the Mantuan territories, the Legations, &c.: and that Austria received Venice and the greater part of the Venetian states. As to the frontier of the Rhine, embracing, besides Belgium and the Luxembourg, the countries comprised within the Meuse, the Moselle, and the Rhine, in a word those which we now call the Rhinish provinces, Austria was bound to mediate for their concession to France by the Germanic empire. Austria yielded on the spot, so far as she was concerned, the country of Falkenstein, situate between Lorraine and Alsatia, and bound herself to open to the French troops the gates of Mayence, which she held under the empire. Austria, in compensation, should receive the bishopric of Salzburg, on the side of Bavaria, when the ecclesiastical provinces should be secularized.

These different arrangements ought to have been negotiated at the Congress of Rastadt, so tragically terminated, in 1799, by the assassination of the French plenipotentiaries.¹ Such was the treaty of Campo Formio.

In offering this treaty as the base of a new negotiation, the First Consul did not then touch upon the question of the frontier of the Rhine, so far as concerned the Rhenish provinces. He only decided the question of Belgium, irrevocably ceded to France, leaving the question of the Rhenish provinces to an ulterior negotiation with the empire; and in offering the compensations in Italy, which previously had been stipulated for Germany, he insinuated that the successes gained by Austria in Italy should be taken into consideration, so as to place that country in a better state as regarded Austria. He added that, for the secondary European powers, a system of guarantees should be stipulated, such as should re-establish in all its force that right of nations, on which rested essentially the security and happiness of nations. This was an allusion to the invasion of Switzerland, of Piedmont, of Tuscany, of the States of the Pope, and of Naples, for which the Directory had been so much reproached, and which had been made the pretext of a second coalition. It was a very clear offer to re-establish those different states, and thus to reassure Europe touching the pretended invasions of the French republic.

Nothing more could be conceded. It required even all the urgency of obtaining peace, which France at that time felt, to induce the First Consul to make such offers, and as he never did things by halves, he addressed to Austria, as he had done to England, a formal proposition for an armistice, not merely on the Rhine, where an armistice at that time existed, but on the Alps and Apennines, where it did not as yet exist.

On the 24th of March—3d of Germinal—M. de Thugut replied, in terms otherwise very moderate, that the treaty of Campo Formio, violated as soon as concluded, did not contain a system of pacification which could reassure the belligerent powers, that the true principle, adopted in all negotiations, was to take as a base the state in which the fortune of arms had left each power; and that this was the only base which Austria could accept. M. de Thu-gut added, that, before proceeding farther, he had an explanation to demand in relation to the form of the proposed negotiation; that it was material that he should know whether France would be willing to admit negotiators from all the states at war, in order to arrive at a general peace; the only peace which could be sincere and secure; the only peace in fact to which Austria could accede. This language presented two things—first, that Austria, in insisting on the actual state, as the starting point of negotiation, that is to say, on the state in which the last campaign had left each party, entertained great pretensions to Italy; and secondly, that she would not separate herself from England, to which power she was strictly bound by the treaties of subsidy. This fidelity to England was on her part a duty owing to her position, which influenced, as will appear hereafter, the fate of the negotiations and of the war.

Such a reply, although couched in seemingly terms, left little hopes of an amicable understanding, since it left the conduct of a power well disposed to listen to terms of peace dependent on the conduct of a power resolved to listen to no terms at all. Nevertheless, General Bonaparte caused a new reply to be made, that in offering the compensations in Italy, which had previously been stipulated for Germany, he had implicitly proposed to commence not from the status ante bellum, but from the status post bellum, that is to say, to give Austria credit for her successes in Italy; that the overtures which he had made to England proved the sincerity of his desire to render the peace general; that he had little hope of any negotiation common to all the belligerent powers, for that England was not desirous of an accommodation; but that he purely and simply admitted the propositions of Austria: that he waited for her nomination of a place where they might treat, and that, since, the war was destined to proceed, such place must be designated, without the theatre of operation.

Austria replied that, such being the intentions of the French cabinet, she would proceed to consult the allies, but that, until she had done so, it was impossible for her to designate any precise spot. This was, in fact, to postpone the negotiation indefinitely.

The First Consul, in addressing these overtures to England and to Austria, never laboured under any illusion as to their probable result. But he had chosen to try pacific measures, first, because he wished for peace, regarding it as necessary to the organization of the new government; and secondly, because he thought that, after such a step, he should stand better in the judgment of France and of Europe. His calculations were fully justified by that which followed in the English parliament.

¹ The three ministers, Jean Debry, Bonnier, and Robergeot, set out at nine in the evening of the 9th of Floreal—April 28. They occupied three carriages with their families. They were followed by the Ligurian legation, and the secretaries of the legation. At first an objection was made to permit them to leave Rastadt, but at length all obstacles were removed, and they were allowed to depart. They were scarce fifty paces from Rastadt, when a troop of Szeckler hussars rushed upon them with drawn swords, and stopped the carriages. That of Jean Debry was the first. They opened the door, and asked in a semi-barbarous jargon if he was

Jean Debry. On his reply in the affirmative, they seized him by the throat, dragged him out of the carriage, and in the presence of his wife and children, fell on him with their sabres. Believing him to be dead, they went to the other carriages and murdered Robergeot and Bonnier in the arms of their families.—Thiers's History of the French Revolution.

This crime was long attributed to the court of Austria; but I have positive evidence that the queen of Naples and the colonel of the Szeckler hussars were the sole authors of the murder.—Duchess d'Angoulême.

Mr. Pitt, by his brutal manner of replying to the overtures of France, drew down upon himself violent and well founded attacks. Never was the opposition to Messrs. Fox and Sheridan more full of noble inspiration. Never had it cast forth a broader lustre, or deserved more justly the esteem of honest men in all countries.

The continuation of the war, in fact, had very few motives; for England was in a position to obtain at that time all that she reasonably could desire. Doubtless she could not have obtained the release of Egypt, but submitting as she did a few months later to leave it to us—ulterior negotiations will prove this fact—she might as well have consented to it at once; she would thus have preserved her Indian conquests, and avoided the risk of vast dangers, to which her obstinacy afterward exposed her. It was owing, therefore, to ministerial interests only, that the British cabinet resolved to carry on the war to the utmost. The reclamations of the opposition were earnest and incessantly reiterated. It insisted on, and obtained the production of the papers relative to the negotiation, and thereupon followed violent debates. The ministers maintained that it was useless to negotiate with the French government, because there was no security in treating with it—that it had succeeded, by its breach of faith, involved itself in war with the whole world, Denmark and Sweden alone excepted, and that its relations, even with the latter of those countries, were endangered; that every peace concluded with that government had been faithless and fatal, witness the states of Italy; that, after having been the aggressor against all the princes in Europe, it had aimed at dethroning them all, for it was devoured by an incessant thirst for destruction and conquest; that General Bonaparte offered no surer guarantees than his predecessors; that, if the new government was no longer terrorist, it was still revolutionary, and that, with French Revolution, neither peace nor truce could be hoped; that, if it could not be crushed, it might at least be exhausted, until it should be so far weakened as to present no cause of apprehension. The English ministers, Lord Grenville especially, employed, with regard to the First Consul, language the most insulting. They had applied none more severe even to Robespierre.

Messrs. Fox, Sheridan, and Tierney, the Duke of Bedford and Lord Holland, replied, with the strongest reason, to all these allegations—"You ask, who was the aggressor," said they, "and what matters that? You say that it is France; and France says that it is England. Is it, then, necessary to maintain internecine war, until both nations shall agree on a point of history? And what matters it, who is the aggressor, if that party, which is accused thereof, be the first which offers to lay down its arms? You say, that it is useless to treat with France, yet yourselves sent Lord Malmsbury to Lillie to treat with the Directory. Prussia and Spain have treated with the French republic, and have had no cause for complaint. You speak of the crimes of that government, yet your ally, the court of Naples, commits crimes, more atrocious than those of the convention, since she has not the excuse of popular excitement. You speak of ambition; but Russia, Prussia, and Austria, have divided Poland—but Austria has reconquered Italy, without restoring to their states the princes dispossessed by France—yourselves, you take possession of India, of part of the Spanish colonies, of all the Dutch colonies. Who shall dare to say, that one is less interested than another, in this strife of avarice and rage, kindled among all states? Either you will never treat at all with the French republic, or you will never find a moment more favourable for doing so than this; for a man powerful and implicitly obeyed has seized the power, and seems disposed to use it with justice and moderation. Is it worthy the English government to load with outrage an illustrious individual, the chief of one of the greatest nations in the world, who is, at least, a great captain, be the virtues or the vices what they may, which after-times shall bring to light in his character? Unless it be confessed that Great Britain, her blood, her treasure, all her resources, the most precious, are to be wasted for the re-establishment of the house of Bourbon, no good reason can be assigned why we should now refuse to treat."

No answer could be made to arguments so cogent and so true.¹ Mr. Tierney, profiting by the blunder of the English ministry, when speaking in its notes of the re-establishment of the house of Bourbon, made a special proposition relating to that house. He proposed to issue a formal declaration for separating the cause of England from that of the Bourbons, so fatal to both countries, to Great Britain, he exclaimed, as much so as to France. "I have heard," he continued, "I have heard many of the partisans of Mr. Pitt's administration say that the French government having offered no collective negotiation, it was justified in refusing an isolated negotiation, which could only have weakened us, by separating us from our allies; but I have not seen one who did not blame severely this mode of fixing the termination of this war at the re-establishment of the house of Bourbon!" And it is true, as Mr. Tierney said, that all the world did blame that blunder; and that the cabinet of Austria, less passionate than that of England, took good care not to imitate it. The English ministers replied, that they had not presented that condition as absolute or indispensable. But it was replied to them again, that the mere indication of it was a violation of the right of nations, and an attempt on the liberty of nations. And what should you say, cried Mr. Tierney, repeating the argument of the French cabinet, what should you say were General Bonaparte, victorious, to declare that he would not treat but with the Stuarts? "Moreover," he added, "is it from gratitude to the house of Bourbon that you would lavish on them our treasures and our blood? Do you remember the war with America? Is it not rainer for the principle it represents, that you are striving! Do you desire then to unchain against yourselves those passions which raised all France against the Bourbons? Are you about to bring upon your hands all those who would have no more nobles, all those who would have no more tithes, no more feudal rights; all those who acquired national property; all those who have borne arms these ten years for the French Revolution? Do you desire then to shed, to the last drop, the blood of so many Frenchmen, before you think of negotiating? I demand formally," said Mr. Tierney in conclusion, "that England separate her cause from that of the Bourbons."

¹ This is disingenuous! answers were made. How cogent and how true, those who are curious to inquire will find in Alison, li. 62. They are too long for quotation.

On another motion, the celebrated Sheridan, always the boldest, the most witty of orators, brought the debate to bear upon the sorest point of the British cabinet, the expedition to Holland, in consequence of which the English and the Russians, conquered by General Brune, had been compelled to capitulate. "It seems," said Mr. Sheridan, "that if our government cannot conclude treaties of peace with the French republic, it can at least conclude capitulations. I call upon it to explain for what motives it signed the evacuation of Holland." Mr. Dundas, when challenged, gave three reasons for the expedition to Holland. The first, to detach the United Provinces from France; the second, to diminish the maritime power of France, and augment that of England, by seizing the Dutch fleet; the third, to make a diversion in favour of the allies; and he added that the British cabinet had succeeded in two out of three, since it had captured the fleet, and had contributed to the winning the battle of Novi, by drawing into Holland the troops destined for Italy. The minister had scarcely finished speaking, when Sheridan, pouncing on him with unequalled vigour, cried, "Yes, you believed the reports of emigrants, and risked an English army upon the continent only to cover it with shame. You desired to detach Holland from France, and you have attached them more closely than ever, by the hostile seizure of her fleet and her colonies. You hold, you say, the Dutch fleet; but you do so by an unheard of and odious proceeding, by encouraging the revolt of its crews, and showing a most fatal spectacle, that namely of sailors in mutiny against their leaders; thus violating that discipline which constitutes the strength of naval forces, and is the glory of our nation. Thus you have stolen that fleet ignominiously, but not for England. In any case, it is for the stadholder that you hold it; since you have been compelled to admit that it belongs to him and not to England. To conclude, you have assisted, you say, the Austrian army at Novi; it is possible that you may have done so; but do you boast, you, the ministers of the king of Great Britain, of having saved an Austrian army by suffering an English army to be slaughtered?"

Virulent, however, as were these attacks,

¹ Because he was backed by a vast majority, nearly four-fifths, in the House of Commons, in its turn backed by the voice of at least four-fifths of the nation. The vote on this debate was two hundred and sixty-five to sixty-four.

they did not prevent Mr. Pitt from obtaining immense financial resources, nearly eleven hundred millions—almost twice the amount of the French budget at that period; with authority to subsidize Austria and the states of southern Germany; with important additions to the income tax, which already produced 180,000,000*l.* per annum,² with a new suspension of the habeas corpus, and, to conclude, with the great measure of the union of Ireland. But men's minds in England were deeply moved by so much reason combined with so much eloquence.

Reasonable men throughout all Europe were also struck by the wrongs which were committed against France, and ere long, victory uniting with justice, Mr. Pitt was made to expiate by cruel humiliations the audacious haughtiness of his political conduct toward the First Consul. Nevertheless Mr. Pitt possessed the power of furnishing the coalition with means for carrying on a new campaign—a campaign, it is true, which was to be the last, in consequence of the exhaustion of all the belligerent parties, but at the same time the most desperate, for the very reason that it was the last.

At this grave juncture the First Consul was desirous of deriving from the court of Prussia all the advantage that could be gained at the moment. That court could only, in the face of adversaries so powerful, have brought about a peace, by imposing it on them through the means of an armed mediation—a part by no means impossible for her to play, but entirely beyond the views of the young king, who was labouring to recruit his treasury and army, while every power around him was exhausting its resources. That prince had already sounded the belligerent powers, and had found them so far from any concert of views, that he had renounced the idea of mediating between them. Moreover, the Prussian cabinet had itself interested views. It was desirous that France should exhaust Austria, and exhaust herself at the same time, by a prolonged struggle; but it was also desirous that she should give up a part of the frontier of the Rhine, and, contenting herself with Belgium and Luxemburg on that side, should not claim the Rhenish provinces. It strongly urged this on the First Consul, saying, that France and Prussia, if less contiguous, would be more harmonious, and that the European cabinet, reassured by this moderation, would be better disposed to peace.

But although the First Consul was extremely cautious with regard to the declaration of his intentions on this point, he had at the bottom little hope of gaining it on this point; and the Prussian cabinet did not perceive in all this the prospect of a peace so satisfactory as to induce it to much exertion. It gave therefore much advice, wrapped up in dogmatical forms, but it took no action.

² The budget stood—
Receipts	£39,512,000
Expenditures	37,920,000
Showing an excess of receipts of £1,592,000

² Both sums in the text are francs. The income tax for 1800 was £25,300,000.

Nevertheless this cabinet might still be very useful in the maintenance of the neutrality of the north of Germany, in causing the adhesion of the greatest possible number of German provinces to this neutrality, and lastly, in detaching the Emperor Paul entirely from the coalition. As to these matters, it acted in them zealously, because it was desirous of confirming and strengthening the neutrality of the north of Germany, and, above all, of bringing over Russia to its own system. Paul, ever exaggerated in his feelings, was becoming daily more irritated against Austria and England; he said aloud that he would soon compel Austria to replace the Italian princes on the thrones of Italy, which she had reconquered with Russian arms—that he would force England to restore the order of Malta in that island-fortress, of which she was ready to take permanent possession. He entertained, indeed, a strange passion for that ancient order of chivalry, and had made himself its grand-master.

He blamed the manner in which the overtures of the First Consul had been received in London and Vienna, and in his communications—now become confidential—with the court of Prussia, he suffered it to escape him, that he could have wished such overtures to be addressed to his own person. The First Consul had not, however, dared to take this step, for fear of the consequences which might have followed from a character like that of the czar. Prussia, well informed on all these points, communicated them to the cabinet of France, which turned them to its own advantage.

Before opening the campaign, for the season of military operations was approaching, the First Consul invited M. de Sandoz, the Prussian minister, to an interview, and had a perfect and positive explanation with him, on the 5th of March—14th of Ventose. After recapitulating, at some length, all that he had done for the re-establishment of peace, and all the evil proceedings and invincible obstacles which had been thrown in his way, he disclosed the extent of his military preparations, without, however, revealing the depth of his combinations, and suffered the Prussian minister to catch a glimpse of the vastness of those resources which yet remained to France. He then declared to him, that, full of confidence in Prussia, he expected from her new efforts toward a reconciliation between the belligerents, while he should be engaged in warfare; and that, in default of a general peace, little likely to occur before a new campaign, he looked for two services at the hands of King Frederic William, the reconciliation of the republic with Paul the First, and a direct attempt to detach the Elector of Bavaria from the coalition.

Make up the difference between Paul and us, said General Bonaparte, and at the same time determine the Elector of Bavaria to refuse his soldiers and his territory to the coalition, and you will do us two great services, which we shall not forget. If the elector accede to our requests, you may promise him all the consideration he can desire during the war, and the best treatment on the establishment of peace.

The First Consul exposed also his ulterior objects to the Prussian ambassador. He declared to him that the treaty of Campo Formi, being the basis proposed for future negotiations, the frontier of the Rhine would be a question to be discussed with the empire at an after period; that the independence of Holland, Switzerland, and the Italian States should be formally guaranteed, without explaining himself as to the point whereat the Rhine should cease to be the frontier of France. He said that no one could imagine that France would recede from it on this side Mayence, but that above Mayence, the Moselle, or the Meuse, might possibly be adopted as a line. Belgium and Luxembourg were, of course, beyond dispute. He added farther, that if Prussia should perform the services for France which she had the power of performing, he would engage to leave a great degree of influence, in the negotiations of peace, to the court of Berlin. This was indeed the point on which Prussia was the most tenacious, for she desired much to have a hand in these negotiations, in order to the establishment of the German frontiers in a mode better suited to her own views.

This communication, therefore, full as it was of point and candour, had the best effect possible at Berlin. The king replied, that with regard to the Emperor Paul, he had already employed his good offices, and would employ them farther yet to attach him to France; that as to Bavaria, surrounded on every side by Austria, he had no power; but that if the Emperor Paul should declare himself, it might perhaps be possible, by the joint influence of Russia and Prussia, to withdraw the elector from the coalition.

It only remained, therefore, after these well-concerted steps, to commence hostilities as speedily as might be. The season had not, however, completely arrived; and it was evident that it must be later this year than usual, because France had to reorganize her armies, partially dissolved, and Austria had to fill up the space left in the ranks of the coalition by Russia's defection. The First Consul was of opinion, then, that the time had come wherein to put an end to the war in La Vendée—first, in order to close the hideous spectacle of a civil strife; secondly, to render disposable, and transport to the Rhine and Alps, the excellent troops which La Vendée had hitherto detained in the heart of the republic.

The messages sent by him personally, to the insurgent provinces, concurring with the offers of peace made to the authorities, had produced a most powerful effect. Those messages had been backed by an imposing force of about 60,000 men withdrawn from Holland, from the interior, from Paris itself. The First Consul had carried his boldness so far as to remain himself in Paris, then filled with the boiling scum of all parties, with but 2,300 men as a garrison; and this very boldness he augmented by making it public. For as a reply to the English ministers, who pretended that the consular government was not more solid than those which had preceded it, he caused a comparative statement to be published of the forces then in London and in Paris; the result being this, that London was guarded by 14,000, and Paris by 2300 men. This force was barely sufficient for the maintenance of the ordinary police stations, which watch over the safety of public institutions, and the dwellings of high functionaries. It was evident that the name of General Bonaparte was the safeguard of Paris.

Be this as it might, the insurgent provinces found themselves suddenly surrounded by a formidable army, and thus placed in the alternative of accepting an immediate and generous peace, or enduring a war of extermination, they could not delay in choosing their part. Messieurs d'Andigné and Hyde de Neuville, after having seen the First Consul, had recovered from all their illusions, and believed no longer that he intended the restoration of the Bourbons. Nor did they believe either that they could succeed in conquering such a man. M. Hyde de Neuville, who had been sent by the Count d'Artois¹ to judge of the state of matters, determined on returning to London, not wishing personally to abandon the cause of the Bourbons, yet satisfied of the impossibility of prolonging the war, and leaving his advice to the leaders, to do that which the necessity of the time and places rendered inevitable to them all. M. d'Andigné returned to La Vendée to report what he had seen.

The term of the armistice was on the point of arriving. It was necessary, then, that the leaders of the royalist party should either sign a definitive peace, or decide to commence, on the instant, a death-struggle with a formidable army. In 1793, in the first enthusiasm of the insurrection, they had been unable to conquer the 16,000 men of the garrison of Mayence, and had but succeeded in fighting desperate and bloody battles, to yield after all. What could they now accomplish against 60,000 of the best troops in the world, one half of whom had just driven the Russians and English into the sea? Nothing evidently, and this was the universal opinion in the insurgent provinces. At least it was everywhere more or less general in each of them. On the left bank of the Loire, between Saumur, Nantes, and the Sands, in short, in old La Vendée, exhausted in men and substance, the weariness of warfare was extreme. They there considered the last armed rising, which had been brought about only by the united severity and weakness of the Directory, as, what it was in truth, an act of gross folly. On the right bank, about Mans, a district which, like the other, had been the seat of a desperate struggle, the same feelings prevailed. In Lower Normandy, where the insurrection was of a later date, where M. de Frotté, a young, active, wary, and ambitious leader commanded the royalists, there was a stronger disposition to continue the war. It was the same in Morbihan, where the distance from Paris, the vicinity of the sea, the face of the country, all offered more resources, and where a chieftain of fierce and invincible energy, Georges Cadoudal, supported the courage of the people. In these two provinces, more frequent intercourse with the English contributed to render the resistance of the natives more obstinate.

From one end to the other of La Vendée and Brittany, all was doubt whether side to choose. The emigrants, paid by England, whose devotedness consisted in continually passing to and fro, and who had not to dread the consequences of insurrection, were violently at issue with the inhabitants of the country on whom weighed the burden of this everlasting civil war. Those, maintaining that it was necessary to carry on the civil war; these, on the contrary, that it was indispensable to bring it to a close. These, representatives of an English, rather than a royalist interest, asserted that the consular government, like all the previous revolutionary governments, must needs perish, after a few days of flattering appearances—that it must perish through the disorders of the finance and the administration—that the Russian and English armies would send a detachment into La Vendée, to offer aid to the French royalists—that the latter needed now but a few days of patience, to gather the fruits of eight years of struggles and warfare—and that by persisting they would probably have the honour of leading the Bourbons, in triumph, back to Paris.

The insurgents, who did not retire habitually to London, to live there on English money, who remained on the spot with their peasantry, and saw their estates ravaged, their houses burned, their wives and children dying of cold and hunger—these replied that General Bonaparte had never failed in anything that he had undertaken. Instead of believing that all was hurrying to dissolution, they held, on the contrary, that all was advancing to reorganization in the fortunate hand that newly swayed the republic—that this republic, which the others pretended to be worn out, had already sent an army of 60,000 men against them—that the much vaunted English and Russians had already laid down their arms before one half of that army—that it was an easy matter to frame fine projects in London, to talk of devotion and constancy at a distance from the scene of action, events, and consequences—that on these points, it would be wise to spare lecturing those who had for eight years endured all the miseries of the most frightful civil war. Among these exhausted royalists, some even went so far as to insinuate that General Bonaparte, in his assiduous aim at public good, after having re-established peace, put an end to persecution, and rebuilt the altar, would perhaps also restore the throne. And the tales were repeated, which no longer found credence with the leading royalists, since the interviews of Messieurs d'Andigné and Hyde de Neuville with the First Consul, but which had still retained some credit in the lowest ranks of the insurgent population, and which contributed to conciliate their feeling towards the government.

There was in the heart of La Vendée a simple priest, the Abbé Bernier, curate of Saint Laud, a man destined ere long to take a part in the affairs of the republic and the empire, who, by the influence of great intellect and natural ability, had gained a great ascendancy over the leaders of the royalists. He had seen, close at hand, the whole of this long insurrection, which had ended in calamities only. He judged the cause of the Bourbons lost, at least for the moment, and believed that there was no hope of saving aught from the general anarchy produced by the French Revolution, except the ancient altar of Christianity. Enlightened on this head by the recent acts of the First Consul, and by frequent communications with General Hédouville, he had no longer any doubts; and he reckoned that—by submission—peace, remission of persecution, and toleration at least, if not protection of their worship, might be obtained. He therefore urged submission on all the old leaders of the left hand shore, and by his own influence silenced the tale-bearers who went and came between La Vendée and London. A meeting took place at Montfaucon, and there, in a council of officers, the Abbé Bernier prevailed on M. d'Autichamp, a young gentleman full of courage, but respectful to the superior intelligence of others, to lay down his arms in behalf of the province. The capitulation was signed on the 18th of January—28th of Nivose. The republic promised a perfect amnesty, respect for religious creeds, abandonment of taxation, for some time, in the desolated provinces, and the erasure of all the royalist chiefs from the list of emigrants. The royalists in their turn promised complete submission, and a general laying down of arms.

¹ CHARLES PHILIPPE, brother of Louis XVIII.; afterwards Charles X.

On the same 18th day of January, the Abbé Bernier wrote to General Hédouville, "Your wishes and mine are accomplished. At two o'clock to-day peace was gratefully accepted at Montfaucon, by all the chiefs and officers of the left bank of the Loire. The right bank will doubtless follow this example, and the olive of peace will ere long replace on both banks of the Loire the gloomy cypresses which war has planted there. I entrust Messieurs de Bauroulier, Duboucher, and Renou, to carry you this happy news. I recommend them to your indulgence, and to that of your government. Falsely inscribed on the fatal lists of the year 1793, they have been stripped of all their property. They made that sacrifice to the exigencies of the times, and nevertheless wished for peace. This peace is your work. Maintain it, general, by justice and mercy, your glory and your happiness depend thereon. In order to accomplish your beneficent views, I will do all that depends on me. Wisdom commands, humanity desires it. My whole heart is devoted to the country I inhabit, and its happiness is the first of my wishes.

BRUNIER."

This example produced its effect. Two days afterward, the insurgents on the right bank, commanded by a brave old gentleman, M. de Chatillon, who were, like him, disgusted that they should serve the views of England, rather than the cause of royalty, surrendered all old Vendée, which was thus pacified. Unbounded was the joy, both in the country places where royalty reigned, and in the towns, which, on the contrary, a revolutionary spirit had pervaded. In several towns, such as Nantes and Angers, the royalist chiefs, wearing the tricoloured cockade, were received with triumph and cherished as brothers. On all sides they began to lay down their arms, and to submit in good faith, under the influence of an opinion which gradually became general; namely, that the war, without bringing back the Bourbons would only end in the effusion of blood, and the devastation of the country; while submission, on the other hand, would procure repose security, and the re-establishment of religion the thing, above all others, most devoutly to be desired. The pacification, however, encountered more obstacles in Brittany and Normandy. The war in those parts, as we have just said was of more recent origin, and had exhausted the courage of the inhabitants in a lesser degree; there, moreover, profitable things, shameful advantages, were gained by war, whilst in La Vendée nothing came of it but suffering and disaster. It was in the centre of Brittany, and toward the side of Normandy, that all the Chouans had sought an asylum; that is to say, those men whom insurrection had habituated to violence and robbery, and who could not now dispense with those habits or lay them aside. They waged war more against the coffers of the wealthy, against the public conveyances, and the acquirers of national property, than against the republic. They were in correspondence with a set of scoundrels, established in Paris, and from them received the information that directed their expeditions. In short, in Morbihan, which was the strongest hold of the insurrectionists, Georges, the only one of the Veudean chiefs really inexorable, was receiving English gold, that substantial succour, which maintained his resistance, and therefore was little disposed to submit. But preparation was made to crush those of the royalist chiefs who would not surrender.

On the 21st January—1st Pluviose—General Chabot, violating the armistice, marched on the bands in the centre of Brittany, commanded by Messrs. de Bourmont and De la Prevalaye. Near the commune of Mélay he attacked M. de Bourmont, who at the head of 4000 Chouans vigorously defended himself, but he was at length obliged to yield to the republicans, accustomed to conquer soldiers of a very different order from the poor peasantry. Having exposed himself to the greatest dangers, he contrived to escape, though not without much difficulty. Soon afterwards forced to acknowledge that he could do no more for his cause, he gave up his arms on the 24th January—4th Pluviose. General Chabot then marched upon Rennes, that thence he might direct his march on the lower end of Brittany, where General Brune was concentrating a great force. The 25th January—3d Pluviose—several columns having marched from Vannes, Auray, Elven, under Generals Harty and Gency, met Georges' bands, at Grand Champs. The two republican generals had directed convoys of grain and cattle upon Vannes, which they had forcibly taken in the insurgent country. The Chouans, aiming at the recovery of this convoy, were surrounded by the escorting columns, and in spite of the most vigorous resistance, lost 400 of their men, in slain, several of their chiefs, and were utterly routed. Two days afterward, on the 27th, 300 Chouans perished in a severe affair.

at Heni ebon, and all hopes of the insurrection were completely destroyed. Upon the coast, and close in shore, were an English 80 gun ship and some frigates, which had opportunity of seeing how chimerical were the illusions with which the British government had been flattered. For the rest, they had reciprocally deceived each other; the British government, in promising a new expedition, similar to that of Holland, and the Bretons in announcing a general rising. Some royalists recently landed had great difficulty in getting on board the English squadron in the boats, and were received as emigrants who had promised much and done little. Georges saw himself compelled to lay down his arms, and gave up 20,000 muskets and 20 pieces of cannon, which he had just received from the English.

In lower Normandy, M. de Frotté, a young chief of much devotion to the cause, was, after Georges, the most resolute of all the royalists for the maintenance of the war. He was pursued by Generals Gardanne and Chambarlhac, detached from the garrison of Paris. Many sharp affairs took place on different points. On the 25th January—5th of Pluviose—M. de Frotté was attacked by General Gardanne at the forges of Cossé, near De la Motte Fouquet, and lost many of his people. The 26th—6th of Pluviose—one of the chiefs named Duboisgny, was attacked in his chateau of Duboisgny, near Fougeres, and experienced, like M. de Frotté, a considerable loss. At length, the 27th—7th of Pluviose—General Chambarlhac surrounded some companies of Chouans in the neighbourhood of St. Christophe, and put them all to the sword. M. de Frotté, seeing, like the others, but unfortunately too late, that all resistance was impossible, before the numerous columns which had assailed the country—even M. de Frotté thought it was time to surrender. He wrote to General Hédouville, who was at that moment at Angers, to ask for peace, and, while waiting for the answer, he proposed an armistice to General Chambarlhac. The latter answered, that not having the power to treat, he would apply for it to the government, but in the mean time could not take upon himself to suspend hostilities, unless M. de Frotté should consent immediately to deliver up both his men and arms. This was precisely what M. de Frotté most dreaded. He willingly consented to submit, and to sign a momentary truce, but on condition of retaining his arms, so that he could seize, at some future moment, the first favourable occasion, and re-commence the war. He even wrote letters to his lieutenants, in which, in ordering them to surrender, he recommended them to keep their arms. During this lapse of time the First Consul, irritated by the obstinacy of M. de Frotté, issued orders to give him no quarter, and to make an example of him. M. de Frotté, uneasy at not receiving an answer to his proposal, now became desirous to put himself in communication with General Guidal, commanding the department of the Orne, and was arrested with six of his people, while he was endeavouring to see him. Letters found upon him, containing the order to his people to surrender, but to retain their arms, were held proof of treachery. He was conducted to Verneuil and brought to a court martial. The news of his arrest arriving in Paris, a crowd of persons, interested in his behalf, beset the First Consul, and obtained a suspension of the proceedings against him, which was tantamount to a pardon. But the courier who brought the order of the government arrived too late. The constitution was suspended in the insurgent departments, M. de Frotté had been summarily tried, and when the reprieve arrived, this young and valiant chief had already undergone the penalty of his obstinacy. The duplicity of his conduct, although clearly proved was not sufficiently culpable to prevent deep regret at such an execution; the rather that it was the only one which stained this happy termination of the civil war.

From that day forth the departments of the west were entirely pacified. The wisdom of General Hédouville, the vigour, and promptitude of the means employed, the exhaustion of the insurgents, the mixture of confidence and the fear with which the First Consul inspired them, brought about this rapid pacification. It was completely terminated by the end of February, 1800—the first days of Ventose. The disarming took place everywhere. Some robbers only remained in action on the highways, whom active and unsparing justice would soon put down. The troops in the west were again put en route for Paris, to aid the vast designs of the First Consul.

The constitution, suspended in the four departments, the Lower Loire, Ille-et-Vilaine, Morbihan, and the Côtes du Nord, was re-established in all its vigour, and the greater part of the chiefs who had just laid down their arms were successively induced to visit Paris, for the purpose of bringing them in contact with the First Consul. For he well knew that it was not enough to deprive them of their arms; but that it was necessary to control their highly excited spirits, and to direct them to a noble end. He desired to carry along with him the royalist chiefs, in that immense career which was opening at that time to all Frenchmen, to conduct them to fortune, and to glory, by that path of danger which they had long been accustomed to pursue. He caused them to be invited to visit him. His renown, which inspired all, who had the opportunity, with the greatest desire of approaching him; his benevolence, which already had been much lauded in La Vendée, and which they had yet to invoke in favour of the numberless victims of the civil war, were so many honourable motives to induce the royal chiefs to visit him. The First Consul received them graciously, first of all, the Abbé Bernier; then Messrs. de Bourmont, D'Autichamp, de Chatillon, and at last Georges Cadoudal himself. He received the Abbé Bernier with marked distinction, and resolved to attach him to himself, by employing him in the intricate and difficult affairs of the church. He conversed frequently with the military chiefs in the most touching terms, and induced some of them to take service in the French arms. He even succeeded in gaining the heart of M.

de Chatillon. That gentleman retired from public life, married, and became the invariable and influential advocate of his fellow-citizens, when they had any act of justice or humanity to solicit at the hands of the First Consul. It is glory, clemency, and benevolence, that ever terminate revolutions.

Georges alone resisted this powerful influence. When he was conducted to the Tuileries, the aid-de-camp deputed to introduce him felt so apprehensive, in consequence of his repulsive aspect, that he would not shut the door of the First Consul's apartment, but kept silently peeping in to see what was passing. The interview was long. In vain did General Bonaparte make Georges' ears to re-echo with the words, country and glory; in vain did he try even the seductive bait of ambition on the heart of this wild soldier of the civil war; he succeeded not, and was convinced himself of the fact, as he scanned the visage of his visitor. Georges, on quitting him, took his departure for England with M. Hyde de Neuville. Frequently, when relating his interview to his travelling companion, displaying his brawny arms, he exclaimed: "Of what a folly was I guilty, that I did not strangle that man in these arms."

This prompt pacification of La Vendée produced an important effect on all minds. Some ill-intentioned persons, who were not disposed to account for it by natural causes, that is to say, by the energy of physical, and by the wisdom of moral, means, and above all by the influence of the First Consul's mighty name, pretended that there were secret articles in the treaty with the Vendéans, by which they were promised important compensations. Men did not speak out openly; they insinuated that it would perhaps be much more than the re-establishment of the principles of the ancient regime, much more than that even of the Bourbons themselves. It was the tattling newsmongers of the revolutionary party, who uttered these ridiculous fables; but men of sense better appreciated the acts of General

Bonaparte, saying, that people did not perform such mighty acts for others; and they believed that, if he did not exert himself entirely for France, it was at least for himself, and not for the Bourbons, that he strove. For the rest, in the eyes of all the world, the pacification of La Vendée was the most fortunate of events, portending a peace more important and more difficult,—a peace with Europe. Before opening the campaign for this year, the First Consul had made haste to bring the session of the Legislative Body to a close, and to press the adoption of many drafts of laws, which he had presented. Some members of the Tribunal complained of the rapidity with which they were made to debate and to vote. "We are," said the tribune Sedillez, an impartial and moderate man, "we are dragged into a whirlwind of urgency, the rapid movement of which is directed towards the object of our own desires. Would it not be better to yield to the impetuosity of this movement than to risk the shackling of its progress? Next year we shall be able to examine these bills so lately presented to us more at our leisure, and to amend those that require improvement." In fact every thing proceeded rapidly toward the object which the First Consul had proposed to himself. The laws were no sooner passed than put in execution. The functionaries who were appointed hastened to their posts. The new prefects entered at once on their duties; and the administration everywhere acquired a unity of action, and an activity never before witnessed. The contributions in arrears now flowed into the treasury; since the consolidation and order, established in the different parts of the administration, guaranteed to the contributors the legality of the collections. Day after day, new measures more and more clearly marked the political progress of the government. A second list of proscribed emigrants had just obtained the benefit of a recall from exile. The names of distinguished authors figured in this list: Messrs. de Fontanes,¹ De la Harpe,² Suard,³ Sicard,⁴ Michaud,⁵ Fiévée,⁶ were

¹ FONTANES, L. DE NIORET. One of the ablest literary men of France, and of the most decorous in politics. In 1790, he wrote a secular poem on the festival of the 14th of July. During the reign of terror, he had the courage to present a petition in favour of the inhabitants of Lyons. After the 9th of Thermidor, he was made professor in the central schools of Paris. Was proscribed in September, 1797, but recalled after the 18th of Brumaire, and returned to Paris, where he assisted Esminard, Laharpe, and Chateaubriand in editing the Mercur. He pronounced Washington's panegyric. His best works are a translation of Pope's Essay on Man, of some fragments of Lucretius, and a poem called the Orchards.—Biographie Moderne.

² LA HARPE, JEAN FRANÇOIS DE. A French dramatist of eminence. His father was a Swiss captain of artillery in the French service. He commenced his literary career, in 1759, by some heroic epistles; at twenty-five published his tragedy of Warwick, which created greater expectation than his later works justified. He translated Camoëns's Lusiad, and Suetonius's Emperors, the last but little esteemed. His best work was his Course of Literature. In 1792, he was a vehement declaimer in favour of liberty, but the reign of terror opened his eyes. He was imprisoned as a suspected person, and came out a strong defender of religion. In 1794, he spoke boldly against the crimes of the Revolution, was proscribed, and sentenced to deportation in September, 1797, but escaped being sent to Guilenne, and was recalled as above.—Biographie Moderne.

³ SICARD, JEAN BAPTISTE ANTOINE. A French miscellaneous writer, born at Besançon, in 1733. Was editor of the Journal de Paris. During the Revolution, he published a work, called Nouvelles Politiques, which, professing to oppose democracy, was suppressed, and the author banished. He was recalled as above. He translated Robertson's Charles V. and History of America.—Encyclopædia Americana.

⁴ SICARD, ROCH AMBROISE CUCURRON. Successor of the Abbé L'Epée, at the Parisian Institution for the deaf and dumb. Born near Toulouse, in 1742, he entered holy orders, but soon devoted himself to the education of the deaf and dumb. In 1786, was a director of a deaf and dumb school at Bordeaux, and in 1789, was appointed successor to L'Epée. In 1792, he was arrested in the midst of his pupils, and narrowly escaped the September massacres. On the foundation of the normal school, he was appointed professor of grammar. He afterward conducted the Annales Catholiques, for some articles in which he was proscribed and recalled as above.—Encyclopædia Americana.

⁵ MICHAUD, JOSEPH, a man of some literary fame, and well known as a violent partizan of the Bourbons. Born in 1771. In 1791, began to write in the royalist journals. Was in danger, and obliged to conceal himself during the reign of terror. While editor of the Quotidienne, he was sentenced by a military commission, and forced to fly, but afterward was enabled to return. Sentenced to deportation to Cayenne after the 18th of Fructidor, he contrived to escape to the mountains of Jura, and was recalled as above.—Encyclopædia Americana.

⁶ FIEVÉE, son to the postmaster of Soissons. He was at first a printer. In 1792, published a comedy called the Rigours of the Cloister; and in 1793, a pamphlet on the

recalled from their exile, and authorized to leave their retreats. The members of the Constituent Assembly, known to have voted the abolition of feudal institutions, were exempt from all the severities with which the Convention and Directory had overwhelmed them. One celebrated man, but proscribed on the 18th Fructidor, a negotiator and signer of the first treaty of peace of the republic, the ex-director, Barthélemy,¹ was, on the proposal of the consuls, named senator. To conclude, another victim of proscription of the same date, recently recalled from exile, and shortly after named inspector of reviews, was now called to the ministry of war, in the place of General Berthier, who had departed to take the command of one of the armies of the republic. The name of Carnot was at that time a great military name, which was connected with the recollection of the victories of the Convention of 1793, and much as the name of Bonaparte was calculated to make the coalition tremble; that of Carnot, added to his, still produced a decided sensation at foreign head quarters. The session now drawing to a close, the opposition of the Tribunal made a last attempt, which caused some agitation, although rejected by a great majority. The Legislative Body could only sit four months. There was, however, no term assigned to the sessions of the Tribunal. This last body could, therefore, meet, although the termination of the session of the Legislative Body left it unemployed. It was proposed to fill up the time with petitions, which it alone was authorized to receive, and with a declaration of the projects which it was empowered to put forth. M. Benjamin Constant proposed to assign these petitions to distinct commissions, to keep them continually occupied, and by this means to keep in their hands not merely the power of debating on all the acts of the government—a thing in itself very legitimate—but the power of debating on them permanently throughout the whole year. This proposition was rejected in all its important bearings. It was decided that the Tribunal should meet once a fortnight, to hear a report of petitions, and that this report should be made by the bureau of the Assembly, composed of the president and secretaries. Reduced to this, the proposition had nothing that could produce uneasiness. With the exception of this last attempt, the end of the session was perfectly peaceable, even in the Tribunal; the projects of government had obtained even there such a majority, that a great degree of susceptibility must have existed in him who should find fault with an opposition of twenty members.

The First Consul, well disposed to endure no opposition, judged it the best to give himself no trouble on the subject. Thus this first session of the year VIII, as it was called, by no means realized the apprehensions which certain propagators of bad news had affected to spread abroad. Had affairs continued in this state, this last phantom of deliberative assemblies must necessarily have been tolerated. That frightened generation, and the chief, it had adopted, would equally have supported it.

A little while before the close of the session, the First Consul adopted a measure with respect to the periodical press, which to-day would be nothing less than an impossible phenomenon; but which then, thanks to the silence of the constitution, was perfectly legal. The constitution, in fact, said nothing on the subject of the periodical press; and it will appear extraordinary that a liberty so important as that of writing was not so much as mentioned in the fundamental law of the state. But then the rostrum, as well in the assemblies as in the clubs, had been preferred as the best means of producing revolutionary passions; and the freedom of speech had been so largely used, that little attention was paid to the freedom of writing. At the period of the 18th of Fructidor, the press was somewhat more largely employed, but particularly by the royalists; and this excited in the revolutionists such a feeling against it, that its interests obtained little or no attention at their hands. They permitted it to be proscribed on the 18th of Fructidor, and in the publication of the constitution of the year VIII, all notice of it was omitted, and thenceforth it was given up to the arbitrary pleasure of the government. The First Consul, who had already shown great impatience under the attacks of the royalist journals, while he was simply general of the army of Italy, now began to be uneasy at the indiscretions committed by the press, in regard to military operations, and the virulent attacks it presumed to make upon foreign governments. Constantly applying himself, with extraordinary earnestness, to reconcile the republic with Europe, he feared lest the republican journals, inveterately hostile to those cabinets, particularly since the refusal of the offers from France, should render his efforts at accommodation fruitless. The King of Prussia, particularly, had cause to complain of some French journals, and had even expressed his dissatisfaction. The First Consul, who wished to efface all traces of violence, and who was by no means fettered in regard to the liberty of the press by any firm and decided public opinion, such as that of the present day, took a step by which he suppressed a great number of journals, and designated those that should have the privilege of continuing to appear. These dispositions were intended to remain in force until the establishment of a general peace. The favoured journals were thirteen in number: Le

¹ Necessity of Religion. Afterwards assisted in editing the French Gazette. In 1799, made himself remarkable for his talents in the section of the Theatre Français, of which he was president. He was included in the decoration of the 18th of Fructidor, but contrived to elude it. He was confined for some months during 1799, in the Temple.—Encyclopædia Americana.

² BARTHÉLEMY FRANÇOIS. Nephew of the famous Abbé Barthélemy, author of the travels of Anacharsis. Furnished his attention early to diplomacy, accompanying M. de Lamoignon to Italy, the Baron de Breteuil to Switzerland, and M. d'Adhemar, as his secretary, to Sweden. In 1791, he was sent ambassador to England. In 1793, negotiated a peace with Prussia, in the next year with Spain and the Elector of Hesse. He was raised to the Directory on the retirement of Letourneur, by the Clichien party, and soon shared in their downfall. He was sentenced to exile on the 19th of Fructidor, and deported to Cayenne, where he was near to dying. He escaped with De Teller and six others to England, and was recalled as above.—Biographie Moderne.

Moniteur Universel, Le Journal des Debats, Le Journal de Paris, Le Bien Informé, Le Publiciste, L'Ami des Lois, La Clef du Cabinet, Le Citoyen Français, La Gazette de France, Le Journal des Hommes Libres, Le Journal du Soir, Le Journal des Défenseurs de la Patrie, La Decade Philosophique. These favoured journals were, moreover, apprized that those which should publish articles against the constitution, against the armies, their glory or their interest, or which should publish invectives against foreign governments friendly or allied to France, would be immediately suppressed. This measure, which would now appear so extraordinary, was received without a murmur, and without astonishment, for the value of such things can only be estimated by the spirit of the time. The votes required from the citizens, on the subject of the new constitution, had been collected and counted. The result of this scrutiny was communicated to the Senate, to the Legislative Body, and to the Tribunate, by a message from the consuls. None of the previous constitutions had been accepted by so large a number of votes. Eighteen hundred votes in the affirmative had been cast, in 1793, for the constitution of that period, and eleven thousand in the negative. In 1795, for the constitution of the Directory, one million and fifty-seven thousand affirmative votes, and forty-nine thousand negative. This time, however, there was presented a total amount of more than three millions voters, of whom three millions adopted the constitution, and only fifteen hundred rejected it.* It is true that such vain formalities as these signify nothing to thinking minds. It is not by these vulgar, and often mendacious, tokens, that the wishes of a community can be judged; it is by its moral aspect. But the difference in the number of voters had, in this instance, an incontestable meaning. It proved, at least, how general was the sentiment which called for a strong and restorative government, a government capable of insuring order, victory, and peace.

The First Consul, before his departure for the army, decided on taking an important step. He established himself in the Tuileries. Under the disposition of the public mind to see in him a Cæsar or a Cromwell, destined to terminate a reign of anarchy by a reign of despotism, his establishment in the palace of the kings was at once bold and dangerous; not in consequence of the resistance it might provoke, but the moral effect it might possibly produce.

The First Consul, however, caused this step to be preceded by a ceremony as imposing as it was happily conceived; Washington had just died—the death of that illustrious person, who had filled the latter end of the last century with the renown of his name, was a subject of regret to all the friends of liberty in Europe. The First Consul, judging that a grand display on the subject would be opportune, addressed his armies in the following order of the day: “Washington is dead! that great man fought against tyranny; he consolidated the independence of his country. His memory will be ever dear to the French people, as to all freemen of both worlds, and most of all to French soldiers, who like him, and the soldiers of America, are fighting for equality and freedom.” In consequence of this, ten days of mourning were appointed. This mourning was to consist of a black crape suspended to all the colours of the republic. But the First Consul stopped not there, he had a noble and simple solemnity prepared in the Church of the Invalids—a church called, in the ephemeral language of the day, the Temple of Mars. The colours taken in Egypt had not yet been presented to the government;—General Lannes was appointed to present them on this occasion to the minister of war, under the magnificent dome raised by the great king, as a monument to aged valour. On the 9th of February—the 20th of Pluviose—all the authorities being assembled at the Invalids, General Lannes presented to the minister of war, Berthier, 96 colours, taken at the Pyramids, at Mount Thabor, and at Aboukir. He pronounced a brief and warlike harangue. Berthier responded in the same spirit. The latter was seated between two invalids, each of whom had attained his hundredth year; in front was the bust of Washington, shaded by a thousand colours victoriously captured from Europe by the armies of republican France. Not far aloof a rostrum was prepared;—one who had been proscribed was seen to ascend it, one who owed his liberty to the policy of the First Consul; it was M. de Fontanes, a brilliant and pure writer, the last who employed that old French language, once so perfect, but now vanished, with the eighteenth century, in the abyss of by-gone times. M. de Fontanes pronounced in a studied, but superb style, a funeral eulogium of the hero of America. He celebrated the warlike virtues of Washington, his valour, his wisdom, and disinterestedness; far above military talent, which can gain victories alone, he placed that regenerating genius which causes civil wars to cease, heals up the wounds of countries, and gives peace to the world. Together with the shade of Washington, he invoked those of Catinat and of Condé, and as if speaking in the name of the great men, he uttered praises, in the most delicate and noble form, which were at this time full of dignity, because they were lessons full of wisdom and sagacity.—“Yes,” cried he, as he closed his discourse, “thy counsels shall be heard. O; Washington, thou warrior, legislator, citizen without reproach!—He who, while but a youth, has surpassed thee in victories, shall close like thee, the bleeding wounds of his country, with triumphant hands. Soon shall we see his strong will, and his warrior genius, should they be necessary, our best defence; soon shall the hymn of peace re-echo through the shrine of war; then shall a universal sentiment of joy efface the recollection of oppression and injustice; already the oppressed forget their woes, and fix their faith upon the future. The acclamations of all ages shall accompany the hero, who lavishes his benevolent gifts on France and on the world, which she has too long harassed!”

The discourse ended, black crape was ar

* These are the exact numbers in 1793: 1,801,918 affirmative, and 11,010 negative votes. In 1795, 1,037,390 affirmative, and 49,935 negative. In 1800, out of 3,012,569 voters, 3,011,007 were affirmative, and only 1,562 negative.

pended to all the ec'ours, and the French republic seemed to be in mourning for the founder of its American sister, like monarchies which put on mourning one for the other's losses. What was there wanting to this pomp, that it should rival those funeral solemnities, whither Louis XIV. came to hear the praises of his warriors flow from the mouth of Flechier or Bossuet? Not certainly the grandeur of the objects, or the men, for it was Washington of whom he spoke, and before General Bonaparte. It was in presence of a society that had seen its Charles I. to mount the scaffold, and even crowned women to follow him thither. And men could utter here the words, Fleurus, Arcola, Rivoli, Zurich, the Pyramids, and surely these grand words were as well fitted to adorn a period as the Dunes and Rocroi. What, then, was wanting in this solemnity to make it eminently grand? That which the greatest of men was unable to place there. In the first place, religion; not that religion which is induced outwardly, but that which comes purely from the heart, and without which, such celebrations are but unmeaning and cold ceremonies. The genius of Bossuet was wanting, for there are kinds of grandeur that never can return to nations; and if the Turennes, and Condés have had successors, the Bossuets have none. Above all things, sincerity was wanting, for it was evident that this homage to a hero, whose chief glory was the disinterestedness of his ambition, was a broad piece of affectation. However, let us not suppose, as many have interpreted it, that all here was pure hypocrisy. There was some, doubtless, but there were also here the ordinary self-illusions of that time, and of all times. Men, in fact, oftener deceive themselves than they do others. Many Frenchmen, as did the Romans under Augustus, believed still in the existence in a republic, because its name was most discreetly and carefully preserved; nor is it very certain that the chief mourner in this funeral ceremony, that General Bonaparte himself, did not deceive himself when he did this honour to Washington; and that he did not think, in fact, that it might be possible in France, as in America, to be the first, without being king or emperor. This ceremony was the prelude to the installation of the three consuls at the Tuileries.—For a long time the necessary repairs had been in progress; all traces left by the Convention were being swept away, and the red caps, which had been placed by its orders along the gilded cornices, were in process of removal. It was intended that the First Consul should occupy apartments on the first floor, the same of which the royal family now make use for their evening assemblies. His wife and children were to be lodged above him, in the entresol. The Gallery of Diana was then, as now, the vestibule, which it was necessary to cross before gaining access to the chief of the state. The First Consul caused it to be adorned, with busts of the most illustrious and distinguished men, and took pains to mark, by the choice of these busts, his favourite predilections. These were Demosthenes, Alexander, Hannibal, Scipio, Brutus, Cicero, Cato, Cæsar, Gustavus Adolphus, Turenne, Condé, Dugui Trouin, Marlborough, Eugene, Marshal Saxe, Washington, Frederic the Great, Mirabeau, Dugommier, Dampierre, Marceau, Joubert,—that is to say warriors and orators, defenders of liberty, and conquerors, heroes of the old monarchy, and of the republic, and to make up the list, four generals of the republic killed in battle. His great inclination seemed to be to gather around himself the glories of all countries, and of all times, as he desired to rally round his government men of all parties. But it was not proposed that he alone should occupy the Tuileries; but that his colleagues should divide them with him. To the Consul Le Brun was assigned the Pavilion of Flora. The Consul Cambacérés, however, who ranked above the Consul Le Brun, refused to enter the palace of the kings. This person, with consummate prudence, the only man, perhaps of that time, who did not surrender himself to any illusion, said to his colleague Le Brun, "It is an error that we should be lodged in the Tuileries, it suits neither you nor me; for my part I will not go.—General Bonaparte will soon want to lodge there by himself, and then we shall be suffered to retire. It is better not to go at all."

He did not go, but was presented with a beautiful Hotel on the Place de Carousell, which he retained as long as Napoleon retained the empire. When every thing was ready, some days after the funeral ceremony at the Invalids, the First Consul resolved to take public possession of the Tuileries. He did this with great solemnity. On the 19th of February—30 Pluviose—he quitted the Luxembourg, to take possession of his new palace, preceded and followed by a sumptuous retinue. The fine regiments which had marched from Holland to La Vendée and from La Vendée to Paris, and which were going to immortalize themselves for the hundredth time on the plains of Germany and Italy. Those regiments commanded by Lannes, Murat,¹ and Bessières,²

¹ MURAT, JOACHIM. Born in 1767, at Bastide Frontiniere, the son of an innkeeper, who had been steward to the De Talleyrands. Murat was at first intended for the church, but entered a regiment of chasseurs. He was dismissed for insubordination, but afterward entered the constitutional guard of Louis XVI. During the reign of terror, he passed through the grades of lieutenant, captain, and major. He was Bonaparte's lieutenant in the affair of the Sections, in 1795, and on his personal staff in Italy. Distinguished himself at Montenotte, Millesimo, Dego, Mondovì, Rivoli, Rovereto, everywhere. It was in Egypt especially, where he gained his renown, out-riding, out-fighting, and astonishing the Mamelukes. For his aid at the 18th of Brumaire, he was rewarded with the hand of Caroline, Napoleon's youngest and most ambitious sister. He was known in the consular and imperial armies as "le preux chevalier." There was a dash of romance in every thing he did, and by his personal beauty, daring splendor, swordsmanship, and skill with the horse, he seemed to bring back the days of chivalry and knight-errantry. The best cavalry officer the world ever saw. Court and Camp of Napoleon.

² BESSIÈRES, JEAN BAPTISTE. Born of very humble parents, at Preissac, in 1768. In company with his countryman, Joachim Murat, he travelled up to Paris in 1791. Both were appointed together privates in the constitutional guard. On the 10th of August, 1792, he distinguished himself by his courage and humanity, in rescuing many of the queen's household from massacre. He afterward joined a regiment of chasseurs of the legion of the Pyrenees, in which he rose to be a captain opened the procession. Then came, in carriages, for the most part hired, the ministers, the councillors of state, the public authorities; at last, in a splendid carriage with six white horses, came the three consuls. These horses were very appropriately introduced at this moment; they were those presented to General Bonaparte by the Emperor of Germany on the occasion of the peace of Campo Formio.

The general had also received from that prince a magnificent sabre, which he took care to wear on that day; thus he displayed around him all that could remind the people of the peace-making warrior. The crowd which filled the streets and quays that led to the Tuileries, hailed his presence with loud acclamations. These acclamations were sincere, for in him they saluted France's glory, and the commencement of her great prosperity. Arrived at the Caroussel, the carriage of the consuls was received by the consular-guard, and passed before two guard-houses, one to the right, the other to the left, of the courtyard of the palace—on one of these still remained the inscription, "ROYAUME EN FRANCE IS ABOLISHED, AND SHALL ARISE NO MORE." The First Consul had scarcely entered the courtyard, before he mounted his horse and reviewed the troops which were drawn up before the palace. On coming in front of the colours of the 96th, and 43d, and 30th demi-brigades, colours all black with smoke, and rent with bullets, he saluted them, and in turn was saluted by the cheers of the soldiers. After having gone through the ranks, he placed himself in front of the Pavilion of Flora, and saw them march past. Above his head, on the balcony of the palace were the consuls, the principal authorities, and, to conclude, his own family, who now began to hold rank in the state. The review ended, he ascended into his apartments; the minister of the interior presented the civil, and the minister of war the military, authorities to him; and the minister of the marine, all the naval officers who were at that time in Paris. A banquet was prepared at the Tuileries, and at the hotels of the ministers. The functions of the consular palace were regulated in the following manner,—a councillor of state, former minister of the interior, M. Benezech, was intrusted with the general administration of the palace. The aides-de-camp, at the head of whom was Duroc, were appointed to do the honours, and to replace that multitude of officers of all descriptions, who usually fill the vast saloons of European sovereigns. Every fifteen days, on the 2d and the 17th of every month, the First Consul received the diplomatic body; once every decade, on different days, and at appointed hours, he received the Senators, the Legislative Body, the Tribunate, and the members of the Court of Cassation. The functionaries who had occasion to converse with him were bound to apply to the ministers, on whom they were dependent, in order to gain access to his person.

On the 2d of Ventose—February 21st—two days after his installation at the Tuileries, he gave audience to the diplomatic body. Surrounded by a numerous staff, and having the two consuls at his sides, he received the envoys of those states which were not at war with France. Introduced by M. Benezech, presented by the minister of the interior, they delivered their credentials to the First Consul, who transmitted them to the ministers, nearly after the same routine with the sovereigns of monarchical governments. The foreign ministers who figured at this audience were M. de Musquiz, Spanish ambassador; M. de Sandoz Rollin, Prussian minister; M. de Schimmelpenninck, ambassador of Holland; M. de Serbelloni, envoy of the Cisalpine republic; and in addition to these, the chargés d'affaires of Denmark, Sweden, Switzerland, Baden, Hesse-Cassel, Rome, Genoa, &c. Moniteur of the 4th of Ventose, year VIII.

The presentation ended, these different ministers were introduced to Madame Bonaparte. Every five days the First Consul reviewed the regiments which were passing through Paris on their way to the frontiers. Then it was that he showed himself to the troops and the multitude, which always crowded around him. Thin, pale, and stooping over his horse's neck, he at once impressed and interested all beholders, by his grave melancholy beauty, and by appearance of ill health, at which men were beginning to be alarmed, for never was the preservation of any man's life more earnestly desired than was his.

After these reviews, the officers of the troops were admitted to his table. Foreign ministers, the members of assemblies, magistrates and public functionaries were invited to his board, whereat there reigned a decorous luxury. There were, as yet, in that new-born court neither ladies of honour nor chamberlains; the mode of dress was plain, yet at the same time tasteful. The customs of the Directory were carefully and spontaneously avoided, under which the imitation of the antique dress, added to the dissoluteness of morals, destroyed all the dignity of the external representation of the government. All were silent, observant, eagerly watching the great person who had already performed deeds so mighty, and from whom yet greater deeds might be expected. Men waited for his questions, and replied to them with deference.

The day following that on which he established himself at the Tuileries, General Bonaparte, traversing them with his secretary, M. de Bourrienne, said to him, "Well, Bourrienne, here we are in the Tuileries—now we must take care to remain here."

In this capacity, he attracted the attention of Napoleon, in Italy, in 1796. Was appointed to the command of his corps of gendarmes, celebrated as the origin of the famous Imperial Guard. Thereafter he rose, step by step, with his great master. He was a brave, prudent, moderate, and humane man, and died poor, after holding commands where he might have amassed vast wealth.—Court and Camp of Napoleon.

BOOK III.

ULM AND GENOA.

Preparations for war—Forces of the coalition in 1800—Army of Baron Melas in Liguria—Of Marechal Fray in Suabia—Austrian plan of campaign—Importance of Switzerland in this war—General Bonaparte's plan—He forms the resolution of making use of Switzerland, whereby to break down upon the flank of M. de Kray, and on the rear of M. de Melas—Part which he intended for Moreau, and which for himself—Creation of the army of reserve—Instructions to Massena—Commencement of hostilities—Baron Melas attacks the army of Liguria in the Apennines, and cuts it into two parts, one of which is driven back on the Var, the other on Genoa—Massena is shut up in Genoa, and prepares therein for obstinate resistance—Description of Genoa—Heroical defence of Massena—Urgency of the First Consul with Moreau to induce him to commence operations in Germany, in order to succour Massena more speedily—Passage of the Rhine at four points—Moreau succeeds in uniting three out of four corps d'armée, and falls, at Engen and Stockach, on the Austrians—Battles of Engen and Maeskirch—Retreat of the Austrians on the Danube—Affair of Saint Cyr, at Biberach—M. de Kray establishes himself in the retrenched camp at Ulm—Moreau manoeuvres to dislodge him—Several false movements of Moreau, from which happily no ill results follow—Moreau at length shuts M. de Kray in Ulm, and takes a strong position in front of Augsburg, in order to await the results of events in Italy—Review of the actions of Moreau—Character of that general.

AFTER having addressed pressing overtures of peace to Europe; overtures which would have been unbecoming from any other than a general covered with glory; it remained only to the First Consul to make war, which he had been strenuously preparing during the winter of 1799, 1800—year VIII. This war was at once the most legitimate, and one of the most glorious, of those heroic times.

Austria, while observing in forms more moderation than England, had, nevertheless, come to the same conclusions, and refused peace. The vain hope of retaining the advantageous situation in Italy, which she owed to the victories of Suwaroff, and the subsidies of England, together with the erroneous idea, that France, exhausted of men and money, could not endure another campaign; and above all the obstinacy of M. de Thugut, who represented the war party at Vienna with as much pertinacity as Mr. Pitt, in London, and who brought to this question far more passion than patriotism—all these causes combined had led the Austrian cabinet to commit one of the most serious political blunders—that of not taking advantage of a good opportunity for negotiation. It needed indeed great blindness, to believe that the success which had been due to the incapacity of the Directory could be maintained in the face of a new government, already thoroughly re-organized, active to a miracle, and directed by the first captain of the age.

The Archduke Charles, who combined with real military talents much modesty and moderation, had pointed out all the dangers connected with the prolongation of the war, and the difficulty of making head against the celebrated adversary who was about to enter the lists. The only reply was, his removal from the command of the Austrian armies; and the only general, under whom they could have fought with a chance of success, was withdrawn. His disgrace was disguised under the title of Governor of Bohemia. The imperial armies greatly regretted the removal of the prince, although they had appointed the Baron de Kray as his successor, who had greatly distinguished himself in the last Italian campaign. M. de Kray was a brave, able, and experienced officer, who did not prove himself unworthy of the command with which he was intrusted.

To fill the void left by the secession of Russia in the ranks of the coalition, Austria, seconded by the subsidies of England, obtained from the states of the empire a very considerable force. A particular treaty, signed on the 16th of March, by Mr. Wickham, British minister near the elector of Bavaria, obliged that prince to furnish, beside his legal contingent as a member of the empire, a supplemental corps of 12,000 Bavarians. A treaty of the same nature, signed on the 20th of April, with the Duke of Wirtemberg, procured another corps of 6000 Wirtembergers for the army of the coalition. To conclude, on the 30th of April, the same negotiator obtained from the elector of Mayence, a corps of from 4 to 6000 Mayençais, on the same moneyed conditions. In addition to the cost of levying, equipping, and maintaining their troops, England guaranteed to the coalescing princes of Germany that no separate treaty should be made with France apart from them; that their states should be restored to them, let the fate of war be as it might; and made them pledge themselves in return that they would listen to no separate proposition of peace. Of these German troops, the best were the Bavarians, after these ranked the Wirtembergers, but the Mayençais were militia, with neither discipline nor valour. Independently of these regular contingents, the peasantry of the Black Forest had been excited to take arms, by holding out to them the terror of French plunderers, who at that period devastated far less than the Imperialists the cultivated fields of unhappy Germany.

The imperial army of Suabia, including all these auxiliaries, amounted to nearly 150,000 men, 30,000 of whom were shut up in garrison, and 120,000 present for active service. It was provided with a numerous artillery, good, although unequal to the French artillery, and above all a superb cavalry, as is usual with the Austrian armies. The emperor had, moreover, 120,000 men in Lombardy, under Baron Melas. The English fleets, combined in large squadrons in the Mediterranean, and continually cruising in the gulf of Genoa, supported all the operations of the Austrians in Italy. They were destined to bring to them an auxiliary force of English and emigrants, combined already at Mahon, and amounting, it was said, to 20,000 men. It was determined that this corps should be disembarked even at Toulon in case the Austrian army, intended to operate against the Apennines, should succeed in forcing the line of the Var.

It was hoped that some Russians would have been added to the British troops, and landed on the French coasts, in order to excite risings in Belgium, Brittany, and La Vendée. But the involuntary inaction of the Russians and the pacification of La Vendée had caused the failure of that operation on which the allies had greatly reckoned. It was a mass, therefore, of nearly 300,000 men, 150,000 in Suabia, 120,000 in Italy, 20,000 at Mahon, backed by the whole English navy, that was to carry on this war against France. This force, it must be admitted, would have been very insufficient against France re-organized and in possession of all her means. But against France, hardly emerging from the chaos, into which the weakness of the Directory had plunged her, it was very considerable, and one from which great results might have been obtained, had it been ably employed. It must be added that it was a real force, exposed to undergo little or no diminution, because the 300,000 men of whom it was composed were inured to fatigues, and were already stationed on the very frontier they were destined to attack. An important circumstance; for every newly raised army resists with difficulty the first hardships of war; and, if it has far to march before fighting, is diminished in proportion to the distance to be traversed.

It is necessary now to speak of the distribution of the combined forces, and their intended plan of action.

M. de Kray, at the head of 150,000 men whom he commanded, occupied Suabia, placed in the angle which the Rhine forms in that country, which after having run from east to west, and from Constance to Bâle, turns suddenly to the north, running from Bâle toward Strasburg. In this situation, M. de Kray, having on his left flank Switzerland, and on his right Alsatia, observed all the valleys debouching on the Rhine, by which the French armies could enter Germany. He had no idea of passing that river to invade the soil of the republic. His part, on the opening of the campaign, was intended to be less active. The initiative in the operation was reserved for the army of Italy, 120,000 strong, and advanced, in consequence of the advantages obtained in 1799, even to the foot of the Apennines. It was destined to blockade, and, if possible, to carry Genoa, then to cross the Apennines and the Var, and to advance upon Toulon, where the English and the emigrants of the south, led by General Willot,¹ one of those proscribed in Fructidor, had concerted a junction with the Austrians. A new invasion of that province of France which contained our principal maritime establishment was greatly to the taste of England; and it is to them that must be attributed the plan of that campaign, which has in later days been so severely criticized. When the Austrian army of Italy, which, thanks to the climate of Liguria, would be enabled to commence operations, before that of Suabia, should have penetrated into Provence, it was supposed that the First Consul would be compelled to weaken his armies on the Rhine in order to cover the Var, and that Marshal Kray would have the means of coming into action. Switzerland, being thus overflowed and smothered as it were between the two armies, must naturally fall, without creating any necessity for the renewal of the impotent attacks of the previous campaign. The exploits of Lecourbe and Massena, in the Alps, had greatly disheartened the Austrians as to any great operation specially directed against Switzerland. As far as regards that country, the plan was, to be content with simple observation. To the extreme left of Marshal de Kray, was assigned this charge in Suabia. To the cavalry of the Baron de Melas, useless in the Apennines, the same duty was committed in Lombardy. The plan of the Austrians consisted, then, in temporizing in Suabia, operating early in Italy, advancing on that side to the Var, then—when the French, obliged to make head on that river, should have weakened the army of the Rhine, to pass that river—advancing in two masses, one to the eastward by way of Bâle, the other to the southward by way of Nice, and thus in taking, without a direct attack, the formidable barrier of Switzerland.

All judges of military operations have greatly blamed Austria for thus neglecting Switzerland, which permitted General Bonaparte to thread its defiles and throw himself on the flank of Marshal de Kray and the rear of the Baron de Melas. I believe, as the reader will be able to judge when he comes to the recital of facts, that no plan could be combined so as to be entirely certain against General Bonaparte, with the difficulty included that Switzerland was in the hands of the French.

To grasp this memorable campaign, and judge soundly of the determinations of the belligerent parties, it is necessary for one to picture to himself exactly the position of Switzerland, and the influence it must have on the military operations, especially when the point at which these operations were in progress is considered.

It is toward the eastern frontiers of France that the Alps begin to surge up from the centre of the European continent. They run thence lengthwise toward the east, dividing Germany from Italy; shedding on one side the Danube and its tributaries, on the other the Po, and all the streams of which that great river is composed. That portion of the Alps nearest to France, forms Switzerland. Their elongation constitutes the Tyrol, which has for centuries belonged to Austria.

When the Austrian armies advance toward France, they are obliged to ascend the valley of the Danube on the one hand, and that of the Po on the other, divided into two masses acting along the line of the Alps. So long as they are in Bavaria and in Lombardy, these two cases can maintain communication across the Alps by the Tyrol, which belongs to the emperor; but when they reach Suabia, on the head of the Danube, and Piedmont on the upper Po, they are separated one from the other, without the possibility of communicating across the Alps, because Switzerland, independent and neutral, is ordinarily closed against them.

¹ WILLOT, ANNEÉE. A French general of noble birth. He served the Revolution, in the army of the Pyrenees. Was beaten at Perpignan, and was suspended for a time. Served in La Vendée, with distinction, under Hoche. He became one of the leaders of the Orléanists, and was deported to Guienne, but escaped with Barthelemy and Pichegru to England, where he was at this period.—Biographie Moderne.

This neutrality of Switzerland is an obstacle wisely interposed by the policy of Europe between France and Austria, in order to diminish the number of points of attack between those two formidable powers. If, indeed, Switzerland were open to Austria, she might advance with her armies in free communication from the valley of the Danube to that of the Po, menacing the frontiers of France from Bâle even to Nice. This would be a vast danger to France, for she is obliged to be, as it were everywhere, on guard from the mouths of the Rhine to those of the Rhone; while, if the Swiss Alps are closed to her enemies, she may concentrate all her forces on the Rhine, neglecting the attack from the southward; since no imperial operation on the Var has ever succeeded, owing to the length of the circuit. The advantage of the Swiss neutrality is, therefore, great to France.

But it is not less great, however, to Austria; perhaps it is even more so. If, indeed, Switzerland were to become the theatre of hostilities, the French army could invade it the first; and, as its infantry is intelligent, active, brave, and as well adapted to warfare in the mountains as on the plain, there are many chances of her succeeding in its occupation. The proof of this, indeed, is to be found in the campaign of 1799. If, in fact, the Alps are attacked by the great chain, they give that line of defence which Lecourbe held against Suwaroff in the gorges of the St. Gothard; if they are attacked from the side of Germany by the lower part, the line of resistance lies behind lakes and rivers—that line of defence which Massena held behind the lake of Zurich, and which was concluded by the memorable battle bearing that name. Now, when the French army remains mistress of Switzerland, she occupies a most menacing position, and one which may be turned to advantage so as to produce results the most extraordinary; as will appear when we come to the operations of General Bonaparte.

In fact, two Austrian armies, one of which is in Suabia, the other in Piedmont, have no means of intercommunication; and the French, pouring through the valley of Lake Constance, on one hand, and through the defiles of the great Alps on the other, may cast themselves either upon the flanks of the army of Suabia, or on the rear of that of Italy. This danger it is impossible to avoid, by any plan, without falling back fifty leagues to the rear, into Bavaria on one side, and into Lombardy on the other.

The Austrians must therefore have done one of these things—either, losing the advantages they had gained in the last campaign, they must have abandoned both Suabia and Piedmont to us at once; or, refusing to make such a sacrifice, they must have tried to carry Switzerland by a principal attack, which could hardly have succeeded, for it would have been a front attack on an obstacle almost insurmountable, against which they had once failed already; or, at last, they must have divided themselves into two great armies, as they did, separated by Switzerland, which was thus placed on their flanks and their rear. They might, it is true, in adopting this latter plan, have greatly diminished one of their armies, and so strengthened the other, leaving, for example, only means enough to the Baron de Melas to hold Massena in check, and raising the army of Suabia to 200,000; or the reverse, combining their principal force in Piedmont. But, in the one case, this would have been to surrender Italy—Italy, the sole aim, and ardently contested prize, of the war; and in the other, it was to abandon the Rhine, the Black Forest, and the sources of the Danube, without a battle, and to shorten by so much the route of the French on Vienna. It would have been, in either case, to do the thing of all others most for our interest; for to raise either of the two armies to 200,000 men, was to give the victory to that power which had General Bonaparte on its side. He was, in fact, the only general, who at that time could command 200,000 men.

Therefore was there no plan, entirely safe for Austria, so long as the French held Switzerland: a fact which, by the way, proves that the neutrality of Switzerland is well advised, and for the interest of both parties. She adds, in fact, to their defensive, adding nothing to their offensive, strength. That is to say, she gives to them as much in security, as she takes from them of aggressive power. No better plan could be devised for the maintenance of a general peace.

The Austrians had not then many steps to take, and, for all that has been said on the subject, they perhaps adopted the only one possible; when they decided on temporizing in Suabia, operating actively in Italy, always separated by the obstacle of Switzerland, which they could not abate. But in this position there was a choice in the mode of operation, and it must be admitted that they did not choose the best; that they did not even take means to provide against any of the dangers which threatened them. Obstinate persisting in the belief that the French armies were exhausted, disbelieving that the army of Germany could possibly take the offensive, pass the Rhine in the face of 150,000 Austrians posted in the Black Forest; disbelieving, yet more fixedly, that the Alps could be forced, where there were no roads, and in the snowy season; seeing, moreover, no third army by which the attempt to force them could be made, they gave themselves up to a security which was fatal to them. It must be admitted, if we would be just, that most people would have been deceived as they were; for their security was founded upon the existence of obstacles apparently invincible. But experience soon taught them that, with an enemy such as General Bonaparte, all security, even that which is founded on barriers insurmountable, rivers or icy mountains, is deceitful, may well be come fatal.

France had two armies; that of Germany, raised by the union of the armies of Rhine and Helvetia, to 130,000 men; that of Liguria, reduced to 40,000 men at the utmost. There were troops in Holland, in La Vendée, and in the interior—these were the elements, scattered and dislocated, of a third army; but a very superior degree of administrative ability alone could have united them in time, and, above all, on a sudden, at the point where its presence was needed. General Bonaparte conceived the idea of employing these different means as follows:

Massena, with the army of Liguria, not in the least augmented, reinforced only in supplies and munitions of war, was under orders to take a post on the Apennines, between Genoa and Nice, and to maintain himself as if in Thermopylæ. The army of Germany, under Moreau, increased as rapidly as possible, was instructed to make feints as if about to cross the Rhine at many points from Strasburg to Bâle, and from Bâle to Constance, then to march rapidly behind the curtain which that river forms, to ascend it to Schaffhausen, to cast four bridges there at once across it; to fall in mass upon the flank of Marshal de Kray, surprise him, push him back in disorder to the head of the Danube, out-march him if possible, cut him off from Vienna, perhaps surround him, and crush him by one of those memorable routs of which this century has displayed more than one example. If the army of Moreau should not have this good fortune, it would, at all events, be able to push M. de Kray upon Ulm and Ratisbon, oblige him thus to descend the Danube, and thrust him away from the Alps, so far at least as to hinder him from sending any succours thither. That done, it had orders to detach its right wing toward Switzerland, in order to second the perilous operation, the execution of which General Bonaparte reserved to himself. The third army, called that of reserve, the elements of which were scarcely in existence, was directed to organize itself between Dijon and Geneva, ready to succour Moreau, if he should have occasion for aid. But if Moreau should succeed at least in one part of his plan, this army of reserve, advancing on Geneva, under General Bonaparte, and from Geneva into the Valais, and then extending itself so as to join a detachment drawn from the German army, was destined, by a movement more prodigious than that of Hannibal, to fall upon Piedmont, to take the Baron de Melas, while engaged before Genoa, in the rear, to bring him to a decisive action, and, if victorious, to compel him to lay down his arms.

Assuredly, if the execution should answer to the plan, never would finer conception have proved the genius of any captain, ancient or modern. But it is execution alone which fixes the value of grand military combinations, for deprived of this, they are but vain chimeras.

Execution here consisted in the conquering an infinite variety of obstacles; in reorganizing the armies of Liguria and the Rhine; in creating the army of reserve; in concealing both the creation and destination of the latter; and, to conclude, in forcing the double passage of the Rhine and the Alps; the second, equal in itself to all, the most extraordinary, that ever has been attempted in the art of war.

The first care of General Bonaparte had been, from the beginning, to recruit his army. Desertions to the interior, sickness, and death in action, had reduced it to 250,000 men, a thing which would be scarcely credible, at a moment when a general coalition was to be resisted, if it were not attested by indubitable documents. Happily, these 250,000 men were thoroughly inured to war, and capable of contending with an enemy of double their own force. The First Consul had demanded 100,000 conscripts of the Legislative Body, which, with a truly patriotic zeal, they had voted to him. The war was so legitimate, so evidently necessary after the offers of peace had been refused, that the slightest hesitation would have been criminal. For the rest, there was nothing to fear, since the zeal of the Legislative Body and the Tribunate amounted to enthusiasm. These 100,000 young conscripts, combined with 250,000 veterans, would form material for an admirable army. The newly appointed prefects, who had already repaired to their posts, carried on the recruiting with an activity which never had been equalled. But these conscripts could not be present under arms, drilled, and fit for service, within five or six months. The First Consul decided therefore on retaining in the interior all the corps which had been thinned and worn out by war, which he would use as skeletons to be filled up from the new levies. On the contrary, he marched to the frontiers all those corps which he judged capable of opening the campaign, taking care to transfer, from those destined to remain in the interior, all the men fit for service. It was the very highest calculation if by this mode he could find 200,000 men fit to be carried instantly into line of battle. But that number was sufficient in his able and puissant hand.

At the same time he made an appeal to the patriotic sentiments of France. Addressing himself to the soldiers of the first requisition, whom the general discouragement, consequent on our reverses, had carried back to their firesides, he compelled those who had gone home, without regular dismissal, to rejoin their regiments; he endeavoured to excite military tastes among all the young men whose imaginations were inflamed already by the name of General Bonaparte. Although the enthusiasm of the first days of the republic had grown cold, the sight of an enemy on our frontiers rekindled every heart, and the succour which might be derived, even now, from the devotedness of volunteers, was not to be despised.

To his care, with regard to recruiting, the First Consul added some useful reforms relative to the administration and composition of the army. First he created inspectors of reviews charged to calculate the number of men present under arms, and to prevent the treasury for paying soldiers who were present only on paper. He made a change of the greatest importance in the artillery. The artillery carriages were at that time driven by wagons belonging to the baggage trains, who, not being bonded by any sentiment of honour like other soldiers, were wont to cut their traces on the first danger, and to fly, leaving their cannons in the hands of the enemy. The First Consul thought, with reason, that the cannoneer who brings his piece into the place of action, performs as valuable a service as the cannoneer who works it; that he runs the same danger, and requires the same moral stimulus, which is the point of honour. He converted the artillery drivers therefore into soldiers, clad in uniform and belonging to the regiment of that arm. They constituted 10 or 12,000 horsemen, who should feel as much pride in carrying their pieces into action, and bringing them off rapidly, as the gunners in loading, pointing, and discharging them. This reform was but begun at this time, and it was not until a later day that the excellent results could be felt.

The artillery and cavalry were both in want of horses. The First Consul ordered a compulsory and extraordinary levy of every thirtieth horse, having neither the time nor the means to make purchases. It was a hard but unavoidable necessity. The armies were ordered to supply themselves on the spot and in their vicinities, and then from neighbour to neighbour through the surrounding provinces.

The First Consul had sent to Massena such funds as could be disposed, to assist the unfortunate army of Liguria. Of 60,000 men which composed it, by the combination of the armies of Lombardy and Naples, after the bloody battle of Trebbia, it had been reduced, by misery, to 40,000 at the utmost, and of these not above 30,000 combatants, or a little over. Wheat, as it could not be introduced through Piedmont, occupied by the Austrians, nor by the sea, guarded by the English, was very rare. The poor soldiers had nothing then but what came from the harvests of the Apennines, which, as all the world knows, are little or nothing. They would not go into the hospitals, wherein the simplest food was not to be obtained, and they were to be seen all along the road from Nice to Genoa, perishing of famine and fever, and presenting the saddest of all spectacles, that of brave men dying miserably for the country they defend.

Massena, provided with the funds sent by the government, had made some purchases at Marseilles, bought all the wheat that city contained, and forwarded it to Genoa. Unfortunately, during the winter, winds as hostile as the enemy ceased not to prevent, by their contrary gales, all arrivals from Marseilles, and acted in some sort as the blockade, which, during the winter season, the English were unable to maintain. Nevertheless, a few cargoes having been entered successfully, some bread had been distributed among the soldiers of Liguria. Arms, shoes, some clothes, and some hope had been furnished to them. As to military energy, nothing was requisite to inspire them with that; for never had France seen soldiers endure such misery with such firmness. These, the victors of Castiglione, of Arcola, of Rivoli, had come without disorganization the defeats of Cassano, of Novi, of the Trebia. The temper to which they had been hardened would not give way before the blows of fortune. At the very worst, the presence of General Bonaparte, at the head of the government, and General Massena at the head of the army, would have renewed their heart had it needed renewal. It was necessary only to feed, clothe, and arm them, to make them capable of any thing. In this respect all that could be done was done. Massena, by a few acts of severity, re-established the discipline which had been shaken for a moment, and collected something more than 30,000 men, impatient under his orders to retrace their steps into the fertile Italy. The First Consul gave him directions most ably conceived. Three narrow defiles traversed the Apennines from the inland toward the maritime declivity. They are the defile of Bocchetta, debouching on Genoa; that of Cadibona, on Savona; and that of Tende, on Nice. The First Consul ordered Massena to have very weak detachments only at the Col de Tende, and the Col de Cadibona, just enough to observe those passes, and to concentrate himself with twenty-five or thirty thousand men on Genoa. This town being strongly occupied, the invasion of France was little probable, and in any event little to be feared; for the Austrians would hardly be so rash as to advance beyond the Var upon Toulon, and the mouths of the Rhone, leaving Massena in their rear. Massena would moreover have it in his power to fall with his 30,000 men united, on any corps which should have passed the defiles of the Apennines. It would be a difficult matter, considering the nature of the country, rugged with narrow ways, to bring above 30,000 men against him. But this excellent plan was unfortunately above the execution of any general, but one endowed with the prodigious dexterity of the conqueror of Montenotte. The First Consul, for the rest, was satisfied that in Massena he had an obstinate defender of the steep crests of the Apennines, and that he had prepared for the Baron de Melas such occupation as would delay him in Liguria, for quite as long a time as would be needed for the combined movement of the French armies.

Nevertheless, it must be admitted, that the army of Liguria was treated a little as a sacrificed army. Not a man more was sent to it. Materials of war only were supplied to it; and even, under that head, such only as were absolutely needful. It was in a different direction that the great efforts of the government were exerted, because it was in a different direction that the great blows were to be dealt. The army of Liguria was exposed to destruction in order to gain the time which should render the others victorious. Such is the hard necessity of war, which passes over the heads of these, to strike the heads of those; obliging those to die, that these may live and conquer.

The army treated with especial care was that which, under the orders of Moreau, was destined to operate on Suabia. All that could be furnished to it, was furnished, both of men and material. Immense exertions were made to furnish it with complete artillery, and vast means of transportation, in order that, if need should be, he might pass the Rhine, not only suddenly, but at one point. General Moreau, of whom it has been said that the First Consul was jealous, was about to have under his orders the most numerous and finest army of the republic, numbering about 130,000; while Massena would not have above thirty-six, or the First Consul above 40,000 at the most. Nor was this a vain piece of flattery addressed to the vanity of Moreau. More serious motives had determined that distribution of his forces. The proposed operation, necessary in order to push back M. de Kray upon Ulm and Ratisbon, was of the highest importance to the general success of the campaign. For, in the presence of those two formidable armies pressing upon our frontier, it was necessary that one should be driven back before a force could be carried across the Alps in order to act on the rear of the other. This first operation then must needs be attempted with means so decisive as should render its success infallible. The First Consul, highly as he rated Moreau's abilities, yet rated his own far higher, and, if one of the two must act with inadequate means, he judged himself more capable of so acting than Moreau. The feeling which directed him on this occasion was a feeling superior even to generosity, in great measures of state; it was love of the common good. This he made take precedence of all interest, his own no less than others.

That army of the Rhine, though clad like all those of the republic, in the rags of misery, was superb. Some few conscripts had been sent to it, but very few, just enough to infuse fresh youth into it. It was composed of a vast majority of those old soldiers, who, under the orders of Pichegru,¹ Kleber, Hoche, and Moreau, had conquered Holland, and the banks of the Rhine, once and again crossed that river, and even shown themselves upon the Danube. It could not be said without injustice that they were braver than the soldiers of Italy, but they displayed all the qualities of the most perfect troops. They were sage, sober, disciplined, skilful, and fearless. The leaders were worthy of the soldiers. The formation of this army into detached divisions, each complete in all arms, and acting as separate armies, had developed to the highest point the talents of the generals of this division. These generals of division were of great but unequal merit. There was Lecourbe, the ablest officer of his day in mountain warfare; there was Lecourbe, whose glorious name was prolonged by the echoes of the Alps. There was Richempagne, who united to audacious gallantry a rare degree of intelligence, and who soon afterward rendered Moreau, on the field of Hohenlinden, the greatest service that ever yet lieutenant rendered to his general. There was Saint Cyr, of a cold, deep spirit, of an unsocial character, but endowed with all the qualities that constitute a general-in-chief. There was, the last, young Ney,² whom his heroic courage, guided by his quick instinct in war, had made already popular in every army of the republic. At the head of these lieutenants, was Moreau, slow, sometimes undecided, but of solid capacity; one whose indecision led to firm and wise resolutions, where he stood front to front with danger. Experience had singularly formed and improved his military glance. But while his war-like genius was matured by the trials of battle his civil character, which was weak, and easily acted upon by any influence, had given way already, and was yet destined to give way farther, before those trials of politics which strong souls and minds truly elevated can alone overcome. For the rest, the unhappy passion of jealousy had not yet altered his purity of heart, or corrupted his patriotism. By his experience, his habit of command, and his high renown, he was, after General Bonaparte, the only man fit at that time to command 100,000 men.

This was the detailed plan, laid down for him by the First Consul; to enter Suabia by the point which afforded the greatest facilities for acting upon the extreme left of Marshal de Kray, so as to outflank him, cut him off from Bavaria, and hem him in between the upper Danube and the Rhine; in which case, the Austrian army in Suabia would be lost. To effect this, it was necessary to pass the Rhine, not upon two or three points, but upon one only, and that as near as possible to Constance; an operation peculiarly bold and difficult—for the question was of transporting across a river, and in presence of the enemy, one hundred thousand men at once, with all their material; and it must be acknowledged that previous to the battle of Wagram, no general had ever crossed a river with the requisite unity of action and resolution. Hence, great address was necessary in order to deceive the Austrians as to the point chosen; and, together with great address, great daring in the execution of the passage, and, after all, what is ever necessary, good fortune. The First Consul had ordered a considerable mass of boats to be collected in the tributaries to the Rhine, and particularly in the Aar, in order to construct three or four bridges at once, at the distance of some hundred yards one from the other. It yet remained to induce the mind of Moreau, which was cold and far from daring, to grasp such combinations.

After these cares, bestowed with unceasing zeal upon the troops of Liguria and Germany, the First Consul bent his mind on creating, out of nothing, an army, destined in a short space of time to accomplish the greatest things, under the title of the Army of Reserve.

In order that it should fulfil its object, it was at Sarre Louis, in Lorraine, in 1770. Articled to a notary in that town. Entered the army as a private hussar in 1787. He distinguished himself so much that he was lieutenant in 1793 and captain in 1794. In 1796 he was with the army of the Sambre and Meuse, and there, as ever, was first in the field. In 1797 he commanded the cavalry at Neuwed and was taken prisoner, but was soon liberated. After the peace of Leoben he was in Paris, and declared against the Clichians. In 1799 he was in the army of the Rhine, commanded the cavalry at Fleurus, and gallantly surprised Frankfort. Hereafter his history is one with that of Napoleon.—Court and Camp of Napoleon.

¹ KLEBER. Born in 1750. Was intended for an architect. Went to Austria, and entered that army, and served from 1776 to 1783 in the regiment of Kaunitz. Returned home and was inspector of public buildings at Besfort. In 1790, adjutant-major of volunteers upon the upper Rhine. Distinguished in 1791—1796. Under Pichegru and Jourdan, in January, 1797, commanded the army of the Sambre and Meuse, which he afterward resigned to Hoche. He accompanied Bonaparte to Egypt, and on his return, was left there with 15,000 men. He there distinguished himself greatly, and was assassinated by a fanatic.—Biographie Moderne.

² NEY, MICHAEL, called 'le Brave des Braves.' Born Vol. L.—12

not merely necessary to call it into existence, but to call it into existence without any mortal dreaming of the fact. We shall see what measures he took to obtain this twofold result.

In Holland, and in the forces accumulated in Paris by the Directory, the First Consul had found the means of pacifying La Vendée at a most seasonable juncture; and in La Vendée, thus pacified, he found the necessary resources for calling into existence an army; which, when suddenly thrown upon the theatre of military operations, was destined to change the fate of war. Writing to General Brune, the principal commandant of the west, he addressed him in the following striking words, so expressive of his mode of operating, and of that used by all the greatest masters of the art of administration and of war. "Let me know whether, independent of the five demi-brigades, which I asked of you by my last courier, you can still dispose of one or two demi-brigades, even if they should be obliged to return in three months. We must decide upon striding over France, as we formerly did the valley of the Adige; it is nothing more than the relation which decades bear to days." 14th of Ventôse, year VIII.—3d March, 1800. Dépôt of the Secretary of State.

Though the adventure of the English in the Texel must have given them a distaste for any new descents upon the continent, more especially since the secession of the Russians from coalition; we, nevertheless, could not give up to them the vast extent of our coasts, from the Zuiderzee to the Gulf of Gascony, without any means of defence, particularly when it is considered how recent was the pacification of La Vendée. The First Consul therefore left in Holland a force, half French, half Dutch, to protect that important country, the command of which he intrusted to Augereau. It was formed into active divisions, complete in all arms of the service, and ready to march. When, by the sequel of operations, it should become apparent that no descent was to be feared, this corps of Augereau was destined to ascend the Rhine, and cover Moreau's rear in Germany. From among the 60,000 men who had been collected along the coasts, from that of Normandy to those of Brittany and Poitou, the First Consul chose such demi-brigades as were most exhausted, and ordered them to guard the insurgent country. He also took care to reduce their effective force, by transposing to the active army such soldiers as were capable of serving therein; thereby making room for more conscripts, who would be trained in the service of guarding the coasts. These he formed into five small camps, uniting artillery, cavalry, and infantry, ready to march at a moment's notice, and commanded by good officers. Two of these camps were in Belgium; one at Liege, and another at Maestricht, both intended to guard this country, harassed by continual priestcraft, and to concur, were it necessary, in the defence of Holland. There was one at Lisle, ready to throw itself upon the Somme and Normandy, one at St. Lo, and, lastly, one at Rennes. The latter was the most numerous, containing from seven to eight thousand soldiers. The others numbered from four to five thousand. These camps gave employment to about 30,000 men. They would be swelled to at least double that number by the arrival of the conscriptions. They would, at the same time, act as police in the newly conquered countries, such as Belgium; and in the provinces, recently pacified, such as Normandy, Brittany, and Poitou. The First Consul had ordered the woods to be searched for arms that might be concealed there. He had commenced the formation of three or four battalions, composed of individuals who had contracted adventurous habits in the civil war, and whom he conciliated by kind treatment; these he intended, though it was kept a secret, to send into Egypt. As to the officers, he had assigned to all of them residences at a distance from the theatre of civil war, and had softened the bitterness of this exile, by pensions fully adequate to their comfort and respectability.

These dispositions made, there remained, out of the 60,000 men collected for the pacification of the interior, about 30,000 excellent soldiers, drafted into the demi-brigades which had suffered the least. A part had returned to Paris, after the operations undertaken in Normandy against M. de Froté; the others were yet in Brittany and La Vendée. The First Consul formed of these three excellent divisions fit for war; two in Brittany, at Rennes and Nantes, and a third in Paris. These divisions he proposed to complete with all expedition; they would be supplied with such material of war as was at hand, and the rest was to be procured on their route, by means which will be explained hereafter. They had orders to proceed to the eastern frontier, "striding over France," according to the language of the First Consul, as formerly the army of Italy had bestridden the valley of the Adige. Their arrival in Switzerland was certainly fixed for the month of April.

Another resource remained, and that was the dépôts of the army of Egypt, stationed in the south of France; for, as the sea was always guarded by the English, the recruits intended for that body had never been able to join them. By now pouring them into these dépôts, fourteen excellent battalions might be obtained, fully capable of taking the field. Orders were given these to set forward for Lyons, the moment every thing should be completed. This would be an admirable fourth division, and capable of performing good service.

One of the most tedious and difficult operations in the formation of an army, is the organization of its artillery. The First Consul, wishing to form this wing of reserve in the east, had, in the dépôts of Auxonne, Besançon, and Briançon, means for forming a park of sixty guns, with men and material. Two officers of artillery, able and devoted to his interests, the Generals Marmont, and Gassendi were despatched from Paris, with orders to prepare sixty pieces of artillery in the different dépôts in question, without saying whither they were to be concentrated, employed, or combined.

A place of rendezvous for all these scattered forces was yet to be indicated. To have attempted to conceal such preparations by silence respecting their destination, would have been to betray the secret. It was the First Consul's object to deceive the enemy by the very noise which the subject would cause abroad. He inserted in the Moniteur a decree of the consuls, relative to the creation of an army of reserve, which was to be formed at Dijon, and to be composed of 60,000 men. Berthier set off post for Dijon, in order to proceed with its organization. It will be remembered, that, by the entry of Carnot into the war department, Berthier was at this moment unemployed. A warm appeal was made to the old volunteers of the Revolution, who after one or two campaigns, had returned to their homes. They were desired to repair to Dijon. In fact, some of the material of war, and some conscripts were paraded there with a great deal of ostentation. Certain old officers sent to this place, presented the appearance of forming staffs for the instruction of these conscripts. The journalists who were permitted to speak of military affairs only with great reserve, had full latitude allowed them in regard to the army in process of organization at Dijon, and accordingly they were full of details concerning it. This was enough to attract to the spot the spies of all Europe, nor did a goodly number fail to hasten thither.

Had the divisions formed at Nantes, Rennes, and Paris, from the troops drawn from La Vendée; had the division formed at Toulon, Marseilles, and Avignon, from the dépôts of the army of Egypt; had the artillery prepared at Besançon, Auxonne, and Briançon, from the resources of these arsenals; had all these been assembled at Dijon, there had been no need of the First Consul's secret, for all the world believed in the existence of an army of reserve. But he had taken good care not to manage things thus. The divisions in question were ordered to set forward, by different routes, for Geneva and Lausanne, so that public attention was not drawn to any one point in particular. They passed for reinforcements intended for the army of the Rhine, which, as it extended from Strasburg to Constance, might well be deemed the point on which they were marching. The preparations ordered in the arsenals of Auxonne and Besançon passed for a reinforcement of artillery intended for the same army. Those made at Briançon were naturally supposed to be for the troops in Liguria. Supplies of brandy were also sent by the First Consul to Geneva, but neither did this indicate his object, since the army of Germany had its base of operations in Switzerland. He caused two million rations of biscuit to be prepared in the departments bordering upon the Rhine, which were intended for the support of the army of reserve in the midst of the sterility of the Alps. Eighteen hundred thousand rations were secretly carried up the Rhone, toward Geneva, and two hundred thousand more openly sent to Toulon, which it might be supposed were intended for the purposes of the marine. To conclude, the divisions were marched slowly, and without fatiguing them, toward Geneva and Lausanne; in fact, the half of March and the whole of April were devoted to this purpose, and while on their route they were supplied with every thing of which they stood in need, shoes, clothing, muskets, and horses. The First Consul having determined upon the route they were to take, and carefully considered what the nature of their wants would be, had prepared in the different places through which they had to pass, sometimes one kind of comfort, sometimes another, taking care not to awaken attention by any accumulation of particular articles in any one place. The correspondence relative to the preparations, had been quietly kept out of the offices of the war department. It was carried on solely between himself and the heads of corps. The letters were confided to aides-de-camp who could be relied upon; who went and came post; who saw every thing with their own eyes, and did every thing with their own hands; who were armed with the irresistible orders of the First Consul; and who were, all the while, themselves strangers to the general plan which they were promoting.

The secret, which rested between the First Consul, Berthier, and two or three able officers of artillery, whom they were obliged to initiate into the plan of the campaign, was profoundly kept. In fact, no one of them could betray his trust, inasmuch as secrecy is an act of obedience insisted on by governments in exact proportion to the ascendancy which they possess. On this score, the First Consul had nothing to fear from indiscretion. As for the foreign spies, who had found their way to Dijon, seeing nothing but a handful of conscripts, volunteers, and old officers, they congratulated themselves on their address in discovering that there was nothing serious in all this; that all this ado had been made by the First Consul, evidently with no other object than that of frightening the Baron de Melas, and preventing him from advancing to the mouths of the Rhone, by the supposition that he should find, in the south of France, an army of reserve, capable of arresting his progress. The thing was so understood by all those who thought themselves good judges in the matter, and the English journals amused their readers with a thousand pleasantries on the subject. The caricaturists were also busy about the army of reserve. One represented an infant giving his hand to an invalid with a wooden leg.

This was exactly what the First Consul desired. To be a subject of mockery, at this moment, was the height of his ambition. In the meanwhile, his divisions were on the march, his material was preparing on the eastern frontier; and in the first days of May, an army would be ready, impromptu, either to second Moreau, or to throw itself beyond the Alps, and change the whole face of events.

Nor had the marine department been neglected by the First Consul. Since the cruise which Admiral Bruix had made in the Mediterranean, the year preceding, with the combined forces of France and Spain, the grand fleet under his command had remained at Brest. It consisted of fifteen Spanish, and twenty French ships of the line, and in all amounting to nearly forty vessels. At this moment they were blockaded by twenty English ships of the line. The First Consul availed himself of the first resources he had been enabled to realize, to send the fleet some provisions, and a part of the pay in arrears. He enjoined the admiral not to allow himself to be blockaded, when he had above thirty ships against twenty, but to come out at once, even if he should have to fight; and, if able, to keep the sea, to pass the straits, present himself before Toulon, take out thence the vessels laden with supplies for Egypt, and afterwards raise the blockades of Malta and Alexandria. The seas once cleared, merchant vessels alone would suffice to victual the French garrisons spread along the borders of the Mediterranean.

Such were the cares devoted by the First Consul to military affairs; while he was, at the same time, engaged with M. Sieyès, Cambacérès, Talleyrand, Gaudin, and others, in reorganizing the government, re-establishing the finances, and forming a civil and judiciary administration, in order at length to be enabled to negotiate with Europe. But it was not enough to conceive plans and prepare the way for their execution; it was necessary for him to make his lieutenants grasp them also—a task not always easy! Though submissive to the consular authority, these men were not so completely subordinate at this time as later, when, under the title of Marshals of France, they paid obedience to an emperor. In particular, the plan laid down for Moreau had disconcerted the cold head and timid character of the man. He was startled at the boldness of the operations intrusted to him. I have already spoken of the country upon which he was to carry on his operations. The Rhine, as I said, flows from east to west, from Constance to Bâle, and at Bâle takes a northern direction, passing by Brisach, Strasburg, and Mayence. In the angle which it thus describes is situated the Black Forest, a woody and mountainous country, broken by defiles, running from the valley of the Rhine to that of the Danube. The French and Austrian armies occupied, in some sort, the three sides of a triangle: two sides were occupied by the French army from Strasburg to Bâle, and from Bâle to Schaffhausen; and one side only by the Austrians, from Strasburg to Constance. The latter had, consequently, the advantage of a more ready concentration. M. de Kray, having his left upon the Prince de Reuss, in the neighbourhood of Constance, his right in the defiles of the Black Forest toward Strasburg, his centre at Donau-Eschingen, at the point of intersection of all the roads, could concentrate himself rapidly on any place which Moreau might select for the passage of the Rhine, whether from Strasburg to Bâle, or from Bâle to Constance. This proved a subject of disquietude to the French general. He was apprehensive lest M. de Kray would present himself en masse at the point of passage, and render the passage impossible, nay, perhaps disastrous.

On this point, the First Consul was under no apprehensions. On the contrary, it was his belief that the French army could easily concentrate itself upon the left flank of M. de Kray, and break through it. With this in view he was desirous, as has already been said, that, taking advantage of the curtain by which it was covered, in other words, the Rhine, the army should ascend the river without loss of time. That it should concentrate between Bâle and Schaffhausen, and, throwing four bridges over the stream with the boats which had been secreted in the tributaries of the river—which was to be done in a single morning—débouch, to the number of from eighty to one hundred thousand men, between Stokach and Donau-Eschingen, falling upon the flank of M. de Kray, cutting off his reserves to the left, and driving his shattered forces upon the upper Danube. It was his belief, that, if this operation were executed with promptitude and vigour, the Austrian army of Germany might be cut to pieces. What he performed, somewhat later, starting from a different point, but in the same country, in other words, in the neighbourhood of Ulm; what he performed this very year by way of the St. Bernard, proves that this plan had nothing in it but what was very practicable. He believed that the French army, without operating upon the enemy's ground, since it would ascend by the left bank, having only to march without fighting, might, with proper precautions, gain two or three marches upon M. de Kray, and reach the place of passage before that general should have collected sufficient means to prevent him.

Such was the plan that had disconcerted Moreau's mind, little habituated to such bold combinations. He was fearful lest M. de Kray, having been informed of the movement in time, should advance with the mass of his troops, bear down upon the French army, and drive them into the river. Moreau was for taking advantage of the bridges at Strasburg, Brisach, and Bâle, and so debouching in several columns upon the right bank. He proposed by this means to divert the attention of the Austrians, and draw them toward the defiles of the Black Forest, corresponding to the bridges of Strasburg and Brisach; and, having effected this, suddenly to retire; following the course of the Rhine with the columns which should have crossed the river, and so to place himself before Schaffhausen in order to cover the passage of the rest of the army.

Moreau's plan was not without merit, but at the same time it was not unattended with serious inconveniences: for if, on the one hand, he avoided the danger of a single passage, executed en masse; on the other, by dividing this operation, he must submit to the inconvenience of dividing his forces, of throwing upon the enemy's ground two or three detached columns, and of making them execute a dangerous flank-march as far as to Schaffhausen, where they were intended to cover the last and greatest passage of the river. In short, this plan had the disadvantage of yielding small or no results, for it would not allow the French army to throw itself wholly and at once upon the left flank of Marshal Kray; which would have been the only means of outflanking the Austrian general, and cutting him off from Bavaria.

"A spectacle of two men opposed to each other under interesting circumstances, fully calculated to bring out in relief the diversities of their minds and characters, is not unworthy of the attention of history. Moreau's plan, as often happens with the plans of men of secondary genius, had the semblance of prudence, but it had nothing more. It might, however, have succeeded in the execution; for it is necessary continually to bear it in mind, that execution redeems every thing; it sometimes defeats the best combinations, and carries the worst to triumph. Moreau, then, persisted in his view of the subject. The First Consul, desirous of convincing him through the medium of a man of enlightened mind, sent for General Dessoles, to Paris, head of the staff of the army of Germany, a man of acute intellect and solid judgment, and worthy to act as the intermediary between two men of powerful and susceptible minds. Add to this, that he had the tact of conciliating his superiors,—a talent not possessed by many in subordinate stations. Toward the middle of March, therefore, the First Consul called him to Paris, where he retained him for several days. He unfolded to him his ideas, which were perfectly comprehended by the latter, and preferred to those of Moreau. But, with all this, General Dessoles persisted in advising the First Consul to adopt Moreau's plan, because, according to him, it was necessary that the general who acts should do so according to his own ideas and character; provided, always, that he is a man worthy of the command intrusted to him. "Your plan," said he, to the First Consul, "is grander, more decisive, and probably even surer: but it is not adapted to the genius of the man who is to execute it. You have a method of making war which is superior to all others; Moreau has his own,—inferior, doubtless to yours, but still an excellent one. Leave him to himself; he will act well, slowly perhaps, but surely; and he will obtain as many results for you as are necessary for the success of your general combinations. If, on the contrary, you impose your ideas upon him, you will disconcert him, you will wound his self-love, and obtain nothing from him, by seeking to obtain too much." The First Consul, not less profoundly versed in the knowledge of men, than in that of his art, appreciated the wisdom of General Dessoles' advice, and yielded the point. "You are right," said he; "Moreau is not capable of grasping and executing the plan which I have conceived. Let him follow his own course; only let him push back Marshal de Kray upon Ulm and Ratisbon, and afterward move his right wing in time, upon Switzerland. The plan which he does not understand, and dares not execute, I myself will carry out, on another part of the theatre of war. What he dares not attempt upon the Rhine, I will accomplish on the Alps. The day may come when he will regret the glory which he yields to me." Proud and deep speech! containing, as will soon appear, a whole military prophecy.¹

¹ I had the honour, when yet a mere youth, to receive this circumstance from the lips of General Dessoles himself.—Note by the Author.

Moreau being thus left to cross the Rhine after his own fashion, another point remained to be settled. The First Consul was very desirous, that the right wing, commanded by Lecourbe, should remain in reserve upon the Swiss territory, ready to succour Moreau, should he have need of it, and that it should not penetrate into Germany, unless its presence should be indispensable there, so that it should not have to retrace its steps in order to reach the Alps. He was well aware how difficult a matter it is to induce a general-in-chief to yield possession of a detachment of his army, operations having once commenced. Moreau insisted upon having Lecourbe, engaging to hand him over to General Bonaparte, the moment he should have succeeded in driving Marshal de Kray upon Ulm. This point also the First Consul conceded, resolved to do every thing to maintain a good understanding; but he insisted that Moreau should sign a stipulation whereby he promised, after pushing back the Austrians upon Ulm, to detach Lecourbe with 20 or 25,000 men toward the Alps. This agreement was signed at Bâle, between Moreau and Berthier, the latter being officially considered as general-in-chief of the army of reserve.

After having satisfactorily settled the points in discussion with the First Consul, General Dessoles quitted Paris. All was agreed; every thing was ready for entering upon the campaign, and it was important to commence operations immediately, in order that, Moreau having executed his portion of the plan, the First Consul might throw himself across the Alps, and extricate Massena before he should be overpowered, for he was contending with 36,000 against 120,000 men. The First Consul urged it, then, that Moreau should act by the middle of April, or, at latest, by the end of that month. But his urgency was vain; Moreau was not ready, and had neither the activity nor the mental resources which supply the deficiency of means. While he lingered, the Austrians, faithful to their plan of taking the initiative in Italy, threw themselves upon Massena, and commenced a struggle with that general, which is worthy of immortal fame from the disproportion of forces employed.

The army of Liguria presented at the most but 36,000 men fit for active service, and these distributed as follows:—

Thirteen or fourteen thousand men, under General Suchet, forming the left of the army, occupied the Col di Tende, Nice, and the line of the Var. Of this wing, a detached corps, amounting to about 4000 men, under the orders of General Thureau, was posted upon the Mount Cenis. Consequently 18,000 men were employed to guard the frontier of France from the Mount Cenis to the Col di Tende.

Ten or twelve thousand men, under General Soult, forming the centre of the army, defended the two principal defiles of the Apennines, that which opens upon Savona and Tivale by the upper Bormida, and that of the Bochetta, which opens upon Genoa.

Seven or eight thousand men, under the intrepid Miollis, guarded Genoa, and a definiwhich opens near that city, on the side opposite to Bocchetta. Thus, the second half of the army, consisting of about 18,000 men, under Generals Soult and Miollis, defended the Apennines and Liguria. The danger of a separation between these two portions of the army, that occupying Nice, and that occupying Genoa, is evident.

These 36,000 French were in the presence of 120,000 Austrians, under Baron de Melas; fresh troops, well rested, well fed, well victualled, and in good condition, thanks to the abundance of every thing in Italy, and to the subsidies furnished by England to Austria. General Kaim, with the heavy artillery, the cavalry, and a corps of infantry, in all 50,000 men, had been left in Piedmont, to serve as a rear-guard, and observe the defiles of Switzerland. The Baron de Melas, with 70,000 men, the greater part infantry, had advanced toward the defiles of the Apennines. Besides superiority of numbers, he had the advantage of a concentric position; for Massena, with his 30,000 men—the surplus occupying the Mount Cenis—was obliged to guard the semicircle formed by the maritime Alps and the Apennines, from Nice to Genoa; a semicircle which is not less than forty leagues in circumference. General de Melas, on the contrary, being posted on the other side of the mountains, in the centre of this semicircle, between Coni, Ceva, and Gavi, had but a short distance to traverse in order to reach whichever of the points he might choose to attack. He could easily make false demonstrations upon one of these points, and rapidly convey himself to the other, and there act en masse. Massena, if menaced in this manner, had forty leagues to traverse in going from Nice to the succour of Genoa, or from Genoa to that of Nice.

Upon this state of things was based the advice given by the First Consul to Massena, advice which has been already generally reported, but which it will be now necessary to give here more in detail. Three roads fit for artillery lead from one flank of the mountains to the other; that which opens by Turin, Coni, and Tende upon Nice and the Var; that which, ascending the valley of the Bormida, opens by the defile of Cadibona upon Savona; and lastly, that of the Bocchetta, which, by Tortona and Gavi, descends, on the left of Genoa, into the valley Della Polcevera. The greatest danger would arise from the Baron de Melas throwing himself en masse upon the central pass, and cutting the French army in two, throwing the one half upon Nice and the other half upon Genoa. Aware of this danger, the First Consul addressed to Massena letters full of admirable foresight—March 5 and 12—and filled with instructions, of which the following is the substance: "Take care," said he, "not to extend your line too widely. Have but few men on the Alps, or in the defile of the Tende, where the snow will protect you. Leave some detachments upon Nice and the forts in its vicinity, keep four-fifths of your force in Genoa and its neighbourhood. The enemy will debouch upon your right in the direction of Genoa, on your centre in the direction of Savona, and probably on the two points at once. Refuse one of the two attacks, and throw yourself, with all your forces united, upon one of the enemy's columns. The nature of the ground will not allow him to avail himself of his superiority in artillery and cavalry; he can only attack you with his infantry, and yours is infinitely superior to his; and, favoured by the nature of the place, it may make up for deficiency in number. In that broken country, if you manœuvre well, with 30,000 men you may give battle to 60,000: in order to carry 60,000 light-armed troops into Liguria, M. de Melas must have 90,000, which supposes a total army of 120,000 men at least. M. de Melas possesses neither your talents nor activity; you have no reason to fear him. If he appear in the direction of Nice, you being at Genoa, let him come on, stir not from your position: he will not advance far if you remain in Liguria, ready to throw yourself upon his rear, or upon the troops left in Piedmont."

Various causes prevented Massena from following these wise counsels. In the first place, he was surprised by the rapid irruption of the Austrians, before he had time to rectify the position of his troops and determine upon the dispositions definitively to be taken; secondly, he had not sufficient provisions in the town of Genoa, to be able to concentrate the whole of his army thereupon. Fearing that he should be short of provisions in case of a siege, he wished to avail himself of the resources of Nice, which were much more abundant. In a word, if the truth must be spoken, Massena did not sufficiently comprehend the whole scope of his chief's instructions, to admit of his setting at naught all the inconveniences—and very great they were—of a general concentration upon Genoa. Massena was, perhaps, the first general of his day on the field of battle; in point of decision he may rank with the firmest generals of any age; but, though endowed with great natural talent, the extent of his views was not equal to the quickness of his glance, and the energy of his mind.

Thus, from want of time, from want of provisions, and from a want of feeling the importance of an earlier concentration upon Genoa, he was surprised by the Austrians. The latter were in full activity the 5th of April—15th of Germinal—that is, long before the period when the resumption of hostilities could have been deemed possible. The Baron de Melas advanced with from seventy to seventy-five thousand men, in order to force the chain of the Apennines. His lieutenants, Ott and Hohenzollern, were directed with 25,000 men upon Genoa. General Ott, with 15,000, ascending the Trebbia, presented himself by the defiles of Scoffera and Monte Cretio, which open upon the right of Genoa; General Hohenzollern, with 10,000 men, menaced the Bocchetta, which opens upon the left of the same place. The Baron de Melas, with 50,000 men, ascended the Bormida, and attacked simultaneously all the positions on that route, which we have described as the middle road, passing Cadibona, and terminating at Savona. His intention, as the First Consul had foreseen, was to force our centre, and to ect of General Suchet from General Soult, who were in communication near this point. A violent struggle had, therefore, commenced from the sources of the Tanaro and Bormida, even to the precipitous heights which overlook Genoa. Generals Elsnitz and Melas maintained fiercely contested affairs against General Suchet, at Rocca, Barbena, Settepani, Melogno, and San Giacomo; and against General Soult at Montelegrino, Stella, Cadibona, and Savona. The soldiers of the republic, taking advantage of this mountainous country, and covering themselves by the inequalities of the ground, made a defence of incomparable bravery, with a loss to the enemy of three times the number of their own slain, for they kept up a plunging fire upon dense and deep masses of men. But, being obliged to fight incessantly, against fresh troops continually succeeding each other, they saw themselves at length obliged to yield the ground, overcome by fatigue and exhaustion, rather than by the Austrians. Generals Suchet and Soult were compelled to separate, and retired, the one upon Borghetto, the other upon Savona. The French line was, therefore, cut in two, as might easily have been foreseen; half the army of Liguria was thrown upon Nice, and half was condemned to shut itself up in Genoa.

On the side of Genoa itself, the success had been doubtful. The attack of the Bocchetta, attempted by Count Hohenzollern with force insufficient to overcome the French, that is with about 10,000 men against 5,000, was repulsed by General Gazan's division. But, to the right of Genoa, that is, toward the positions of Monte Creto and Scoffera, which give access to the valley of Bisagno, General Ott, conquering the division of Miollis, who had not 4,000 men to oppose to 15,000, descended the acclivity of the Apennines, and surrounding all the forts that cover the city, displayed the Austrian flag to the affrighted Genoese. At the same moment the English squadron heaving in sight, showed them the British colours. If the inhabitants of the city were patriots and partisans of the French, the peasantry of the neighbouring villages being, like the Calabrians, attached to the aristocratic party, and feeling the same devotion to Queen Caroline which had actuated the Vendéans in France toward the Bourbons, rose in arms at the sight of the soldiers of the coalition. The tocsin was sounded in every village. A certain Baron d'Aspres, attached to the imperial service, and possessing some influence in the country, excited them to revolt. On the evening of the 6th of April, the unhappy citizens of Genoa, withholding upon the neighbouring mountains the camp-fires of the Austrians, and upon the sea the flag of the English floating far and wide, had every reason to fear, that the oligarchy, already mad with joy, would, in a few days, re-establish their detested sway. But the intrepid Massena was among them. Although separated from General Suchet by the attack directed on his centre, he still numbered from fifteen to eighteen thousand men; and supported by such a garrison, he might defy any enemy, whosoever he might be, to force the gates of Genoa, under his eyes.

To render comprehensible the operations which the French general executed during this memorable siege, it becomes necessary to describe the theatre on which they were carried on. Genoa is situated at the very bottom of the fine gulf which bears its name, at the foot of a spur of the Apennines. This spur running down from the north to the southward, to meet the waters, divides itself, before plunging into them, into two ridges one pointing toward the east, the other toward the west, thus forming an inclined triangle, the summit of which is connected to the Apennines, while the base rests upon the sea. It is along the base of this triangle, but let it be well understood with all the irregularity of nature, that Genoa lies stretched out in elongated streets, bordered by splendid palaces. Nature and art have both done much for its defence. On the sea side two moles, running out one toward the other, until they almost cross, form the port and defend it from hostile squadrons. On the landward, a rampart with bastions surround it, close to the thickly built and populous portion of the town. A second circuit of lines, with bastions like the inner rampart, is drawn along the heights which encompass Genoa, as I have said, with a triangular enclosure. Two forts, arranged in stages one above the other, known as the forts of the Spur and of the Diamond, were placed at the apex of this triangular figure, and commanded all the lines of the fortification by their commanding fire. But these were not the only means of keeping the enemy at a distance. One turning his back to the sea and looking toward Genoa, has the east on his right hand and the west on his left. Two small rivers, that of Bisagno on the east or right hand, that of Polcevera on the west or left, bathe the two sides of the exterior lines. The Bisagno comes down from the very summit of the heights of Monte Creto and Scoffera, which must be crossed in coming up the valley from the Trebbia from the other flank of the Apennine. The slope, farthest from the city, of the dell of the Bisagno, is called the Monte Ratti, and presents several strong positions, from which great damage might be done to Genoa had they not been occupied. Great care has been taken, therefore, to crown them by the three forts of Quezzi, of Richelieu, and of St. Tecla. The valley of the Polcevera, on the contrary, which lies on the left of Genoa, and descends from the heights of Bocchetta, offers no position of eminence which it has been necessary to fortify for the protection of the city. But a long suburb, that of Saint Pierre d'Arena composes a mass of houses both useful and easy to be defended. Thus the fortifications of Genoa present a triangle, at an inclination of 15 degrees to the horizon, being about 9000 yards in extent, connected at its apex with the Apennines, bathed at its base by the sea, and washed on the east and west by the Bisagno and the Polcevera. The Fort of the Spur, and above the Spur that of the Diamond, cover its summit. The forts of Richelieu, of Saint Tecla, and Quezzi prevent a destructive fire from being opened on the city of marble palaces from the flanks of Monte Ratti. Such was Genoa then. Such were its defences, which art, time, and the contributions imposed on France have since that period vastly improved. Massena could still combine 18,000 men. If, with such a garrison in so strong a place, he had possessed a sufficient quantity of provisions, it would have been invincible. It will now appear how vast may be the influence of energetic character in repairing an error of combination or of foresight.

Massena, resolute to oppose the enemy with an energetical resistance, determined at once on executing two very important projects—the first was to beat back the Austrians, who were pressing Genoa too closely, across the Apennines; the second was to effect a junction with General Suchet, by means of a movement along the road of Corniche.

In order to the execution of his first design, it would be necessary to drive back the Austrians along the Bisagno on one side, and along the Polcevera on the other, to force them over the Monte Creto, and over the Bocchetta to the other declivity of the mountains whence they had come. Without losing even a day, on the day which followed their first appearance, that is to say, on the 7th of April—the 17th Germinal—he issued from Genoa on the eastern side, followed by the brave division of Miollis, which, on the day but one preceding, had been compelled to retire before the superior forces of General Ott. He strengthened this division with a part of his reserve, and putting himself at the head of the whole, marched in two columns. That of the right, under General d'Arnaud, marched along the sea in the direction of Quinto. That of the left, under Miollis, was led against the encampments of the Monte Ratti. A third column under General Petitot followed the valley of the Bisagno, in the ascending line, as it winds round the base of the Monte Ratti. The precision of the movement of these three columns was such, that their fire was heard on all points at the same moment. General Arnaud on one acclivity, and General Miollis on the other, stormed the heights of Monte Ratti with extraordinary vigour. The presence of Massena himself, the desire of avenging the surprise of the previous day, animated the soldiers to the utmost. The Austrians were driven pell-mell into the torrents, and lost all their positions. General Arnaud passed farther, and following the crest of the heights, carried the heights of the Apennines, up to the Col de Scoffera. Massena, followed by some companies of the reserve, rushed down into the valley of the Bisagno, to join the column under General Petitot. That column, thus reinforced, beat the enemy at all points, and ascending the valley of the river, came up and seconded the movement of General Arnaud on Scoffera. Precipitated into those tortuous valleys, the Austrians left 1500 prisoners in the hands of Massena, and at their head the Baron d'Aspres, who had instigated the peasants of La Fonte-Buona to revolt. When, on the evening of the same day Massena re-entered Geneva, after having delivered the Genoese from the sight of their enemies, and bringing in as a prisoner that officer whose triumphant approach had been so widely bruted, the joy of the patriot population, which was the most numerous by far, was extreme. He was received with acclamations. The inhabitants had prepared litters whereon to carry the wounded; and wine and soups for their nourishment, the people disputing everywhere with one another the honour of receiving them in their houses.

After this act of vigour to the eastward, the most important to relieve from assailants, because on that side only did the Austrians encroach upon the town, Massena determined on taking advantage of the respite which his success had procured him, to make an effort to the west, that is to say, toward Savona, and to re-establish by that method his communication with General Suchet. In order to secure Genoa from the peril of any attack during his absence, he divided the troops which remained to him into two bodies. That of the right under General Miollis, and that of the left under General Soult. That of General Miollis was intended to guard Genoa with two divisions; the division of Arnaud on the east, having his front toward the Bisagno; the division of Spital on the west, with its front toward the Polcevera. The corps of the left, under General Soult, was meant to keep the field, with the two divisions of Gardanne and Gazan. It is with this force of about 10,000 men, that Massena proposed to advance upon Savona, directing Suchet, by secret advices, to attempt a simultaneous movement on the same point. The division of Gardanne was directed along the coast, and the division of Gazan along the crest of the Apennines, with the intention of inducing the enemy to divide his force at the sight of these two separate columns. Manœuvring thereafter very rapidly on this ground, with which he was thoroughly acquainted, Massena proposed, according to circumstances, to unite his two divisions into one, so as to crush, either on the ridge of the Apennines or on the sea-coast, that body of the enemy which should be the most exposed to a blow. He commanded in person the division of Gardanne, having intrusted to General Soult that of Gazan. His plan was this, to follow the coast-road by Veltro, Varaggio, and Savona, his lieutenant-general, Soult, having instructions to ascend, by way of Acqua Bianca, and San Pietro del Alba, upon Sassello.

On the morning of the 9th of April, our troops began their movement. The Baron de Melas, after having cut the French army in two, was bent on shutting up Massena in Genoa, and contracting his own line, at the same moment, which was by far too much extended. For it covered, from the valley of the Tanaro to that of the Trebbia, a space of at least fifteen leagues. The two armies met in their movement, and there ensued, on that difficult and broken ground, a struggle at once most desperate and most disorderly. While Massena was marching in two columns, the Baron de Melas was marching in three, and the Count de Hohenzollern was preparing, with a fourth, a new attack on the Bocchetta. Ten thousand French were on the point of encountering more than forty thousand of the enemy

General Soult, filing through Voltri, discovered the Austrians, who had passed the Bocchetta and crowned the heights around it upon his right. Having reached a place called Aqua-Santa, they were in a condition to threaten the rear of the French columns, and intercept their return to Genoa. General Soult judged it wise, therefore, to repulse them, and delivered that brilliant combat in which Colonel, since Maréchal Mouton, and Count Lobau, commander of the 3d demi-brigade, conducted themselves with such distinguished valour. General Soult took some cannon and some prisoners, and succeeded, against a cloud of the enemy, in carrying the mountainous road of Sassello. Nevertheless, the time spent in that combat, which, moreover did not check the ulterior progress of the Austrians, prevented General Soult from reaching Sassello, on the upper side of the Apennines, at the moment when General Massena expected him. The latter had marched along the sea-shore, and, on the next day, the 10th of April, was in the vicinity of Varaggio, formed in two columns, and, endeavouring to place himself in communication with the corps of General Soult, along the heights. For he supposed him to be at Sassello. The enemy, whose forces exceeded ours tenfold, endeavoured to surround the two small columns of Massena, and, more particularly, that which he led in person. Massena, relying on his right hand column, and on the movement of General Soult on Sassello, resisted for a long time, with 1200 men, a corps of eight or ten thousand, and displayed on this occasion extraordinary firmness. Obligated to fight a retreating battle, and having lost sight of his right column, which had remained in the rear, owing to a tardy distribution of provisions, he threw himself into the midst of hideous precipices, and bands of revolted peasantry, in the endeavour to seek it out. Having succeeded in bringing about a junction with it, he hurried it up to join the remainder of the division of Gardanne which had not ceased to follow the shore-road by Varaggio and Cogoletta. The difficulty of concerting movements in ground so broken, having prevented the union of Soult's corps with that of Massena at the time when it could have been useful, the latter determined on rallying his troops, scaling the crest of the Apennines on his right, reuniting himself with his lieutenant, and thus falling on the Austrian corps dispersed in the valleys. But our troops being exhausted, had struggled on the roads, and could not be rallied in time. Massena then took up the project of sending all that were in a state to march, to Soult, as a reinforcement; and with the rest, which was composed of wounded and worn-out men, still following the sea-board, he gained the approaches of Genoa, in order to cover the retreat of the main force, and to secure his entrance into the place. Reduced to a mere handful of men, he was obliged to sustain, several times, the most disproportioned combats, and in one of these encounters a French battalion being surprised and on the point of yielding to a charge of the hussars of Szeckler, he charged the hussars himself, with thirty horsemen, and drove them back. He succeeded at length in taking post at Voltri, to await the return of General Soult. He, forced into the mountains, in the midst of detachments of the enemy, five or six times his own superiors in number, after the most glorious efforts, must in the end have been cut off, but for the arrival of the succour which Massena sent to him so timely. Reinforced thus, he was enabled to recover the route to Genoa, after having sustained, with advantage, the most difficult and unequal struggle. At length he rejoined his general-in-chief, and the two entered Genoa together, cutting their way through the enemy, and bringing in with them 4,000 prisoners. General Suchet, on the other hand, had endeavoured to rejoin his general-in-chief, but was unable to pierce the enormous masses of the Austrian army.

Vol. I.—13

The Genoese were transported with admiration at sight of the French general entering their city a second time, preceded by columns of prisoners. His ascendancy had become all powerful. The army and the population obeyed him with the most absolute submission.

From this moment Massena was bound to consider himself as definitively shut up in Genoa. But he had no idea of suffering himself to be cramped for room. It was his plan, to keep the enemy at a distance from the walls, to exhaust him by continual combats, and to occupy him so constantly that he should neither be able to force the Var, nor to return into Lombardy; nor yet to oppose the projected march of the First Consul across the Alps.

Scarce had he entered Genoa, on the 18th of April—28th Germinal—ere he began to occupy himself with the internal police, and the provisioning of the place. Fearing the treachery of which the Genoese nobles might be capable, he took his precautions against any surprise in that quarter. The National Guard, composed of Ligurian patriots, supported by a French force, encamped in the principal square of the place, with loaded cannon and lighted matches, was ordered to run to arms, whenever the drums should beat the general. At this signal the inhabitants not forming a part of it had orders to retire to their houses. The armed troops alone were authorized to go the rounds of the streets. In ordinary times the inhabitants were directed to be in their own houses at ten in the evening, and were never permitted to assemble in numbers.

Massena had taken all the grain that was in Genoa, offering to pay for it, when brought in voluntarily, but seizing it by means of domiciliary visits, when refusals to deliver it occurred. After having thus taken possession of all the grain, he put the army and the people on rations, and so procured food enough to supply the soldiers, and the poor inhabitants, during the first fortnight of the siege. This fortnight had nearly elapsed; but there still remained provisions which the gold of the rich produced at a vast price from certain concealed magazines, though for their own use solely. Under Massena's orders fresh searches were made, and enough was found in grain of inferior quality, rye, oats, and the like, wherewith to feed the army and the people with bad bread for another fortnight. It was hoped that some change of wind, driving the English squadron off the coast, might admit the provision ships. Some reckoning was also made on the Corsican and Ligurian privateers, to which letters of marque had been delivered in order to board all vessels loaded with corn. After all, Massena having determined to hold out to the last extremity, resolved, rather than surrender, that he would feed his troops on cocoa, with which Genoa was abundantly supplied. Furnished with some money by the First Consul, he reserved it for a last resource in extremities, and used it likewise for the consolation of his unfortunate soldiery from time to time under their cruel sufferings. Already in the succession of actions several thousand men had been put hors de combat, and a considerable number were in hospitals. But there were still in the forts, in the two lines of circumvallation, and in reserve, an active force of about 12,000 combatants.

In the midst of these fearful circumstances, Massena, showing himself daily with a calm and fearless aspect, succeeded at length in inspiring all with his own hardy courage. His aid-de-camp, Franceschi, threw himself into a pinnace, intending to run down the coast to Nice, to see the First Consul, and acquaint him with the sufferings, the exploits, and the dangers of the army of Liguria.

On the 30th of April—10th of Floreal—during the morning, a general cannonading, which roared forth from all points at once to the eastward, from the side of the Bisagno, to the westward, from the side of the Polcevera, and, to conclude along the coast, from the sea itself, whence it was maintained by a division of gun-boats, announced some great movement of the enemy. And in fact during that day the Austrians displayed great forces. The Count of Hohenzollern attacked the plateau of the Two Brothers, on which stood the Diamond fort. After a brisk struggle he succeeded in carrying the plateau, and summoned the Diamond fort. The brave officer who commanded that fort, replied to the summons by declaring that he would not give up the post intrusted to him, until it had sustained an attack. This fort was of the highest importance, because it commanded that of the Spur; and, in consequence, the whole of the fortified lines. The Austrian camp of La Coronata, situated on the margin of La Polcevera, toward the western face, opened a violent fire on the suburb of Saint Pierre d'Arena, and several attacks were attempted with a view to narrowing our ground on that side. On the opposite face, that is to say toward the Bisagno, the enemy surrounded Fort Richelieu, and unhappily succeeded in carrying Fort Quezzi, which was entirely finished, when the siege commenced. Afterward he gained possession of the village of Saint Martin d'Albaro, placed under the fire of Saint Tecla, and was on the point of occupying a formidable position, that of the Madonna del Monte, whence the town of Genoa might be cannonaded. Already the soldiers of General d'Arnaud had abandoned the last houses of the village of Saint Martin d'Albaro, they scarce kept their ranks, and many had dispersed into skirmishing order, when Massena rushed to the spot in person, rallied the men himself, re-established the fight, and checked the enemy.

Half of the day was already spent, but there was time yet to repair the mischief. Massena instantly returned into Genoa, and made the necessary dispositions. He gave General Soult the 73d and 106th demi-brigades, and ordered him to retake the plateau of the Two Brothers. But desiring first to reconquer the fort of Quezzi, and to compel the enemy to evacuate Saint Martin d'Albaro, he directed, in person, the division of General Miollis, against that point, after having reinforced it with two battalions, borrowed from the 2d and 3d of the line.

The division of Arnaud, led forward, turned Saint Martin d'Albaro, drove down the enemy who had occupied it into the ravine of the Sturla, made many prisoners, and thus covered the right of the French columns which were advancing against Fort Quezzi. While the brave Colonel Mouton, at the head of two battalions of the 3d, attacked this Fort Quezzi in front, the Adjutant-General Hector was ordered to turn the Monte Ratti, by the heights of Richelieu. After indescribable efforts, the brave Colonel Mouton was repulsed, but he did not yield the attack until after he had been struck by a musket-ball, which passed through his breast, and left him nearly dead on the field of battle. Massena, who had now but two battalions left, pushed forward one against the right flank of the position occupied by the enemy, and directed one half of the other against the left flank of the same position. A violent combat ensued around Fort Quezzi. Too close to each other to fire, the combatants hurled stones at each other and fought with the butts of their guns. Our soldiers were on the point of yielding to superior numbers, when Massena launched the half battalion which he held in reserve, into the fight, leading it himself, and decided the victory. Fort Quezzi was thus retaken. The Austrians, driven from position to position, left their dead on the field, in great numbers, and many wounded and prisoners. At this moment Massena, who had deferred the attack of the plateau of the Two Brothers, took advantage of the effect produced by this success, and sent orders to General Soult to carry it. Spital, a general of brigade, was assigned to this duty, and met with vigorous resistance. At last, however, our soldiers carried it. And thus, after a whole day's fighting, they recovered at once the plateau of the Two Brothers, which commanded the extreme point of the place; the fort of Quezzi; the posts of Saint Martin d'Albaro; and of the Madonna del Monte; in short, all the decisive positions, without carrying which, the Austrians could not possibly lay close siege to the city. Massena entered Genoa at night, carrying with him the ladders which the enemy had prepared to escalate the walls. The Austrians had lost in this day's fighting 1600 prisoners, 2400 men in killed and wounded.

in all about 4000 me. Including these, Massena had taken and slain, since the opening of hostilities, from 12,000 to 15,000 men, and what is worse, he had exhausted the moral sense of their army, by the extraordinary efforts he had compelled them to make.

All despatch was used in repairing the fort of Quezzi. This work, which seemed to be more than a month's duty, was finished in three days, by means of five or six hundred barrels of earth, which were rolled thither by the soldiers and served to raise the entrenchments. On the 5th of May—15th of Floreal—a small vessel brought in provisions sufficient for five days. But it was becoming urgent that the place should be succoured, without which it would not be able to hold out much longer. Bread was about to fail them.

General Suchet, for his part, seeing that he was overlapped, by the crests of the Apennines, had been forced to leave the position of Borghetto, and even to abandon La Roya, which was no longer tenable, the enemy marching at his ease by the Col de Tende, and menacing Nice and the Var. Nice was even occupied by the Baron de Melas, who entered that town in triumph, delighted to tread a soil which the republic had declared a portion of the French territory. But General Suchet rallied his forces behind the Var, in a position which had been studied, long before, by our engineer officers. The bridge of St. Laurent, across the Var, covered by a bridge-head, presented a defile, to be traversed, of four hundred yards in length, which might be regarded as an insurmountable obstacle. All the right bank, guarded by the French, was covered with batteries from the river's mouth to the mountains. The forts of Montalban and Vintimiglia, situated in front of the Var, had been occupied by French garrisons at the moment of the evacuation of Nice. That of Montalban, situated in the rear of the Austrians, on a height which rendered it visible from the French camp, was surmounted by a telegraph, by means of which General Suchet was informed of all the enemies' movements. All the disposable forces of all arms had been brought up to him from the neighbouring departments; and he numbered about fourteen thousand soldiers, whom, being well covered and in a good position, it would prove difficult to force.

On receiving the news from Liguria, the First Consul addressed urgent solicitations to Moreau to induce him to commence hostilities. It was a month since every thing had been arranged between them, and no difficulty imputable to the government delayed the movement of Moreau's army. But Moreau was by nature a little slow, and not wishing to risk himself on the enemy's ground without a certainty of success, put off, to great disadvantage, the commencement of operations. Every delay to his entering on active operations, was in fact a delay to the army of reserve, and a cruel prolongation of sufferings to Massena and his brave soldiery. "Hasten," such was the tenor of the letters written from Paris to Moreau, "hasten by your success to accelerate the arrival of the moment, at which Massena can be disengaged. That general wants provisions.

For fifteen days he has been enduring, with his debilitated soldiers, a struggle of despair. Your patriotism is addressed, your self-interest; for if Massena shall be compelled to capitulate, it will be necessary to take from you a portion of your forces, to hurry down the Rhone and assist the departments of the south." At last a positive order, by the telegraph, was sent him to pass the Rhine.

The reasons, which prevented Moreau from acting, would have been good under any circumstances less urgent than those of the time. Alsatia was exhausted; Switzerland yet more, having been for two years overrun by the armies of all Europe, was utterly stripped of resources. They were compelled to transport troops of children from the poor to the rich cantons, for want of means to nourish them. Ruined families committed their offspring thus to the benevolence of other families, which still possessed some means of supporting them. Nothing could be demanded from a country in such a condition; a country, moreover, which it would not do to exasperate, for it was the base of operations to our two principal armies. Moreau, as I have stated, was living on the siege magazines of the places on the Rhine. Nevertheless, this was not the real motive of his delays. This would have been rather an inducement to go and support himself as quickly as possible in the enemy's country. But his artillery and cavalry wanted horses. he had no entrenching tools, no camp equipage. If he had the means of making a bridge, that was all. Nevertheless, taking into view the urgency of circumstances, he consented to do without that which he had not, and to advance, in the hope of supplying himself on the road. His army was so admirably constituted, that it might well supply itself with all that which it lacked, or do without it, or, at the worst, win it. At the end of April, then, the first days of Floreal, Moreau determined that he would begin this campaign, the finest of his life, and one of the most memorable in our annals.

He had at his disposal, as I have mentioned nearly one hundred and thirty thousand men more or less; about thirty thousand occupying the garrisons of Strasburg, Landau, Mayence, and the bridge-heads of Bâle, Brisach, Kehl, and Cassel. Of these thirty thousand, six or seven thousand under General Moncey guarded the valleys of St. Gothard and the Simplon, to close them against the Austrians, in case they should attempt to force them. There remained one hundred thousand men to the active army. Its infantry was superb. It numbered eighty-two thousand men; the artillery five thousand, serving one hundred and sixteen pieces; the cavalry thirteen thousand. As it will be seen, the two arms of artillery and cavalry were much below the usual standard, but they were admirably composed, and the quality of the infantry permitted it, moreover, to dispense with all auxiliary arms.

Moreau divided his army into four corps. Lecourbe commanded the right, twenty-five thousand strong, stationed from Lake Constance to Schaffhausen. A second corps under the name of the reserve, amounting to nearly thirty thousand men, and placed directly under the orders of Moreau, occupied the territory of Bâle. A third, of twenty-five thousand men forming the centre, under the orders of Saint-Cyr, was spread around Old and New Brisach; and, to complete the tale, General Sainte-Suzanne, at the head of about twenty thousand men, having ascended the river from Mayence to Strasburg, occupied that place and Kehl, and formed the left of the army:

Moreau had for a long time adopted the division of the army into separate corps, complete in infantry, artillery, and cavalry, and having the ability of acting by themselves as often as it should be needed. But this produced one disadvantage—that they were apt, as experience showed, to isolate themselves voluntarily, and to act on their own account, especially when the general-in-chief did not act with sufficient vigour of authority to combine them at all times in common operation. This disadvantage was increased, moreover, by a particular arrangement which Moreau himself adopted in this campaign. I mean, by his reserving to himself directly the command of one of these corps, and calling it by the name of reserve. Saint-Cyr, who had long served with Moreau, and had great influence with him, opposed this resolution violently,¹ to which he objected that it obstructed the general-in-chief, obliged him to descend to a part which was not his own, and, above all, that it would be detrimental to the other armies, which are rarely so well treated as the troops placed directly under the general's staff. But these criticisms, the truth of which was proved by the campaign that followed, did not prevail. Moreau persisted in his resolution, from complaisance to the interests of a clique. Having already given the direction of his staff to General Dessolles, and wishing to make a place for General Lahorie, one of those dangerous friends who destroyed him at a later date, he gave him the command in second of the reserve. This circumstance produced a coldness between Moreau and Saint-Cyr, which soon changed itself into an open rupture.

M. de Kray, who was opposed to Moreau, had, as I have mentioned, 150,000 men; 40,000 of whom were in garrison on the Rhine and Danube, and 110,000 in the active army. The infantry, which was made up of Bavarians, Wirtembergers and Mayençais, was tolerably good. The cavalry, numbering 26,000 horses, was superb. The artillery, both numerous and well-served, amounted to three hundred guns. The right of the Austrians observed the course of the Rhine, under the orders of M. de Sztarray, between Mayence and Rastadt, keeping up a connection with the bodies of peasantry commanded by the Baron d'Albini. General Kienmayer covered the defile of Strasburg, in front of the Kinzig. Major Girulay, with a brigade, held the Vale of Hell, and observed Old Brisach. The main strength of the Austrian army was encamped behind the defiles of the Black Forest, at Donau-Eschingen and Villingen, at the point of junction between the roads leading from the Rhine to the Danube. Forty thousand men were united at this point. And M. de Kray had placed in the forest towns a strong vanguard, under the Archduke Ferdinand, in charge to observe the route of Bâle. He had left a numerous garrison under Prince Joseph of Lorraine, at Stockach, to cover his magazines established in that town, to guard the roads of Ulm and Munich, and to connect himself with Lake Constance, whereon the English William commanded a flotilla. To conclude, the Prince of Reuss, at the head of 30,000 men, some Austrian regiments, some Tyrolese militia, occupied the Reinthal from the Grisons to Constance. This was considered as the left of the imperial army. M. de Kray, in the centre of the net which he had spread on all sides around him, flattered himself that he should be informed at once of the slightest movement of the French.

The project of Moreau, explained heretofore, and consisting in displaying himself on three points, in order to convey himself out of sight afterward, and to ascend the Rhine as far as Schaffhausen, had been adopted without alteration.² On the 25th of April, he put his troops in motion. He had gone to Strasburg in person, in the midst of Sainte-Suzanne's corps, in order to induce the belief that it was his intention to take the direct route from Strasburg across the Black Forest. He had taken another precaution to conceal his movements to advantage, which was not to collect his troops previous to marching. The demi-brigades set forth, each one from its own cantonment for the spot, whereat it was intended to pass the Rhine, and thus were combined on the march to the corps of which they formed integral parts. Every thing being calculated thus three imposing heads of columns, acting simultaneously on a space of thirty leagues crossed at the same moment the bridges on Strasburg, of Old Brisach, and of Bâle. This was on the 25th of April.

General Sainte-Suzanne, who commanded the extreme left, and took his departure from Strasburg, swept every thing that he found before him from his way. He met here and there some detached corps, the resistance of which was hardly worthy of mention. Not being willing, however, to engage himself in any serious combat, he halted between Renchen and Offenbourg, threatening at the same time the two valleys of the Renchen and the Kinzig, but endeavouring above all to persuade the Austrians that it was his intention to gain the Danube through the Black Forest, acting along the valley of the Kinzig. At the same instant Saint-Cyr defied from Old Brisach, and advanced to Fribourg, driving the enemy's detachments suddenly before him, but like Sainte-Suzanne, aware of the danger of engaging himself too much in advance. He found some difficulty at Fribourg. The Austrians had retrenched the heights which surrounded that city, and had placed behind those retrenchments some bands of peasantry raised in the mountains of Suabia, under the pretext of defending their cottages against the ravages of the French. All this could not check him. Fribourg was occupied in the twinkling of an eye. Some of the poor peasants were put to the sword, and the remainder were seen no more during the campaign. Saint-Cyr posted himself in such a manner as to leave it to be imagined that he meant to engage in the Vale of Hell. The reserve defiled on the same day across the bridge of Bâle, without meeting any obstacle, and carried one division, that of Richemont, toward Schliengen and Kandern, in order to unite with the corps of Saint-Cyr, who proposed to ascend the Rhine within two days.

¹ See Mem. of Maréchal Saint-Cyr—Campaign of 1800.

² Maréchal Saint-Cyr, in his Mémoires, appears to be in error on this score. The First Consul had adopted this plan entire. This fact is established by a letter of General Dessolles, contained in the Memorial of the War, and the MS. correspondence.—Author

During the whole day of the 26th of April—6th of Floreal—Sainte-Suzanne rested in position before Strasburg, and Saint-Cyr before Brisach. The reserve, which had defiled from Bâle, was deployed completely, waiting the movement of the two corps intended to ascend the Rhine thus far. Moreau left Strasburg himself, to withdraw to his head-quarters, which was in the midst of the reserve.

The day of the 27th was still employed in deceiving the enemy as to the direction of our columns. The Austrians were led to believe in a decided movement by the Kinzig and the Vale of Hell. These two passes are in fact the most direct road for an army from the Rhine desirous of reaching the Danube; for they open at some distance one from the other, run in the same direction, and unite at last between Donaun-Eschingen, and Hufingen, not far from Schaffhausen, the point on which lay the corps of General Lecourbe. It was natural to suppose that two strong columns of 20 and 25,000 men each, presenting themselves at the mouth of these defiles, were really about to engage themselves therein, in order so to join Lecourbe. In order to guard them the better, M. de Kray detached from Villingen twelve squadrons, and nine battalions, and sent them to reinforce General Kienmayer. He was obliged to weaken Stockach, in order to replace at Villingen the troops which he had detached thence.

But during the night of the 27th, and in the day of the 28th, while M. de Kray was falling into the trap, the direction of the French columns was suddenly changed. Sainte-Suzanne fell back upon Strasburg, repassed the Rhine with his whole corps, and ascended the left bank, in order that he should not be forced to make, on the enemy's ground, too long a flank movement. Arrived at New Brisach, he again crossed to the right bank, and replaced Saint-Cyr before Fribourg, as if he were about to penetrate the Vale of Hell. Saint-Cyr, for his part, wheeling to the right, but still on the German side of the river, coasted the Rhine with his artillery, his cavalry, and his baggage; and while his heavy trains thus followed the low grounds, a great part of his infantry marched on the flank of the mountains by Saint Hubert, Neuhoft, Todnan, and Saint Blaise. Moreau, by this disposition, wished to avoid blocking up the banks of the Rhine, to reconnoitre the heights of the Black Forest filled with Austrian detachments, and to pass, nearer to their sources, the streams which rising in those mountains fall down into the Rhine through the territory of the forest cities. Those rivers are the Wiesen, the Alb, and the Westach. Unfortunately the existence of roads, which were not, had been taken for granted; Saint-Cyr was obliged to traverse a frightful country, always close to the enemy, and without artillery. Nevertheless he was not very much retarded, nor was he prevented from reaching Saint Blaise on the Alb, on the appointed day.

At the same time Moreau ascended the Rhine with the reserve, remaining, as Saint-Cyr did, on the German side. Richemont, who directed the vanguard, after having seen the artillery and cavalry of Saint-Cyr defile past, which, as we have seen, followed the banks of the Rhine, set himself in motion for Saint Blaise, in order to connect himself in the mountains with the infantry of the same corps. Generals Delmas and Leclerc, who commanded the other two divisions of the reserve, were directed upon Soeckingen, and then upon the Alb, in front of the bridge of Albruck. This bridge was covered by retrenchments. The Adjutant-general Cohorn, marching at the head of a battalion of the 14th light infantry, of two battalions of the 50th and of the 4th hussars, advanced in column on the retrenchments, and carried them. He then jumped on the shoulders of a grenadier and passed the Alb in that manner, giving the enemy no time to break the bridge. He took cannon and prisoners.

On the 29th of April—9th Floreal—the centre under Saint-Cyr, and the reserve under Moreau were in line on the Alb, from the Abbey of Saint Blaise, to the meeting of the Alb with the Rhine. Sainte-Suzanne had arrived at New Brisach, on the left bank; on our extreme right, Lecourbe assembled his corps, between Diesenhofen and Schaffhausen, ready to execute his passage, when Saint-Cyr and Moreau should have ascended the Rhine so far. The 30th of April, Sainte-Suzanne passed the Rhine, and showed himself at the entrance of the Vale of Hell. Saint-Cyr remained in the vicinity of Saint Blaise, Moreau advanced upon the Wutach. To conclude, on the 1st of May—11th of Floreal—the army made its last step, and that the most decisive—and did it with good fortune. M. de Kray had begun to discover his error, and to recall to himself the troops which had been involved too far in the defiles of the Black Forest. Sainte-Suzanne, destined to pass the Vale of Hell, which opens on the very positions which the French army would occupy, when its movements should all be completed, found the troops of Kienmayer in full retreat, and followed them step by step. Saint-Cyr now ceased coasting along the corps of the Archduke Ferdinand, and drove him from Bettmaringen to Stühlingen, upon the Wutach, where he arrived in the evening. The troops of Moreau passed the Wutach, without encountering much resistance, re-established the bridge, to do which a few beams only were required, and endeavoured to connect themselves with Schaffhausen, on the right, where Lecourbe lay, and on their left, with Stühlingen, where lay Saint-Cyr. It was this moment that Lecourbe posted night to Schaffhausen, should choose to cross the Rhine. On the morning of the first of May, thirty-four pieces of artillery were placed on the left bank of the river, to sweep, with their fire, the vicinity of the village of Reichlingen. Twenty-five boats conveyed General Molitor to the right bank, with two battalions, in order to cover the construction of a bridge, prepared long before, in the Aar. In an hour and a half, that bridge was thrown across the river. General Vandamme passed over it with a large portion of the troops of Lecourbe's corps, and occupied in an instant the routes leading to Engen and Stockach, important points in the enemy's line. He took the little town of Steia, and the fort of Hohentwiel, reputed to be impregnable, and very well supplied, as well with provisions as with artillery. Gonla's brigade, passing at the same time toward Paradis, met with a sharp resistance in the village of Busingen, which it soon conquered. To conclude, Lorges' division entered Schaffhausen that evening, and made good its junction with the troops of Moreau.

Thus, on the evening of the first of May, the whole army found itself safely across the Rhine. The three principal corps, those of Saint-Cyr, Moreau, Lecourbe, forming a mass of 75,000 to 80,000 men, occupied a line, which ran through Bondorf, Stühlingen, Schaffhausen, Radolfzell, to the point of the Lake of Constance. They were ready to march upon Engen and Stockach, threatening, at once, the line of the enemy's retreat and his magazines. Sainte-Suzanne, with the left, 20,000 strong, was following the Austrians through the Vale of Hell, waiting to defile upon the upper Danube, and unite himself to the main body of the French army, until it should have opened the passes by its advance.

This movement, then, was performed in six days in the happiest manner imaginable. Moreau presenting three heads of columns at the three bridges of Strasburg, Brisach, Bâle, had attracted the enemy to those three passes; then withdrawing himself suddenly, and marching on his right along the Rhine, two of his corps on the German and one on the French side, had ascended as high as Schaffhausen, where he had covered the passage of Lecourbe. The different corps had made 1500 prisoners, taken 6 field-pieces with their material, 40 wall-pieces in the fort of Hohentwiel, and some magazines. The troops had displayed everywhere a steadiness and resolution which could only be expected from old levies full of confidence in themselves and their leaders.

All criticisms on this plan, of course, fall to the ground before its success. It is impossible that movements so complicated should have succeeded more happily; that the enemy should have fallen into the trap more credulously, or the chiefs of the corps acted in unison with greater exactitude. Nevertheless, this plan of the prudent Moreau offered at least as many dangers as that of the First Consul, which had been rejected as too rash. For Saint-Cyr and Moreau had each lent their flank, in a march along the Rhine, several successive days. Saint-Cyr had been at one time separated from his artillery, and now Sainte-Suzanne was marching alone up the Vale of Hell.

If Marshal de Kray, by a sudden inspiration, had thrown himself upon Saint-Cyr, Moreau, or Sainte-Suzanne, he might well have chanced to crush any one of those detached corps, which might have compelled a retrograde movement of the whole French army. But Moreau had two advantages with him. First, he took the offensive, which always disconcerts an enemy; and, secondly, he had excellent troops, which were capable of repairing any unforeseen accident that might occur by their own steadiness, and which did, in fact, repair more than one error of their general-in-chief by their vigour in action.

The moment was now about to arrive, when the two armies, having manœuvred the one to force, the other to defend, the passage of the Rhine, were at length about to meet beyond that river. On the 2d of May—12th of Floreal—Moreau made ready for this encounter; but not supposing it to be so near at hand, he did not take measures toward concentration so promptly or completely as he should have done. He thought of sending Lecourbe forward with his 25,000 men upon Stockach, where lay at once the Austrian rear-guard, their magazines, and their communications with Vorarlberg and the Prince of Reuss. This was the rigorous execution of the plan arranged with the First Consul. For M. de Kray, cut off from Stockach, was detached from Lake Constance, and, of consequence, from the Alps. Moreau then ordered Lecourbe to march on the 3d of May—the 13th of Floreal—in the morning, to take Stockach from the Prince of Lorraine Vaudemont, who, with 12,000 men, guarded that important post. As for Moreau, he marched in person, with his whole reserve, on Engen, keeping his eye upon Lecourbe, and ready to come to his assistance, should that become necessary. He enjoined it upon Saint-Cyr to keep himself in advance, holding an elongated position, from Bettmaringen and Bondorf to Engen, in such a manner as to connect himself with him at one side, and at the other with Sainte-Suzanne, who ought now shortly to make his appearance from the Vale of Hell.

Moreau marched thus in line of battle, having his back to the Rhine, his right to Lake Constance, his left to the passes of the Black Forest, presenting a front of fifteen leagues, exactly parallel to the line of retreat which the Austrians must adopt, should they retire from Donau-Eschingen to Stockach, whither many interests called them. It was a very extended position, especially so near to the enemy, and one which, before an active and resolute adversary, would have exposed the French army to grave consequences. Happily for us, the army of M. de Kray was yet less concentrated than that of Moreau. M. de Kray's position was more favourable than ours to a rapid concentration, since it occupied front Constance to Strasburg the base of a triangle, the two sides of which we held. But, surprised on this day by our movement, having already on his left flank the French, combined to three-fourths of their force, and all transported across the river, he was in a dangerous position. He had given hurried orders to the detachments of the Austrian army, which were near the Rhine, to fall back by the Black Forest on the upper Danube; but a prompt and well-concerted resolution alone could recover him from his peril. In order to grasp this situation fully, it will be necessary to cast a rapid glance over the theatre of these complicated operations.

That mountainous and wooded country, which is called the Black Forest, around which the Rhine winds without penetrating it, and from which it increases its distance as it flows to the northward; that country, I say, produces, from a trifling spring-head, a very modest stream in its early origin, which is, however, destined to become one of the greatest rivers in the world, the Danube. It sheds this stream to the eastward, whither is its course, with a slight inclination always to the north, which is forced upon it by the extension of the Alpine spurs, at the base of which it runs so far as to Vienna. It receives, in its course, all the waters which descend from this long chain of mountains, which causes its sudden greatness, so different from its trivial origin.

The Austrian generals who defend the valley of the Danube against the French, have two plans from which to choose. They may—when the French have succeeded in penetrating the valley of the Danube, the ordinary road into their country—operate along the foot of the Alps, covering their left with the base of those mountains; and their right with the Danube, and defending in succession all the rivers which fall into that river. Such are the Iller, the Lech, the Isar, and the Inn. Or they may quit the Alps entirely, bestride the Danube, defend its course, stopping on all the great positions which it presents, as those of Ulm, of Ratisbon, &c., ready either to cover themselves by its bed, growing continually wider, or to hurl themselves, in mass, on the imprudent adversary who chanced to make a false step. This latter method has been the most generally preferred by them.

Marshal de Kray might adopt either of these methods; he might support himself upon the Alps, or manœuvre on the Danube. By leaning to the Alps, he countered the First Consul's plan, though without knowing it; since he, in order to descend from those high mountains in safety, on the rear of Baron de Melas, would have desired to have the imperial army aloof from Switzerland or the Tyrol. But in doing this, he sacrificed the right wing of his army, involved far in advance upon the Rhine without a possibility of knowing what had become of it. In adopting, on the other hand, the plan of manœuvring on the Danube, he certainly rallied his right wing, but separated himself from his left wing, commanded by the Prince of Reuss, though without sacrificing it; since, in the Tyrol, it would have both a secure retreat and a profitable employment of its force. In truth, he favoured, though unconsciously, the plan of the First Consul; for he quitted the line of the Alps. But this error was of no great importance, for even had he adhered to it, it is little probable that he would have thought of throwing himself into Lombardy to the assistance of the Baron de Melas.

The plan, therefore, which offered the fewest inconveniences, which suited best with the ordinary route of the imperial armies, was to concentrate upon the upper Danube. But, in order to succeed here, it was necessary to act both promptly and with great decision. Unfortunately for himself, Monsieur de Kray had immense magazines at Stockach, near the Lake of Constance, with a strong rear-guard of 12,000 men under the orders of the Prince of Lorraine Vaudemont. It was necessary for him, then, to recall his rear-guard instantly from Stockach to the upper Danube, and to move thither himself, sacrificing his magazines, which, at all events, it would have been impossible for him to remove. This he did not. But with the intention of manœuvring at a later period on the Danube, he sent M. de Nauendorff with the centre of the Austrian army to Engen, in order to succour Stockach. He ordered Prince Ferdinand, who was in the Black Forest, to move upon the same point; and directed his right under Messrs. Sztarray and De Kienmayer to quit the Rhine, and rejoin him with all speed.

It is a serious disadvantage attached to those vast magazines of provisions, in use among the Germans, that they render armies subordinate to them. The French, subsisted without magazines, spread themselves over the country nightly, in order to collect provisions, and that without any serious deterioration of discipline. They are active, industrious, and know well the art of being at once marauders, and present under their colours. The German troops are rarely exposed to such trials without disbanding and becoming disorganized. There is, however, one advantage in the possession of magazines, that of pressing with less severity on the country which is occupied, and in irritating its inhabitants less against the invading army.

Moreau, marching with his right on Stockach, with his reserve on Engen, while the corps of Saint-Cyr was extended to connect him with Sainte-Suzanne, was on the point, then, of coming in contact with the rear-guard of M. de Kray at Stockach, and with his centre at Engen, and of passing along the line of Prince Ferdinand's troops, now on the march to join the main body of the Austrian army. An unexpected battle must necessarily be the result of this contact, as will often occur in war, when events are not guided by those superior spirits, which are capable both of foreseeing and controlling them.

Early in the morning, Lecourbe marched straight upon Stockach, throwing out Lorges' division to his left, to communicate with Moreau, and pushing directly before him on the high road from Schaffhausen to Stockach, the division of Montrichard, with Nansouty's reserve of horse, and having, to conclude the whole, Vandamme's division on his right, between Stockach and the Lake of Constance. The latter division was divided into two brigades. One of these, under General Leval, manœuvring so as to cut Stockach from the Lake of Constance, by Bodmann and Sernadingen, encountered no obstacle; for the Prince of Reuss, who might have shown himself there, took little pains to keep up his communication with his general-in-chief. The other, under General Molitor, directed by Vandamme in person, marched upon the rear of Stockach by a by-road, while Nansouty and Montrichard marched thither by the great road of Schaffhausen. In the thickest of the woods some infantry was discovered, falling back; some cavalry also, reconnoitering the country, but falling back likewise. At last the positions were discovered, which the Austrians proposed to defend. Montrichard found these in order of battle behind the village of Steusslingen, covered by a heavy force of cavalry. The French infantry traversed the village in two columns, threatening both flanks of the enemy. At the same instant, the cavalry of Montrichard's division, supported by Nansouty's whole reserve, filed through Steusslingen, charged home, and threw the Imperialists into great disorder, retreating upon Neuzingen. This was the second position, and the principal one of those which form the defence of Stockach. It rested upon that of Wahlwyes, which at the same moment Vandamme was threatening with Molitor's brigade. A numerous infantry was now discovered, blocking the end of the village of Neuzingen, their flanks resting on woods to the right and left, and covered by cannon. A great effort was necessary in order to dislodge them. Montrichard turned them, by a height called the Hellemburg, while Vandamme having burst through Wahlwyes, was deploying on the rear of Neuzingen. The position was carried, and Lecourbe's whole corps poured down in one united mass upon Stockach and carried it. The Austrians would have made head once again beyond Stockach to check us—they offered 4000 infantry in battle array, covered by all their cavalry. Nansouty's regiments charged their cavalry, and drove it in disorder upon the infantry, which now only thought of yielding. Lecourbe made 4000 prisoners, carried off eight guns, 500 horses, and the immense magazines of Stockach. It could not have befallen otherwise. For Lecourbe, with troops capable of fighting against numbers greatly superior to his own, had also twice as many people as the Prince of Lorraine, although he had detached Lorges' division to make good his communication with Moreau. This task was accomplished early; and, if as vigorous a direction had prevailed in the general conduct of operations, he both could, and should, have been employed otherwise; as will now be made to appear.

The division of Lorges, destined to serve as a connecting link between Lecourbe and Moreau, was divided into two brigades. Goulu's brigade had marched on Aach to reconnoitre the country between Stockach and Engen, had found no one to fight with, and sat down at Stockach, where it became useless. General Lorges, with the rest of his division, having joined Moreau's troops, accompanied them toward Engen.

Moreau, with all that which was called the reserve, had marched on Engen, early in the morning. M. de Kray, at the same instant, was passing through this town on his way to defend his magazines at Stockach.

From the number of troops which were deploying before him, he soon perceived that there was about to be a battle and not a mere reconnoissance. He stopped short to give battle, trusting to the 40,000 men, whom he had in hand, and to the strength of the positions upon which chance had thrown him. On quitting the banks of the Rhine near Schaffhausen, on the route for the Danube, in that confused and dislocated country, the declivities of which fall hither and thither at random there is a little valley, that of the Aach, which carries off to the Lake of Constance those waters which flow neither to the Rhine nor to the Danube. In that valley stands the borough of Engen. It is necessary, in order to make a descent upon Engen, to cross several successive ranges of wooded heights very difficult of access. These heights the Austrians had occupied with their infantry. They had their cavalry below in the plain of Engen. It was necessary, then, for Moreau to carry the heights first of all, and then to descend into the plain, there to overthrow the imperial cavalry. He marched himself at the head of Delmas and Bastoul's divisions, and of half that of Lorges. He had directed on this left, by the route called that of Blumenfeld, the division of Richepanse. This division, passing through a succession of small valleys, was intended to turn the enemy by approaches less strongly defended, and all united were destined, if successful, to pour down in concentrated masses upon Engen.

Lorges, who had outmarched the troops of the reserve a little, found a considerable body of the enemy near Waterdingen, and, before attacking, waited for the division of Delmas, which soon arrived. They then all charged together, and dislodged the Austrians. Having gained this point, they had the heights to ascend which surround Engen; and to attain this, it was necessary to scale some steep and difficult highlands, commanded on the right by a position called the Maulberg, and on the left by a very lofty peak, known by the name of the Peak of Hohenhewen. Lorges was commanded to attack the Maulberg. After a slight cannonade he advanced. The enemy retired; Delmas then turning to the left, directed his division on a wood which surrounded the Peak of Hohenhewen, and which was held by eight battalions of the enemy. Two battalions of the 46th advanced upon the wood without firing, while General Grandjean and the Adjutant-general Cohorn turned it, with another detachment. The two battalions of the 46th, the moment they received the enemy's fire, rushed upon them with fixed bayonets. The eight battalions of the Austrians seeing themselves so daringly attacked in front, and being turned on the right, abandoned the wood. Our troops having carried the principal positions which defend the approaches to the valley of Engen, had now only to descend into that valley, which was traversed by a wide brook. The enemy had retired to the Peak of Hohenhewen; they had placed their infantry and artillery on the slopes, and had drawn up 12,000 cavalry in order of battle on the plain of Engen. Moreau determined first of all to carry the Peak of Hohenhewen, and ordered the division of Delmas instantly to attack it. The division of Delmas, on issuing from the wood of which it had taken possession, was exposed to a murderous fire, but sustained it bravely. General Jocopin putting himself at the head of the infantry, forced his way up the acclivities of the peak, and received a shot in the thigh. But General Grandjean turned the position; the Adjutant-general Cohorn, whom we have seen passing the Alb upon the shoulders of a grenadier, dashed on to the summit with a battalion, and dislodged the Austrians. Our troops were then in possession of all the heights which commanded the plain of Engen, and could deploy on them without difficulty. The enemy retired on the other side of this plain, beyond the rivulet which crossed it, and to the foot of a chain of heights which form the opposite bank. He had drawn out in front his numerous cavalry with the greatest part of his artillery; and in the rear, in the hollows of a dell, at the entrance of which was the little village of Ehingen, a strong reserve of grenadiers. Such was the mass of force it was yet necessary to overthrow, in order to terminate the battle to our advantage. During this time a very heavy firing was heard on the other side of the peak of Hohenhewen and far beyond it, along the range of wooded heights which surround Engen. It was the division of Richepanse, engaged with the troops with which M. de Kray had crowned this part of the field of battle.

General Richepanse had been obliged to break his division into two brigades, for the purpose of seizing two positions, one called that of Leipferdingen, the other that of Waterdingen, in the very bottom of the valleys in which he had been engaged. The combat which he maintained there was obstinate, and full of chances; when fortunately for him, the advance of Saint-Cyr's corps began to appear. These troops came up very late, in consequence of an error in Moreau's arrangements. Saint-Cyr ought to have assisted Sainte-Suzanne, with one of his divisions. He had been obliged to wait for Ney, who was delayed by want of provisions; and also to wait for his artillery, which had always been in the rear since the passage of the Rhine. He had, moreover, found Prince Ferdinand constantly following on his steps; and having but one division to oppose to his three, he felt himself obliged to march with great care and precaution. At length he came up to the succour of Richepanse, at the moment when M. de Kray was trying the experiment of a last and vigorous attack to prevent him from passing clear on to Engen. Moreau, judging from the weight of fire, that Richepanse was in danger, determined to draw the Austrians to their right, and for that purpose thought proper to attack the village of Ehingen, which formed the support of their position on the other side of the plain. We have seen that the enemy had posted there, at the foot of a chain of heights, his cavalry, and artillery, and a strong reserve of grenadiers in a valley of which the village of Ehingen formed the entrance. General Bontemps advanced on it with the 67th demi-brigade, two battalions of the 10th light infantry, and two squadrons of the 5th hussars. General Hauptpoul followed him with the reserve of cavalry. These troops marching in columns in the plain, under the fire of a battery of twelve pieces of cannon, advanced stoutly to the village of Ehingen, and carried it. But suddenly the eight battalions of grenadiers in the reserve thundered down upon them. The Austrian cavalry supported the eight battalions of grenadiers, by a vigorous charge, and under this unexpected tempest our soldiers were obliged to give up the village. The cavalry of General Hauptpoul was driven back by the great mass of imperial cavalry. The brave General Bontemps received a severe wound in the midst of this confusion, and at this moment, the fire redoubled on our left beyond the peak of Hohenhewen, announcing the perilous position of Richepanse, who was still endeavouring, although as yet without success, to force the line of heights. Moreau, who in difficult moments had the firmness of a true soldier spirit, immediately became aware of his awful situation, and resolved to make a vigorous stroke, to remain master of the field of battle. He caused the remains of Bastoul's division to advance; took with him some companies of grenadiers, whom he had held in hand, animated them, hurried them to the front, overturning every thing he encountered, and carried our troops back victorious into Ehingen. While he fixed the fortune of the day at this point, Richepanse, on his part, was performing prodigies of valour. Saint-Cyr, now joined by Ney, definitively delivered from all apprehensions of the Archduke Ferdinand, sent forward the brigade of General Roussel to the front. It strove in rivalry of courage against the troops of Richepanse, who had been engaged so long, and aided them to conquer the heights so stubbornly contested. The action was decided at all points, in our favour, but at the price of much toil, and much bloodshed; the 4th demi-brigade lost alone, in these combats, between 500 and 600 men. Night was beginning now to fall, and the French redoubled their ardour, while the Austrians, hearing of the destruction of the Prince of Lorraine Vaudemont, at Stockach, began to be discouraged. M. de Kray, fearing to be turned at Stockach, ordered a retreat. He hastened to regain the Danube, by Tuttinger and Liptingen.

The loss of the French army in this series of bloody combats was very considerable. It had lost something above 2000 men of killed and wounded; but the loss of the Austrians amounted to 3000, besides from 4000 to 5000 prisoners, who remained in our hands. The French troops, by their unusual bravery, had made up for the errors committed by their General. His plan, indeed, was very faulty; and it is now easy to perceive its weak points. In the first place it is easy to judge by the results themselves what was the disadvantage of crossing the Rhine at several points. In consequence of this style of operations, there were but three corps ready to march together; and even the third of these, that of Saint-Cyr, was paralyzed by the necessity of maintaining a communication with the fourth, which had remained behind. The delay of Saint-Cyr's artillery, moreover, is to be attributed to the same system of passing the river at many points, and this last did not a little contribute to delay the succour given to Richepanse. As to the battle itself, Moreau, with 25,000 men, was forced to fight 40,000 at Engen, while Lecourbe, with 20,000, had only 12,000 to engage Stockach, and Saint-Cyr remained almost unengaged, or, at the most, was reduced to the part of a simple corps of observation. The latter, when accused of arriving too late, affirmed, that during the whole day, he had not received a single aide-de-camp from headquarters. Such things will never, or rarely, be seen on fields where the First Consul commanded. However, to act as Moreau acted, shows a general of no ordinary merit. Once in danger, he conducted himself with that coolness and vigour which never abandoned him; and, seconded by the valour of the troops, he, after all, obtained a victory, and acquired a decided superiority over the enemy.

He encamped his army on the field of battle. If, on the following day, he had pushed M. de Kray briskly on the Stockach road to the Danube, he would probably have thrown him into disorder. But Moreau had not sufficient ardour in his character, and was too careful of his troops, to execute those rapid movements, which, without doubt, fatigue men for the moment, but in reality economize their blood, their affection and strength, by precipitating results. The whole day of the 4th of May—14th of Floreal—was employed in rectifying the position of the army, and in marching slowly toward the Danube. Saint-Cyr marched on it by Tutlingen; Moreau and Lecourbe by Mæsskirch, looking out carefully to their right and toward the approaches of the Vorarlberg, whence the Prince de Reuss might attack them. M. de Kray was not yet resigned to give ground without fighting. His army was already much harassed, and weakened likewise by nearly 10,000 men, yet he had the folly to expose it voluntarily to another encounter with the French, before passing the Danube, and connecting himself with the forces under Generals Kienmayer and Sztaray, who were returning from the banks of the Rhine at the same time with the French corps of Sainte-Suzanne. The cover afforded by a great river, some days of respite, and reinforcements, were absolutely necessary, in order that the moral strength of the Austrian army should be restored. The position of Mæsskirch, on which Moreau had given him time to compose himself, inspired M. de Kray with the imprudent, but courageous resolution of fighting yet once more.

This position of Mæsskirch, is, in fact, very strong. The high road, which by Engen and Stockach runs to the Danube, passes, a little way before it reaches Mæsskirch, a range of extensive and elevated table-land, which is called the plateau of Krumbach. This it leaves to the left, then dips into a country covered with wood, and there forms a long narrow defile. It passes out, thereafter, into an open country, at the lower end of which is seen the small town of Mæsskirch a little on the right, and the village of Heudorf on the left. Behind Mæsskirch extends a line of heights stretching continuously from Mæsskirch to Heudorf, then from Heudorf sweeping backward to the left, and joining the plateau of Krumbach. So that the road passing, in the first place, under the plateau of Krumbach, and then plunging into a wood, enters at length an open country commanded by the fire of the heights, which extend from Mæsskirch to Heudorf. M. de Kray had crowned this position with formidable artillery. The Prince of Lorraine, forming the left of the Austrians, occupied Mæsskirch, and the surrounding heights. M. de Nauendorf, forming their centre, was deployed above Heudorf, having a reserve of grenadiers in his rear. M. de Wrede with the Bavarians, the Archduke Ferdinand and General Giulay united, composed the right of the imperial army on the plateau of Krumbach.

Moreau had no more expectation of an action at Mæsskirch than he had at Engen. Suspecting, however, that he might meet with some resistance there, he had apprized Lecourbe of it, and had sent him word that an effort might perhaps become necessary on that point; without, however, giving him such precise orders for concentrating his force as the imminence of a great battle demands. Lecourbe, being in advance of the army, and marching in three divisions, had thrown Vandamme's division a little distance on his right, to the end always of observing the movements of the Prince de Reuss, toward the Vorarlberg. Part of this division, under General Molitor, was under orders to advance by the road to Pullendorf and Klosterwald, on the flank of Mæsskirch. Lecourbe with the divisions of Montrichard, and Lorges, with the reserve of cavalry, were destined to advance by the high road, which has been already described, and which, after passing the plateau of Krumbach, comes out through the woods in front of Mæsskirch. Moreau followed the same road, keeping himself some distance in the rear. Saint-Cyr covered Moreau's left, at a great distance, astride of the Danube, toward Tutlingen. These, certainly, were not the dispositions for a great battle. Vandamme should not have been thrown alone, with but half a division, on the flank of the position of Mæsskirch. Lecourbe, with all his corps, should have been directed on this point. Moreau should not have set out so late, or crowded himself on the same road with Lecourbe, and that too, in the defiles of a wood; and, to conclude, Saint-Cyr should not have been left at such a distance.

Be this as it may, Lecourbe put himself in motion early in the morning, conformably to the plan adopted. Having arrived at the height of Krumbach, he left that plateau to his left, and entangled himself in the defiles of the wood. Some advanced posts which were encountered in this long defile were promptly driven in, and the mouth of the pass was attained. There was perceived the open country, at the lower end of which stands Mæsskirch, commanded on all sides by heights crowned with the Austrian artillery. At the very moment in which the heads of the columns appeared, five pieces of artillery firing, full in their front, from Mæsskirch; and twenty others from the flank of Heudorf, vomited forth a storm of round and grape. Two battalions of light infantry were placed on the edge of the wood; and three regiments of cavalry, the 9th hussars, 12th chasseurs, and the 11th dragoons, were pushed forward rapidly to protect the placing of our artillery in position. Under the fire of these twenty-five pieces, which in every sense of the word thundered down destruction on them, our squadrons were forced to retire. Fifteen pieces of cannon, which General Montrichard destined to answer the Austrian artillery, were, more or less, dismounted. The light infantry itself was obliged to seek shelter in the wood. The Austrian cavalry advanced to charge us in its turn, but was smartly repulsed. As often, however, as General Montrichard attempted to advance beyond the wood, a murderous fire arrested his columns. It soon became evident, that this was not the true point of attack for carrying Mæsskirch; but on the contrary that it was by the right, following the lateral road of Klosterwald, over which Vandamme was advancing. But he was not as yet near arriving, in consequence of the distance he had to march. Lecourbe, in the mean time, decided on making an attempt on Heudorf, filing by the left along the border of the woods. The 10th light infantry, in spite of a violent fire of artillery and musketry, entered the village of Heudorf; but was repulsed by superior forces; and while the cavalry was hurried up to its support, the Austrian artillery, placed upon the steep height behind Heudorf, compelled it to make a retrograde movement. This second attempt to open out by the left, was not therefore more successful than that which had been attempted of advancing directly on Mæsskirch.

Encouraged by this check, the Austrians now resolved to assume the offensive, and attempted to débouch from the village of Heudorf, full in the face of Lorges' division. But this was too much to attempt against such hardy troops. The 38th was formed in column, and rushed to the front; eight pieces of artillery covered it with their grape; with admirable coolness it pressed on, and penetrated Heudorf, with levelled bayonets. The steep banks which arise behind the village were covered with wood, and the wood was filled with dense masses of Austrian infantry. Superior forces rushed upon this brave demi-brigade, it was crushed by their numbers, and gave way. But the 67th came to its support, and it rallied instantly. They both charged together and the whole division now dashed forward, overflowed the village, scaled the tremendous heights, and carried off the wooded holds from which the enemy poured on us the most devastating fire. While this terrible combat was in progress on our left, about the village of Heudorf, Vandamme at length opened his attack on our right, upon Mæsskirch, at the head of Molitor's brigade. His disposition for the attack was very skilful, in spite of the Austrian infantry, which kept up a murderous fire from the suburbs of Mæsskirch. This gallant body charged fiercely into Mæsskirch, while two battalions turned the position, by the heights. Montrichard still shut up in the wood, profited by this moment to march out into the open country, which had at first been so fatal to us. He fell on in four columns, full in front of the Austrian artillery, already somewhat shaken by these simultaneous attacks. The four columns of Montrichard pressed on, crossed a ravine which runs along the foot of the hills, and scaled the height of Mæsskirch, at the moment when Vandamme's troops, having carried Mæsskirch, began to file out of it. The Austrians were routed at all points. Their reserve, placed a little in rear of Rohrdorf, endeavoured thereupon to act in its turn, but was held in check by the united divisions of Vandamme and Montrichard. At this time, we were masters of all the line from Mæsskirch to Heudorf. But M. de Kray, desiring with great accuracy, and a rapid eye, the vulnerable part of our position, drew off a part of his forces unobserved, and carried them to our left, to the plateau of Krumbach, whence he menaced our flanks and rear. Lorges' division, which occupied Heudorf, ran much risk of being overwhelmed. The reserve of Austrian grenadiers threw themselves in one mass on this unfortunate division, which, after having taken and retaken Heudorf several times, was exhausted with fatigue. It was now borne down and crushed at the same time by the fire of the artillery, and the masses of the Austrian infantry. Happily Moreau, apprized of what was in progress, by the violence of the cannonade, had hastened his march. At length he appeared at the entrance of the wood with his corps, composed of the divisions of Delmas, Bastoul and Richepanse. With all speed he sent Delmas's division to the left upon Heudorf, to the support of Lorges. That stout body changed the aspect of affairs in a moment, overthrew the Austrian grenadiers, and retook Heudorf, with all the woods above it. But if we received reinforcement, so did M. de Kray. His right, composed of the Archduke Ferdinand, and General Giulay—whom Saint-Cyr had followed pace by pace from the very commencement of hostilities, though at by far too great a distance—was led rapidly into the field of battle and directed between Heudorf and Krumbach, on the flank of Delmas's division, which was in some danger of being surrounded. The 57th, which in Italy had justly earned the name of "The Terrible," forming in order of battle, sustained the onset of the Austrians for more than an hour, ravaged all the time by sixteen pieces of artillery, to which General Delmas could oppose but five—and even these were soon dismounted. This valiant band remained unshaken by that dreadful fire, and even arrested the progress of the enemy. Moreau, hurrying from one corps to another, to set them in position or support them, brought up Bastoul's division to sustain that of Delmas. He came up at the very moment when the Austrians unable to break the division of Delmas, were endeavouring to deprive it of the succour of Bastoul's division, by deploying on the plateau of Krumbach, so as to intercept our communications. Already they were beginning to pour down from the plateau upon the road, and breaking in upon the columns of our baggage train. Thus the battle, commencing at Mæsskirch, had extended unto Heudorf, and from Heudorf to Krumbach, embracing the whole angle of that vast position, covering it with fire and blood and carnage. Under these critical circumstances, Bastoul's division worthily supported the efforts of that of Delmas; but it was on the point of being surrounded, should the enemy succeed in descending from the plateau of Krumbach, and taking possession of the high road by which our troops were coming up. Happily the division of Richepanse, led to the critical point at the critical moment, was formed in columns of attack, scaled the plateau of Krumbach under a plunging fire, and out-flanked the archduke, who was striving to out-flank us. After this effort, M. de Kray had no reserve in hand to act against Richepanse, and was obliged to give the signal for retreat. From Krumbach to Heudorf, from Heudorf to Mæsskirch, we were victorious at all points.

At this juncture the corps of Saint-Cyr was but a few leagues distant, at Neuhausen-ob-Eke. Had he come into action, the Austrian army must have been routed; and, instead of gaining an ordinary victory, we should have inflicted on it one of those crushing defeats which terminate a campaign. What fatality was it then that held him inactive, so near the spot on which his presence might have decided the fate of the whole war? This it is difficult to explain. Saint-Cyr asserted on the following day that no orders had been sent to him. Moreau, on the contrary, affirmed that they had been sent, and by several aides-de-camp. Saint-Cyr replied that he was so near at hand, that if a single officer had been sent he must infallibly have reached him. The clique about Moreau insisted that Saint-Cyr, a faithless brother-in-arms, wished to allow his neighbours to be cut up at Mæsskirch, as he had done before at Engen.

Thus, in military as in civil life, men are jealous, utter false accusations, and descend to calumny! Human passions are the same everywhere; nor is war certainly the thing to cool, to moderate, or to render them just. This much is clearly true, that Saint-Cyr, disgusted with the coterie which prevailed with Moreau, affected to shut himself up and limit himself to the command of his own corps, at the head of which he operated with rare ability. But he never anticipated the commands of the general-in-chief, always waiting for orders; orders which it is a lieutenant's part to foresee, especially when within sound of cannon shot. Saint-Cyr, by alleging his own proximity, as a proof that orders, if sent, must have reached him, in fact condemned himself. For that very proximity rendered it inexcusable that he did not come up with one division at least, to the point where the tremendous cannonade announced a violent struggle, perhaps a serious danger. He was, however, destined soon to efface by striking services the wrong he had done himself here.

French and Austrians alike were exhausted at the end of this day's fighting. It is never possible to learn the exact number of killed and wounded, in the confusion of battles. The number at Mæsskirch must have been very great. Three thousand men must have fallen of the French army; and nearly twice that number of the Austrians. But the French army was full of confidence. It remained master of the field, and was ready on the following day to resume its part in that succession of combats, which, without hitherto gaining for it any decisive results, had nevertheless proved its decided superiority over the enemy. The Austrian army, on the contrary, much shaken, was incapable of long maintaining such a struggle. Every one can of course foresee, after the recital that has been made, the criticisms since raised on Moreau's plan of operations. He had marched into a field of battle without any previous reconnoissance to the front. He had directed too small a force on the true point of attack, which lay by the road from Klosterwald to Mæsskirch, opening on the flank of that little town; he had marched too late, entangled all his divisions, one after another, in a wood whence it was impossible to issue on the plain without a serious loss; and, to conclude the whole, he had not brought up Saint-Cyr, when his presence would have decided the whole. M. de Kray, on his side, after having ably directed his attack on our vulnerable point, the left did wrongly, in suffering Mæsskirch to be taken. But it must be admitted that his troops were far inferior to the French, both in intelligence and steadiness. Moreover, they were beginning to lose confidence; and it was not easy to induce them to bear the sight, much less the charge of the French.

On the following day, the 6th of May—16th of Floreal—M. de Kray hastened to throw himself behind the Danube, in order to establish himself on that grand line of operation. The true plan was now to push him as hard as possible, in order to render his passage of that river impossible, or at least highly difficult. Moreau, marching in line, with his left on the Danube, quite close to the point where the Austrians were crossing, had it in his power to crush them, if he had wheeled to his left. Saint-Cyr formed at this moment the wing resting on the Danube. Not having been engaged the day before, he was both ready and eager to act. He saw with his own eyes the imperial troops thronging down, not without a degree of haste, to the bridge of Sigmaringen. The Danube, which there makes a bend, presents a hollow arc, into which the Austrian army was accumulated in haste to cross over to the farther shore. Saint-Cyr saw it distinctly, within short cannon range, crowded into a space scarce sufficient wherein to manœuvre a division, and so much surprised by the appearance of the French that it suspended its passage before a single brigade of Ney's, put itself into battle order, and covered itself with the fire of sixty pieces of cannon. Saint-Cyr seeing it thus disconcerted and entangled, felt an absolute certainty that by a single charge of his whole corps he could drive it headlong into the Danube. He advanced a few guns, every shot of which swept away entire files, although they could not hope to remain in battery against M. de Kray's sixty pieces. He hoped by the noise of this cannonade to attract Moreau's attention, and to bring him from the reserve to the left. Seeing that he did not arrive, he sent an officer to inform him what was passing, and to ask for orders to attack. But all concert was lost. It was believed at head-quarters that Saint-Cyr was desirous of bearing to the left in order to separate himself yet farther from the army, and so to act alone. He was answered by an order to close up to the right and connect himself more nearly than heretofore with the reserve, which formed the centre of the army. "This measure," he was told, "is indispensable, in order that the general-in-chief may dispose of your corps at need." The character of this order clearly proved the temper of the general, and those about him. It was evident that Moreau had suffered himself to be absorbed by the command of a single corps; and that the indecision of his character was producing internal divisions, always fatal, but nowhere so fatal as in an army.

¹ See the Memoires of Saint-Cyr, p. 215, &c., t. v. Campaign of 1800.

M. de Kray was permitted then to escape without peril, and to rally his army beyond the Danube. M. de Kienmayer had just joined him with the troops coming up from the banks of the Rhine, and M. de Sztarray followed on his heels.

The army of Moreau had found at Stockach and at Donau-Eschingen vast magazines. Nothing was wanting to it. It was animated by successes, and by constantly taking the offensive. On the 7th and 8th of May—17th and 18th of Floreal—Moreau continued to march with his left on the Danube, still offering a line of battle by far too much extended, and making short halts, in order to give Sainte-Suzanne time to come up with him.

On the 9th—19th of Floreal—knowing that Sainte-Suzanne, coming up by the left bank of the Danube, had at last come abreast of the army, Moreau quitted his head-quarters of a day, and passed the Danube in order to inspect the troops recently arrived. These troops hereafter formed his left wing, while Saint-Cyr became the centre, the reserve playing the part of a reserve in reality, as in conformity with its title. According to all probabilities, M. de Kray, engaged in resting his exhausted army, would remain beyond the Danube, and we should be able to make one march forward on the 9th without encountering an enemy. Moreau directed the right, that is to say Lecourbe, to move forward on the 9th between Wurzach and Ochsenhausen; the reserve to move on Ochsenhausen itself; and the centre, that is to say, Saint-Cyr, to advance beyond Biberach, with his left in observation on the Danube. The army was thus advancing to the Iller, describing a line parallel to that tributary of the Danube. Moreau set forth at nine in the morning, believing that he might give up the whole day to the corps of Sainte-Suzanne.

But M. de Kray had been led to adopt a plan, as novel as it was unexpected, by the advice of a council of war, which had judged it necessary to save the immense magazines of Biberach, so that they should not fall into the hands of the French, like those of Stockach and Engen. He therefore passed over his whole army a second time to the right bank of the Danube, by Riedlingen, and took post in front and in the rear of Biberach. This ground had once already been the theatre of a battle won by Moreau, in 1776, thanks principally to Saint-Cyr. This theatre was again fortunate to the army, and this time to Saint-Cyr himself.

Biberach is situated in the valley of Riess, liable to inundation. This valley is so marshy that a man on horseback cannot enter it without peril, and that it is necessary to pass through Biberach itself, and over the bridge which leads into the little town. The entrance to this vale lies through a sort of pass piercing a range of heights, those of Galgenberg on one side, and those of Mittelibierach on the other. This defile passed, Biberach is in sight at once. The marsh of the Riess is crossed by the bridge leading from the town, and beyond the marsh there is a splendid position called that of the Mittenberg, on which an army well provided with artillery can take up a strong post. M. de Kray had no idea of taking up a position in front of the defile, with so narrow an outlet for retreat. He could only place himself to advantage behind Biberach on the Mittenberg itself. But he could not leave Biberach undefended. Consequently, after establishing the bulk of his army on the position of the Mittenberg, he placed a corps of eight or ten battalions and a dozen squadrons, in advance of the defile of Mittelibierach, in order to give himself time to remove or destroy the greater part of the magazines.

This was a hazardous scheme, particularly with a demoralized army. Saint-Cyr being under orders to march beyond Biberach, before halting for the night, early discovered the position which the Austrians had taken. He was much grieved that the general-in-chief was not with him, to issue suitable orders, and to make the most of this rencontre. But Moreau was absent. General Dessolles was not on the ground. If Saint-Cyr had been at the head of his whole force united, he would not have hesitated to attack with his corps alone; but unfortunately it was scattered. Being obliged to observe the Danube on his left, he had devoted his best division, Ney's, to that service. He sent several officers in search of Ney, but it was no easy task to find and bring him up, entangled as he was among the windings of the river, and in frightfully bad roads. Saint-Cyr, then, to attack a mass of at least 60,000 men, had but the two divisions of Tharreau and Baraguay d'Hilliers, with the cavalry reserve of General Sahuc attached to his corps. The enemy's demoralization tempted him sore; but the disposition of his forces led him to hesitate, when suddenly the fire of General Richepanse made itself heard. He, under orders, to keep himself in communication with Saint-Cyr and to cross the Riess by the bridge of Biberach, had come up by a cross-road, that of Reichenbach, to the same point. Saint-Cyr now had ing the fine division of Richepanse at his command, in order to supply the gap left by Ney's absence in his lines, no longer hesitated. It was his opinion that, if the detachment left in advance of the defile in front of Biberach could be thrown into disorder, the defeat of that body of eight or ten thousand men would be something more serious than the defeat of a mere advanced guard, and that the morale of the enemy might be deeply shaken thereby. Not giving himself, therefore, even the time to dispose his troops in order of attack, he caused the eighteen battalions and twenty-four squadrons, whom he had in his own hand, to advance at double-quick time; and marched them against the ten thousand Austrians who blockaded the passage of the defile. Overthrown in an instant by this rude shock, the Austrians rushed down pell-mell into Biberach and the valley of the Riess. It would have been an easy thing to make prisoners of them all. But Saint-Cyr would not permit his soldiers to pursue them, fearing that, should he do so, he might not have the power of rallying his divisions quickly enough to complete his principal operation. He contented himself therefore with entering Biberach, establishing himself there, and so securing the safety of the magazines. After having occupied this point firmly, and so secured himself a retreat in any event, he passed the Riess. Richepanse had just arrived on his right by the road of Reichenbach. Reinforced by this fresh division, Saint-Cyr passed the Riess by the bridge of Biberach, and pressed on in person to reconnoitre the enemy's position. At this moment, the few thousand men, who had been driven so abruptly down to the Riess, were passing through the ranks of the Austrian army, which were opening to allow them to gain the rear. And by the whole aspect of the host, it was plain to see how much it was disconcerted. Saint-Cyr now sent out a certain number of skirmishers, who were directed to go and insult the enemy, unless other skirmishers should appear to push them back into the ravine. The opening fire of these detached soldiers drew forth a reply of general discharges, such as disheartened troops are wont to maintain, in order to keep up their spirits by their own noise. Saint-Cyr, when on his ground, was one of the ablest tacticians we have ever had among us. As soon as he discovered the temper and situation of the Austrian army, his part was taken on the moment.

He formed Tharreau's and Baraguay's divisions in two columns, and that of Richepanse in a third, and placed the cavalry in échelon upon the wings. When this arrangement was made, he moved all his columns at once. They mounted the slopes of the Mittenberg with unequalled resolution. The Austrians, at the sight of these soldiers scaling this formidable position with such coolness, from which an army of three times their own force was ready and able to hurl them into the swamps of the Riess below, were seized with astonishment and panic. M. de Kray ordered a retrograde movement, but his soldiers did not execute it as he could have wished. For after a few shots, they gave up the position of the Mittenberg, and at the same time fled in disorder, leaving several thousand prisoners to Saint-Cyr's corps, and immense magazines, which sufficed to feed the French army for a long time. Night put an end to the pursuit. During these transactions, Moreau arrived unexpectedly; and although a coolness existed between them, he bore on the following day, in presence of Carnot, the minister of war, most distinguished testimony of his satisfaction with Saint-Cyr. Moreau, at this moment, being disembarassed of those unworthy friends, by whom he was beset at head-quarters, had the candour to be just to a lieutenant, who had gained a victory without his presence, and without his orders.

The French army was completely victorious; the Austrians were incapable of checking its progress; and it had but to advance. M. de Kray had, it is impossible to conceive why, detached a body to defend the magazines at Memmingen. Memmingen was on Lecourbe's line of march. The place was occupied, the detachment crushed, and the magazines taken. This was on the 10th of May—20th Floreal. On the 11th and 12th, M. de Kray definitively retreated upon Ulm; and Moreau marched upon an extensive line nearly perpendicular to the Danube. On the 13th of May, he was beyond the Iller, without having met any serious resistance in the passage of that river. His right and reserve were at Ungerhausen, Kellnützt, Iller-Aicheim and Illertissen. Saint-Cyr was posted at the confluence of the Iller and the Danube, astride the Iller, occupying the bridge of Einterkirchberg, and connecting himself with Sainte-Suzanne, who was coming up by the left bank of the Danube. From the Abbey of Wiblingen, where Saint-Cyr had his head-quarters, the Austrians could be distinctly seen in their entrenched camp at Ulm. The two armies had just been joined by all their detached corps. Marshal de Kray had some days before ordered up M. de Kienmayer and Sztarray. Moreau, having Sainte-Suzanne's corps now in hand, found his own numbers complete. Both armies had experienced losses, but that of the Austrians was more considerable than ours. It was estimated at 30,000 men in killed, wounded, and prisoners. History in this case is reduced to conjecture; for on the day of battle a general usually underrates his losses; but when he wants succour or reinforcement from his government, generally exaggerates the number of killed, wounded, and sick. The exact amount of troops under arms is never well known. M. de Kray commenced the campaign with 110,000 or 115,000 men, for active operations, and 35,000 or 40,000 in the garrisons. The utmost he could now have was 80,000, and these exhausted with fatigue, and completely demoralized. The loss of the French army was estimated at 4000 killed, 6000 or 7000 wounded, some sick with fevers, and some prisoners; in all about 12,000 or 13,000 men unserviceable. This calculation reduced Moreau's army of active operation, at the time, to 90,000 soldiers or something under. But it was on the point of sending away a strong detachment, in conformity to the convention signed with General Berthier, at the opening of the campaign. It was stipulated in this agreement, that M. de Kray once driven eight or ten day's march beyond Constance, Lecourbe should countermarch on the Alps, so as to join the army of reserve. The perilous position of Massena rendered the execution of this agreement most urgent; and it was no contemptible desire of arresting Moreau in the midst of his success, that dictated the idea of re-demanding Lecourbe. It was the most legitimate of reasons, the saving Genoa and Liguria. The army of reserve collected with such difficulty, did not amount to 40,000 men capable of service; it still much needed reinforcement, in order to enable it to attempt the grand operation, it was about to try, beyond the Alps.

The First Consul, now impatient to operate on the side of Italy, earnestly desiring at the same time to give Moreau no offence, and yet to insure the execution of his orders, made choice of the minister of war himself, of Carnot, to carry formal and imperative orders to the head-quarters of the Rhine, for detaching Lecourbe towards Saint Gothard. The letters which accompanied this order were full of cordiality and irresistible in argument. The First Consul well knew it would not be Lecourbe, and 25,000 men, that would be sent him; but if they even sent him 15,000 or 16,000 men only, he would be perfectly satisfied. Moreau received Carnot with displeasure; nevertheless he faithfully executed the orders that were sent to him. Carnot, like a good citizen, dissipated the clouds which might have arisen in that weak and easily deceived mind, and contrived to renew in him that confidence toward the First Consul, which detestable busy-bodies were labouring to destroy. Some historians, who favour Moreau, but who favour him, even since 1615, have swelled the numbers of the detachment sent to the army of Germany to 25,000 men. Moreau himself, in answering the First Consul, estimated them not over 17,000; and this number was exaggerated. Not more than 15,000 or 16,000 soldiers marched into Switzerland in order to pass over the Saint Gothard. There now remained with Moreau about 72,000 combatants; and soon afterward 75,000, by the addition of convalescents from the hospitals, were actually present under arms. These were more than he wanted to fight 80,000 Austrians. In fact, M. de Kray had no more, and those entirely exhausted and incapable of resisting any serious attack of the French.

Moreau, fearing to detract from his army in the eyes of the enemy, still kept up the same number of divisions, and took the 16,000 men whom he destined for the First Consul, from all his different corps. Each of these corps furnished its contingent, and they kept secret, as best they could, this diminution of their force. Moreau wished to keep Lecourbe, who was himself worth a thousand men. Lecourbe was allowed to remain, and the command of the detachment devolved on the brave General

Lorges. Carnot immediately returned to Paris, after having seen the troops destined to pass the Saint Gothard on their march. This operation took place during the 11th, 12th, and 13th of May—21st, 22d, and 23d of Floreal.

The French army still possessed a force of 72,000 men, without reckoning the garrisons of towns, the division of Helvetia, and what they expected from the hospitals. Its effective force, however, was now the same as before the arrival of Sainte-Suzanne; a force which had sufficed to render it ever victorious. M. de Kray had established himself at Ulm, where, for a long time, an entrenched camp had been formed for the protection of the imperial troops. Of the two systems of defence, of which we have spoken, namely, that of retiring along the foot of the Alps, and profiting, in succession, by the cover of all the tributaries of the Danube; or that of holding both sides of the river, so as to operate on both banks of it; the latter had been preferred by the Aulic Council, and was religiously observed by M. de Kray. The first would have been good, had they wished to hold a permanent communication with the two armies of Italy and Germany. It is by no means strong in its advanced échelons; for the Iller, the Lech, the Isar, and the Inn only become obstacles of importance successively; and the last alone is considerable, though by no means totally insuperable. For there is nothing insuperable in war. But an army which, giving up its communications with Italy, places itself on the Danube, itself having all the bridges in its possession, destroying them successively as it retires; and being able to pass from one side of the river to the other, while the enemy is fixed to one side alone; being able, if this enemy wishes to make a dash on Vienna, to follow under cover of the Danube, and attack his rear, so punishing him for the first error he may commit,—an army, I say, thus placed, is generally considered in the best position for covering Austria. M. de Kray then was established at Ulm, where great works had been prepared to receive him. It is well known that, upon this point, the left bank of the Danube, formed by the first declivities of the Suabian mountains, always commands the right bank. Ulm is at the foot of the heights of the left bank, on the Danube itself. The body of the place had been repaired. A bridge head had been constructed on the opposite bank. All the heights behind Ulm, particularly the Michelsberg, were covered with artillery. If the French should present themselves, by the right bank, the Austrian army, resting with one wing on Ulm, and the other on the elevated convent of Elchingen, covered by the river, and sweeping all the open country of the right bank with its cannon shot, was inexpugnable. If the French should present themselves by the left bank, the Austrian army again had a position as certain and secure. It is necessary, for the perfect comprehension

* It is in accordance with the correspondence of Moreau, himself, that I state these numbers. All the calculations in his correspondence are exaggerated to his own advantage. He estimates his own battalions at 650 men, and those for the detachment sent to Italy, at 700 men.

This calculation cannot be true, for if he sent the corps as they were, if the battalions were reduced to 660 in his army, they could not be 700 in the corps from which they were detached.

of this, to know that the position of Ulm is covered on the right bank by the river Blau, which descends from the mountains of Suabia to join the Danube quite close to Ulm, forming a deep ravine. If, then, the French should pass the Danube above Ulm, in order to attack by the left bank, the Austrian army would change its position. Instead of facing the course of the Danube, it would turn its back upon it, and cover itself by the course of the Blau; its left wing would then be at Ulm, its centre at Michelsberg, its right wing at Lahr and Jungingen. Several marches on the left bank would be required to turn this new position, and, moreover, the right bank must be entirely abandoned, which would destroy all the combinations of the campaign. For, thus, the road over the Alps would be uncovered. Such was the camp wherein the exhausted soldiers of M. de Kray found an asylum for a time.

Saint-Cyr was at the convent of Wiblingen. From the windows of this convent he distinctly saw, even without the assistance of a telescope, the position of the Austrians. Full of confidence in the daring of the French, he offered, and many general officers with him, to storm the camp by open force. They answered for its success with their heads, and one must acknowledge that if the audacity of some of them, such as Ney or Richepanse, might have caused some mistrust, that profound tactician, Saint-Cyr, cool, methodical, and certain, deserved all confidence. But Moreau was too prudent to hazard an assault of this nature, so furnish M. de Kray with an opportunity of gaining a defensive battle. It is true that, if Moreau were victorious, the Austrian army, thrown into the Danube, would have been half destroyed, and the campaign terminated. But Moreau, failing in his attack, would have been forced to retreat; the campaign would have been jeopardized; and, more than all, the decisive campaign in Italy would perhaps have been rendered impossible. But Moreau ever operated in war without grandeur of design, though with great certainty. He allowed the brave men who answered for the success of the attack on the Austrian camp, to talk on; and refused to attempt a direct storm. The war, therefore, must needs be one of manœuvres. It was possible to cross over to the left bank above Ulm; the movement I have just described; but it would then be necessary, in order to turn the Austrians in their position, to involve the army so far on the left bank, that Switzerland would cease to be covered; and that the detachment sent toward the Alps might be endangered. It was possible, still remaining on the right bank, to descend the Danube, far below Ulm, cross it at a distance from the Austrians, and so render their position useless, by cutting them off from the Lower Danube. But on descending the river the rear of the army would be exposed and the road to Switzerland would still be left open. Moreau renounced, therefore, the idea of forcing M. de Kray from his position by any of these means; and although, taking the quality of his troops into consideration, he might have hazarded all, yet he must not be blamed for his caution and, above all, for his scrupulous attention to the conduct of the plan which best covered the operations of the First Consul, his chief, although his rival. He resolved, then, to make a manœuvre; and it was the true one. This was, to direct his march on Augsburg; that is to say, to refuse the course of the Danube, to cross its tributaries, and render all the Austrian lines of defence useless, by a direct march on the heart of the empire. This movement, seriously executed, would have infallibly detached M. de Kray from the Danube and from his camp at Ulm, by drawing him on in pursuit of the French army. It was a very bold step, though without laying the Alps open, since it kept Moreau continually at their base. But it was no time for half measures. It was necessary either to remain motionless before Ulm, or to advance resolutely on Augsburg and Munich. For a simple demonstration would not deceive M. de Kray; and could only expose the corps left in observation near Ulm. Here Moreau committed an error, which narrowly missed bringing on the most disastrous consequences. On the 13th, 14th, and 15th of May, he passed the course of the Iller. Leaving Sainte-Suzanne alone on the left of the Danube, and Saint-Cyr at the confluence of the Iller with that river, he directed the corps of reserve on the Gunz, at Babenhausen; Lecourbe, beyond the Gunz, on Erkheim; and a body of light troops on Kempten, on the road to the Tyrol. In this singular position, his line extending twenty leagues, touching Ulm on one side, and menacing Augsburg on the other, he could not deceive M. de Kray as to the danger of the march on Munich; and could have tempted him only to throw himself with all his force upon Sainte-Suzanne, who now remained alone on the left of the Danube. Had M. de Kray yielded to this temptation, and employed all his force, Sainte-Suzanne was lost.

The orders given on the 15th—25th of Floreal—to Saint-Cyr were executed on the morning of the 16th, when Sainte-Suzanne was assailed at Erbach by an enormous mass of cavalry. His right division, commanded by General Legrand, was at Erbach and Papelau, along the Danube; his left division, commanded by Souham, was at Blaubeuren, astride the Blau; the reserve, under General Colaud, a little way behind the two divisions. The battle began by a cloud of horsemen, who enveloped our columns on all sides. While our soldiers were charged by numerous squadrons, masses of infantry pouring out of Ulm, and marching up the Danube, prepared a more serious attack. Two columns, one of infantry, the other of cavalry, were directed, the one upon Erbach, to assail and surround the two brigades of which the division of Legrand was composed; the other upon Papelau, to cut off Legrand's from Souham's division. General Legrand then ordered his troops to retreat. They retired slowly through the woods, and issued thence on the highlands between Donaurieden and Ringingen. The troops executed this retrograde movement with remarkable steadiness. They were several hours in retreating over a very limited space; stopping every instant, forming squares, and mowing down the pursuing cavalry with their tremendous volleys. Souham's division, assailed on both flanks, was obliged to execute a similar movement, and to concentrate itself on Blaubeuren behind the Blau, pushing the Austrians, who followed it too closely, into the deep ravine formed by this river.

Legrand's division was in the most danger, because it was placed near to the Danube, and because, on this account, the enemy wished to crush it, so as to intercept all reinforcements that might arrive from the other bank of the river. The two brigades of which it was composed, were still defending themselves hardily; when at a moment, in which the infantry were retiring, and the light artillery were limbering up their pieces for the purpose of retiring also, the enemy's cavalry, returning to their charge, thundered down suddenly upon this unfortunate division. The brave Adjutant-general Levasseur, who had been dismounted in a previous charge, seized a horse, galloped to the 10th regiment of cavalry, which was at some distance from the field of battle, brought it back on the enemy, charged the Austrian squadrons, ten times superior in number, and checked its onset. The artillery had time to bring off their guns, to take up a position in the rear, and to protect in its turn the cavalry which had rescued it. During this interval, General Sainte-Suzanne had arrived with a part of Colaud's to reinforce Legrand's division. General Decaen, with the rest, had gone to succour Souham's division at Blaubeuren. The affair was re-established; but it might have yet ended disastrously in spite of this reinforcement. For there was reason to fear that the whole Austrian army would throw itself in mass on the corps of Sainte-Suzanne. Fortunately Saint-Cyr, posted on the other side of the Danube, not allowing his comrades to be crushed this time, as he had often been accused of doing, came to their assistance in all haste. Hearing the cannonade while on the left bank, he had despatched aides-de-camp after aides-de-camp to bring the divisions from the banks of the Iller to the banks of the Danube. He had given orders to lose no time, to call in the advanced posts, and to push forward with the main body of the army instantly, without waiting for those posts. A corps left in the rear was instructed to collect them. As for himself, posted on the bridge of Unterkirchberg, on the Iller, as fast as any corps came in, whether of cavalry, artillery, or infantry, he hurried it directly on the course of the Danube, preferring momentary disorder to loss of time. Afterward he proceeded in person to the banks of the Danube. The enemy, suspecting that Sainte-Suzanne would be succoured, had broken all the bridges, as far up the river as Dischingen. Seeing that Saint-Cyr was making efforts to find a ford or to establish a bridge, he had arranged his troops along the left bank, so as to face those of Saint-Cyr arriving by the right bank. He had moreover opened a brisk cannonade, to which Saint-Cyr was beginning to reply in haste. This artillery combat, raging from one side of the river to the other, inspired the Austrians who had quitted Ulm with fears for their retreat. It brought them back to the rear, disengaged Sainte-Suzanne a little, and sent lively joy and renewed animation through the ranks of our unhappy soldiers, who for twelve hours had been maintaining a battle of despair. They asked Sainte-Suzanne to lead them to the front; a request which was granted. Then all our divisions were put in motion at once, and the Austrians were driven back again under the cannon of Ulm; but in traversing the field of battle, which all were so joyous at reconquering, it was found strewn with our wounded and our dead. As for the result, the loss of the Austrians was not less than our own. Fifteen thousand French had sustained a combat during the whole day against 36,000 men, of which 12,000 were cavalry. M. de Kray was present all day on the field of battle.

But for the bravery of the troops, the energy and the talents of the generals, the error which Moreau had committed would have been punished by the loss of our whole left wing. Moreau repaired immediately to this wing, and, as if his thoughts had been suddenly drawn to this side, by pure accident, resolved on passing his whole army to the left bank of the river, on the 17th—27th of Floreal. Leaving Sainte-Suzanne to repose himself in his position of the previous day, he led back the corps of Saint-Cyr to its post between the Iller and the Danube. He sent the reserve which was under his orders, to Unterkirchberg, upon the Iller itself, and ordered Lecourbe to sit down between Guntz and Weissenhorn. On the 18th, the army made a second movement towards its left. Sainte-Suzanne was advanced beyond the Blau, Saint-Cyr beyond the Danube, and the reserve to Gocklingen, on the Danube itself, in readiness to cross the river. On the 19th, the movement was more decided. Sainte-Suzanne had completely turned Ulm; he had his head-quarters at Urspring; Saint-Cyr was on both the banks of the Blau, his head-quarters at Blaubeuren; the reserve had passed the Danube between Erbach and the Blau; Lecourbe was ready to cross the river.

Every thing appeared to announce an open assault on the intrenched camp at Ulm. In this new position, M. de Kray had his left on Ulm, his centre on the Blau, and his right at Elchingen. He had thus his back on the Danube, and defended the reverse of the position of Ulm. Moreau, after having attentively reconnoitred the position, disappointed the expectations of his generals, who thought they saw some serious intention in this movement to the left; and who moreover desired a bold attack on the Austrian camp, because they looked upon its success as infallible. Saint-Cyr again urged it, but was not listened to. Moreau resolved to move off, not choosing to hazard an open attack along the Blau; nor choosing, again, to turn the position by his left, for fear of uncovering Switzerland. He once more ordered the army to pass again to the right bank. On the 20th of May, and the following days, the army decamped, much to the displeasure of the soldiers, who reckoned upon an assault, and to the great astonishment of the Austrians who apprehended one.

These false movements had the bad effect of restoring the moral feeling of the Austrian army, without, however, damping in any degree that of the French, which it was difficult to shake, so convinced was it of its own superiority. Moreau might have at this time attempted a movement which I have pointed out above, and which, executed at a later period, procured him a glorious triumph. This was to descend the Danube, to threaten M. de Kray with a passage below Ulm, and to oblige him to decamp by making him uneasy as to the line of his communications. But Moreau again feared to uncover the road over the Alps. He conceived the idea, then, of making a second demonstration on Augsburg, of endeavouring once more to deceive the Austrians, and to persuade them, that in leaving Ulm in his rear, he was marching definitively on Bavaria, perhaps even on Austria. On the 22d of May—2d of Prairial—the whole French army had repassed the Danube. Lecourbe with the right wing menaced Augsburg by Landsberg; and Sainte-Suzanne, with the left wing, kept himself at some distance from the Danube, between Dellmensingen and Achstetten. On this same day, the 22d, Prince Ferdinand, at the head of 12,000 men, half of which at least were cavalry, made an attack upon Sainte-Suzanne, either for the purpose of detaining us near Ulm or of discovering our intentions. He was, however, vigorously repulsed. The troops conducted themselves with their accustomed stoutness, and General Decaen distinguished himself. The following days Moreau continued his movement. On the 27th of May—7th of Prairial—Lecourbe seized the bridge of Landsberg on the Lech, with as much hardihood as intelligence, and on the 28th entered Augsburg. M. de Kray did not allow his determination to be shaken, but remained resolutely in Ulm. It was, it must be said, the best of all his demonstrations; and that which does most honour to his firmness and judgment.

From that moment Moreau determined to remain inactive. He improved his position and rendered it stronger. Instead of extending his line, the extremity of which touched the Danube—a position which exposed our left corps to unequal combats with the entire Austrian army—he changed his front, and thenceforth, facing the Danube, ranged himself in a line parallel to that river, but at a sufficient distance, his left resting on the Iller, his right on Guntz, his rear-guard occupying Augsburg, and a corps of flankers observing the Tyrol. The French army thus presented a mass sufficiently concentrated, that it need fear nought, as to any isolated combat on one of its wings; and ran no other risk than that of a pitched battle, which was the very thing every individual in our ranks most ardently desired; since it would have been the final destruction of the Austrian army.

In this position, now above criticism, Moreau intended to await the results of the campaign which the First Consul was carrying on beyond the Alps. His generals pressing him eagerly to quit his inaction, he persisted in answering continually that it would be rash to do more until they received news from Italy.

That if General Bonaparte should succeed on that part of the theatre of war, he would then attempt a decisive manœuvre against M. de Kray; but that, if the French army should be unfortunate beyond the Alps, this army would be quite sufficiently embarrassed by the progress it had already made into Bavaria. The enterprise of General Bonaparte, the secret of which was known to Moreau, had something in it very extraordinary to a mind of his order. It is not astonishing, then, that he should have felt some uneasiness, and that he should have refused to advance, without knowing the fate of the army of reserve.

Moreau, in consequence of these resolutions, had many lively altercations with his generals, and particularly with Saint-Cyr. This officer complained of the inactivity to which they were restricted, and above all of the partiality which prevailed in the issue of provisions to the different corps of the army. His own, he said, often wanted bread, while that of the general-in-chief, next to which he was placed, was living in abundance. It was not resources that were wanting, since the capture of the enemy's magazines, but means of transportation. Saint-Cyr had more than one altercation on this subject; he was evidently on the worst terms with Moreau's staff, and this was the principal cause of this unfortunate misunderstanding. General Grenier had just arrived. Saint-Cyr was anxious that Moreau should give this general the command of the reserve, that he might so deliver himself from the prejudices and partialities which are inevitable consequences of a special command. Moreau unfortunately would do nothing of the kind. Saint-Cyr then retired, under the pretext of bad health, and deprived the army of the most skilful of its general officers. In point of fact, Saint-Cyr was made for command, not obedience. General Sainte-Suzanne also retired, in consequence of the same misunderstanding. He was sent down upon the Rhine, to form a corps destined to cover the rear of the army of Germany, and to hold the forces of Baron Albin in check. General Grenier took the place of Saint-Cyr, and Richepanse that of Sainte-Suzanne. Moreau, whose soldiers were well furnished with provisions, and who was strongly posted in his new position, resolved to wait, and wrote to the First Consul the following letter, which perfectly describes his situation and intentions.

“Babenhausen, “7th of Prairial, year VIII—27th of May, 1800.

“We are waiting, citizen consul, with impatience for the announcement of your success. M. de Kray and I are groping about here; he to maintain his post at Ulm, and I to force him to quit it.

“It would have been dangerous, to you in particular, had I carried the war to the left bank of the Danube. Our present position has forced the Prince of Reuss to retire to the outlets of the Tyrol, to the sources of the Lech and the Iller; thus, he cannot be dangerous to you.

“Give me, I pray, some news of yourself, and let me know what I can do for you.

“If M. de Kray advances on me, I shall retreat even to Memmingen, cause General Lecourbe to join me there, and we will fight. If he marches on Augsburg, I shall do so likewise. To do so he will quit his stronghold at Ulm, and then we shall see what can be done to cover you.

"We certainly should have more advantage in carrying the war to the left bank of the Danube, and in making Wirtemberg and Franconia pay contributions; but that would not suit you, because the enemy could then pour down detachments on Italy, leaving us to ravage at our will the states of the imperial princes.

"Receive the assurance of my friendship.

"Signed, MOREAU."

One month and two days had elapsed; and if Moreau had not obtained those prompt and decisive results, which at a blow finish a campaign—as he could have done by passing the Rhine upon a single point near Schaffhausen, or by throwing himself in mass on the left of M. de Kray, and fighting the battles of Engen and Mæsskirch with his forces united; as he could have done again, by driving the Austrian army headlong into the Danube at Sigmaringen; by storming it by main force in its camp at Ulm; or by obliging it to decamp through a decided movement on Augsburg—he had yet fulfilled the essential object of the plan of the campaign. He had passed the Rhine without accident, in presence of the Austrian army. He had fought two great battles, and although the concentration of his force was insufficient, he had gained these battles by his firmness and good judgment on the field. To conclude, in spite of his dilatory and darkling movements before Ulm, he had, nevertheless, shut up the Austrians round that place, and held them there blockaded, cutting them off Bavaria and the Tyrol; while he was able himself to await, in his strong position, the result of events in Italy. If in him we find not that superior and decided genius which constitutes great captains, we find a mind wise, calm, and capable of repairing by its firmness the errors caused by its deficiency of intellect and vacillating disposition. We find in him, in short, an excellent general, such as nations often have cause to desire—such an one as Europe had not at that epoch.

For it had been given to France at this period—to France which already had General Bonaparte, to possess, in addition to him, Moreau, Kleber, Desaix, Massena, and Saint-Cyr; that is to say, the best generals of the second order! And, to this it must be added, that she had already produced Dumouriez and Pichegru! Period of wondrous memories, which should inspire us with some self-confidence, should prove to Europe that all our glory, in that age, was not due to a single man, and that it is not chance which generates such genius as that of Hannibal, Cæsar, or Napoleon.

That, with which Moreau could be especially reproached, was, his want of vigour in command—was, that he allowed himself to be surrounded and governed by a particular military clique—was, that he permitted misunderstandings to grow up on all sides of him, and thus deprived himself of his best officers; not knowing how to correct, by the force of his own will, that vicious organization of his army, which induced his generals to isolate themselves, and to commit acts unworthy of military brotherhood. The great failing of Moreau, as I have often said, and as I shall frequently have occasion to say again, was his peculiar cast of mind. Why have we not a veil before our eyes, hiding from ourselves, and capable of hiding from others, the sad consequence of the times; and permitting us to enjoy, unalloyed, the wise and noble exploits of this warrior, whose heart, neither jealousy nor banishment had as yet alienated.

We must now transport ourselves to a far different theatre, thereon to witness a spectacle far different also. Providence, rich in contrasts, will now display to us another intellect, another character, another fortune; and, for the honour of our country be it said, the soldiers, still the same, that is to say, still intelligent, devoted, and undaunted.

BOOK IV.

MARENGO.

The First Consul impatiently awaits news from Germany.—That news arrived, and announcing success, he determines to set forth for Italy.—Distress of the garrison of Genoa carried to the utmost.—Resolution of Massena.—The First Consul hastens to his succour, by the execution of his project of crossing the great Alps.—Departure of the First Consul.—His deceptive appearance at Dijon.—His arrival at Martigny in the Valais.—Choice of the Saint Bernard, whereto to cross the grand chain.—Means devised for the transportation of the artillery, ammunition, provisions, and material.—Commencement of the passage.—Unheard of difficulties surmounted by the devotion of the troops.—Unexpected obstacle in the Fort du Bard.—Surprise and grief of the army at the discovery of that fort, at first believed to be impregnable.—The artillery carried by hard passes, under the fire of the fort.—Taking of Ivrea and descent of the army into the plains of Lombardy, before the Austrians have learned its existence or its march.—Simultaneous passage of the Saint Gothard by the detachment formed from the troops in Germany.—Plan of Bonaparte, when once arrived in Lombardy.—He determines on going to Milan, to rally the troops just come up from Austria, and then to surround M. de Melas.—Long illusions of M. de Melas all suddenly destroyed.—Grief of that aged general.—His orders, at first vacillating, then positive, to evacuate the banks of the Var, and the vicinity of Genoa.—Last extremities of Massena.—Absolute impossibility of feeding the soldiers and people of Genoa compels him to surrender.—Noble capitulation.—Genoa taken, the Austrians concentrate themselves in Piedmont.—Importance of the route from Alexandria to Piacenza.—Eagerness of the two armies to occupy Piacenza.—The French reach it the first.—Position of the Stradella chosen by the First Consul, in order to surround M. de Melas.—Halt of some days in that position.—Believing that the Austrians have escaped him, the First Consul goes in pursuit of them, and meets them unexpectedly in the plain of Marengo.—Battle of Marengo.—Happy inspiration of Desaix, and his death.—Regrets of the First Consul.—Despair of the Austrians, and Convention of Alexandria, by which they surrender Italy and all its garrisons to the French army.—A few days spent in Milan by the First Consul in regulating the affairs of Italy.—Conclave at Venice, and elevation of Pius VII. to the papal chair.—Return of the First Consul to Paris.—Enthusiasm excited by his presence.—Continuation of the operations on the Danube.—Victory of Hochstedt.—Moreau conquers Bavaria to the Inn.—Armistice of Germany similar to that of Italy.—commencement of negotiations for peace.—Arrival in Paris of M. de Saint Julien, the envoy of the Emperor of Germany.—Festival of the 14th of July, in the Hospital of Invalids.

THE First Consul awaited only the success of the Rhenish army, to make his descent on the plains of Italy; for, until such time, he could not demand of Moreau a detachment of his troops, and M. de Kray was not sufficiently detached from M. de Melas to warrant any undertaking in the rear of the latter.

The First Consul therefore awaited it, with lively impatience; having determined to leave Paris, and take the command of the army of reserve, as soon as he should have certain and sufficient intelligence of Moreau's successful operations. Indeed, time pressed, for Massena was reduced to the most cruel extremities at Genoa. We left him there, fighting against the whole Austrian force, with an army worn out by fatigue; and, in spite of his immense inferiority, inflicting daily severe injury on the enemy. On the 10th of May, General Ott having allowed himself to make an improper boast, by announcing to Massena that he was firing guns for a victory obtained over General Suchet—a tale which was moreover false—the illustrious defender of Genoa prepared a signal answer to this bravado. He made a sortie from Genoa with two columns. That of the left, commanded by General Soult, ascended the Bisagno, and turned Monte Ratti; that of the right, commanded by Miollis, attacked Monte Ratti in front. The Austrians, vigorously assaulted, were driven into the ravines, losing that important position and 1500 prisoners. In the evening, Massena returned triumphantly into the city of Genoa, and on the following morning wrote word to General Ott, that he was firing guns for his victory of the previous day: heroic vengeance, and worthy of that gallant heart!

But this was the last of his good fortune, for his exhausted soldiers were hardly able to carry the weight of their arms. On the 13th of May—23d Floreal—this energetic man, yielding to the counsel of his generals, consented, almost in spite of himself, to a movement, the result of which was most unfortunate.

This operation was no other than to storm Monte Creto, an important position, which it would have been, without doubt, highly desirable to wrest from the Austrians; for they would then have been driven back to a great distance from Genoa; but unfortunately, there was small chance of its success. Massena, who was certainly not distrustful of his army, for he exacted and obtained from it daily prodigious efforts, considered it no longer capable of carrying a position, which the enemy would defend with all his forces. He preferred making an expedition along the sea-shore, toward Porto Fino, for the purpose of seizing a large convoy of provisions, which he knew to have been collected in that direction. Contrary, however, to his custom, he yielded to the opinions of his lieutenants, and on the morning of the 13th, marched upon Monte Creto. The battle was at first very brilliant; but unfortunately an awful tempest, which continued several hours, broke down the energy of our troops. The enemy had concentrated numerous bodies on this point; and he bore back our soldiers, who were half dead with hunger and fatigue, into the valleys. General Soult holding it a point of honour, to bring an expedition which he had recommended to a successful termination, rallied, around himself, the 3d half-brigade, led it bravely upon the enemy and would perhaps have succeeded, had not a shot, which shattered his leg, laid him on the field of battle. His soldiers would fain have brought him off, but they had not time to do so; and this general, who during the whole siege had worthily seconded Massena, remained in the hands of the enemy.

The army returned to Genoa greatly dispirited; but, nevertheless, it brought back prisoners. While they were fighting, a disturbance had broken out amongst the females, in the interior of the city. These wretched creatures, pressed by the extremity of want, ran through the streets with bells, crying for bread. They were dispersed, and, from that time, the French general was compelled to occupy himself nearly exclusively with the care of nourishing the population of Genoa, which, it must be added, showed him the noblest devotion. He had successively procured, as we have seen, first, grain for a fortnight, then for another fortnight; and lastly, a vessel entering Genoa unexpectedly, had brought corn for five days' consumption, so that he obtained in all enough to subsist the city for more than a month. Having been now blockaded since the 6th day of April, these resources had held out to the 10th of May, when seeing his provisions fast diminishing, he reduced the daily rations of bread given out to the army and the people, substituting for it a soup made of herbs, and the little meat remaining in the city. The wealthier inhabitants, it is true, found something to eat, by buying, almost at their weight in gold, hidden provisions which the investigations of the police had not been able to discover, for the purpose of devoting them to the common stock of nourishment. Massena therefore had only to concern himself about the poor, on whom the want of food was pressing very sensibly. He had levied, for their benefit, a contribution from the wealthy classes, thus gaining them over to the interests of the French. Moreover, the majority of the population, fearing the Austrians, and the form of government of which they were the defenders, were determined to second Massena by their resignation! Struck by the energy of his character, they had ever felt toward him as much deference as admiration. Meanwhile, the oligarchical party, using, as their tools, some famished wretches, created for him every imaginable embarrassment. Massena, to restrain these, made a part of his battalions bivouac in the principal public squares of the city, with the matches of their cannon lighted. But the bread upon which they were yet living, and which was made of oats, beans, and any other kind of grain they had been able to procure, was on the point of failing them. In a few days the meat would be exhausted likewise. On the 20th of May there would remain no other materials, than such as were almost entirely unfit for food. It was therefore necessary that the siege should be raised before the 20th of May, if it were not desired that Massena should be made a prisoner with his whole army; and that the Baron de Melas, who would then have at his disposal 30,000 more men, should return to Piedmont, to block the débouches of the Alps. The aid-de-camp, Franceschi, employed in carrying news to the government, having succeeded, by his boldness and address, in passing the Austrian and English lines, had made the deplorable state of the fortress of Genoa known to the First Consul, who neglected nothing that would put the army of reserve in a condition to traverse the Alps. To this end he had sent Carnot into Germany, with a formal order from the consuls to Moreau, that he would despatch the detachment destined to cross the Saint Gothard. Himself toiling day and night, corresponding with Berthier, who was organizing the divisions of infantry and cavalry; with Gassendi and Marmont, who were organizing the artill-

lery; with Marescot, who was reconnoitering the whole line of the Alps; he urged every one to exertion, with that headlong energy and ardour which sufficed him to carry the French from the banks of the Po to the banks of the Jordan, from the banks of the Jordan to those of the Danube and Borysthenes. He would not leave Paris in person until the last moment, not wishing to abandon the political government of France, and leave the field clear to intriguers and conspirators, for a longer time than was absolutely necessary. Meanwhile, the divisions ordered from La Vendée, from Brittany, from Paris, and from the banks of the Rhone, traversed the wide-spread territory of the republic, and the heads of their columns already were appearing in Switzerland. The dépôt of some corps were still at Dijon, besides some conscripts and volunteers, sent thither to give credence in Europe to the opinion that the army of Dijon was a pure fable, destined solely to alarm M. de Melas. Up to this moment every thing had gone well; the illusion of the Austrians was complete. The movement of troops advancing towards Switzerland was little noticed, because the corps were so much dispersed, that they passed for reinforcements sent to the army in Germany.

At length, all being ready, the First Consul made his final arrangements. He received a message from the Senate, the Tribunal, and the Legislative Body, conveying to him the prayers of the nation, that he might soon return as a victor and pacificator. He replied with well-judged solemnity. His answer was intended to agree with the articles of the Moniteur, in order to prove that his journey, announced with so much preparation, was like the reserve-army, a feint and no more. He charged the Consul Cambacérés to preside in his place at the state-council, which at this period was in some sort the government itself. The Consul Lebrun was directed to superintend the administration of the finances. To each of them he said: Stand firm; whatever event may occur, be not dismayed; I will return like a thunder-bolt and crush the audacious hands that would dare touch the government. He particularly urged it upon his brothers, who were attached to him by the strongest personal interest, to keep him informed of every thing, and to give him the signal of return whenever his presence should become necessary. While he thus ostentatiously announced his departure, the consuls and ministers were, on the contrary, to tell the propagators of news, in strict confidence, that the First Consul was leaving Paris for a few days only, and that simply to review the troops which were about to make the campaign.

To sum up all, he departed full of hope and satisfaction. His army contained a good number of conscripts, but also, and in much greater numbers, soldiers inured to war and accustomed to conquest, commanded by officers formed in his own school. He had, moreover, an absolute confidence in the profound conception of his plan. According to the latest information, M. de Melas was obstinately advancing into Liguria, half of his forces against Genoa, and half against the Var. At this news, the First

Consul, no longer doubtful of the success of his enterprise, already saw in his ardent imagination, the very spot whereon he should meet and overwhelm the Austrian army. One day, before leaving Paris, while leaning over his maps, upon which he had been making marks of different colours, to indicate the position of the French and Austrian armies, he said, before his secretary, who listened to him with surprise and curiosity: "This poor M. de Melas will pass through Turin, fall back toward Alexandria, I shall cross the Po, attack him on the road to Placentia, in the plains of the Scrivia, and I shall beat him there, there." and, with these words, he set one of his marks on San Giuliano. We shall soon be able to appreciate how extraordinary was this species of foresight.

He left Paris on the 6th of May, in the morning before day-break, taking with him his aid-de-camp, Duroc, and his secretary, M. de Bourrienne. On his arrival at Dijon, he reviewed the dépôts and the conscripts who had been assembled there, but who had no ammunition, no baggage, nor any of the material necessary to an army ready to set out on a campaign. After this review, which, of course, confirmed the spies still farther in the idea that the army of Dijon was nothing but a pure fiction, he proceeded to Geneva, and from Geneva to Lausanne; here all was serious; here all that was in process must soon undeceive the incredulous, but undeceive them too late to allow them to send any information, that could be useful, to Vienna.

On the 13th of May, General Bonaparte reviewed some portion of his troops, and held a conference with the officers who had been appointed to meet him, for the purpose of giving him an account of what they had done, and of receiving his last orders. General Marescot, who had been employed in reconnoitering the Alps, was he, to whom he was most eager to give ear. After having compared all the passes, this engineer-officer pronounced himself in favour of the Saint Bernard, but he considered the operation as very difficult. Difficult it may be, replied the First Consul, but is it possible?—I believe so, answered General Marescot, but with the most extraordinary efforts. Well! let us advance, was the sole reply of the First Consul.

It is now time to make known the motives which decided him to choose the Saint Bernard. The Saint Gothard was reserved for the troops coming from Germany, of which General Moncey had assumed the command. This pass lay directly on their route, and could, at the very utmost, feed fifteen thousand men, for the valleys of Upper Switzerland were entirely ruined by the presence of the belligerent armies. There remained the passes of the Simplon, of the Great Saint Bernard, and of the Mount Cenis. These were not, as at the present day, crossed by great roads. It was necessary to unharness all vehicles at the foot of the defiles, to carry them on sledges over the mountains, and replace them on their carriages, at the farther side. These three passes all offered nearly the same difficulties, except that the road of the Mount Cenis, having been more frequently travelled, was perhaps better beaten than the others, and presented, on that account, fewer serious obstacles. But then it led down upon Turin, that is to say, on the very centre of the Austrians, and too close to them to be well adapted to the plan of surrounding them. The Simplon, on the contrary, the most remote of the three, in reference to the entrance, presented objections exactly the reverse of these. It opened, it is true, upon the environs of Milan, on a fine country, far enough distant from the Austrians, and entirely on their rear, but it presented one great difficulty. That difficulty was its distance. It would, in fact, be necessary, in order to reach it, to ascend with the whole artillery and baggage of the army, through the entire length of the Valais, which would have required means of transportation which were not at our disposal. Among these sterile and ice-bound valleys, which armies now were about to traverse, every article of consumption must needs be carried with them. It was not, therefore, a matter of indifference whether there were twenty leagues, more or less, to traverse. On the other hand, if the passage over the Saint Bernard were chosen, there was only the distance from Villeneuve to Martigny; that is to say, from the extremity of the Lake of Geneva, or the point where navigation ceases, to the foot of the defile. This was but a short distance. The pass of the Mount Saint Bernard opened at length into the valley of Aosta, toward Ivrea, between the two roads of Turin and Milan, in a direction most favourable for surrounding the Austrians. Although more difficult, and perhaps more dangerous, it deserved the preference on account of its comparative shortness. The First Consul, therefore, decided to carry the principal mass of his forces across the Saint Bernard itself. He took with him all the best troops of the army of the reserve, about forty thousand men; thirty-five thousand infantry and artillery, and five thousand cavalry. Nevertheless, desiring to distract the attention of the Austrians, he conceived the idea of sending some detachments, which it had been impossible to unite with the mass of the army, by some of the other passes. Not far from the Great Saint Bernard lies the pass of the Little Saint Bernard, which, from the heights of Savoy, opens also into the valley of Aosta. The First Consul directed General Chabran on this pass, with the 70th half brigade, and some battalions from Orient, composed of conscripts. This was a division between five and six thousand strong, which was intended to join the principal column toward Ivrea. To conclude, General Thurreau, who, with four thousand men of the Ligurian troops defended the Mount Cenis, received orders to present himself at this pass, and endeavour to penetrate it upon Turin. Thus the French army would descend the Alps by four different passes at the same time: the Saint Gothard, the Great and the Little Saint Bernard, and the Mount Cenis.

The principal mass, forty thousand strong, acting in the centre of this half circle, was certain to unite with the fifteen thousand men coming from Germany, as well as with the troops of General Chabran, and perhaps with those of General Thurreau, so that the whole would form a total force of about sixty-five thousand soldiers; and the enemy's mind would be distracted; since at sight of all these divers bodies of troops, he would be unable to determine on what point to direct his resistance. The question of the point of passage thus decided, the next was the mode of operating; how, in short, to transport sixty thousand men, with their material of war, to the farther side of the Alps, without beaten roads, over rocks, over glaciers; and this too at the most dangerous season of the year, that in which the snows are melting. The transportation of a park of artillery is never a very easy thing, for every piece of cannon must be followed by several vehicles, and for sixty guns about three hundred of these would be requisite. But in these high valleys, some of which are stricken with the sterility of eternal winter, the others hardly large enough to support their sparse and few inhabitants, there were no means of subsistence to be found. The bread for the men, and even the forage for the horses, must be conveyed with the army. The difficulty was, therefore, prodigious. From Geneva to Villeneuve all was easy, thanks to Lake Lemman, and to a navigation of eighteen leagues, as convenient as it was rapid. But from Villeneuve, the extreme point of the lake, to Ivrea, the outlet by which you enter the rich plains of Piedmont, there were forty-five leagues to be passed, ten of which were over the rocks and glaciers of the great chain. The route from Villeneuve to Martigny, and from Martigny to Saint Pierre, was good for carriages. Thence they must begin to scale paths, covered with snow, scarping on the brink of precipices, scarce two or three feet wide, and exposed, during the noonday heat, to the shock of frightful avalanches. About ten leagues were to be traversed by these paths, in order to gain, on the farther side of the Saint Bernard, the village of Saint Rémy, in the valley of Aosta. At this point there again began a carriage-road through Aosta, Chatillon, Bard, and Ivrea, into the plains of Piedmont. Of all these points, there was one only which might present some difficulty. This was Bard, where, it was said, there was a fort, of which some Italian officers had heard tell; but which did not appear likely to present any serious obstacle. There were then, as I have said, forty-five leagues to be marched by the men, carrying every thing along with them, from the Lake of Geneva to the plains of Piedmont, and of these forty-five leagues ten had no practicable road for vehicles.

Here follow, then, the dispositions which were conceived by the First Consul for the transportation of the material of the army, and ably executed under the direction of Generals Marescot, Marmont, and Gassendi. Immense provision of wheat, biscuit, and oats, had been sent by the Lake of Geneva to Villeneuve. Well assured, that, by means of money, he could easily secure the co-operation of the hardy mountaineers of the Alps, General Bonaparte had sent forward very considerable funds, in the form of specie. By these means, then, but within the last days only, all the cars of the country, all the mules, and all the peasants had been drawn to this point by promise of high payment. By these means bread, biscuit, forage, wine, and brandy, had been conveyed from Villeneuve to Martigny and thence to Saint Pierre at the foot of the defile. A sufficient number of live-cattle had also been driven thither. Thither had all the artillery and tumbrils been conveyed; and now a company of mechanics, established at the foot of the defile, at Saint Pierre, were employed in dismounting the pieces, dividing the gun-carriages into numbered fragments, ready for transportation on the back of mules. The cannons themselves would be mounted on sleds with rollers, which had been made at Auxonne. As for the ammunition of the infantry and artillery, a great number of small boxes had been prepared, which could easily be placed upon mules, and thus, like all the rest, be carried by the beasts of burden of the country. A second company of mechanics, provided with camp-forges, was intended to cross the mountain with the first division, establish themselves at the village of Saint Rémy, where the beaten road began again, prepared to reconstruct the artillery carriages, and remount the pieces. Such was the enormous task which must needs be performed. A company attached to the pontoon train was joined to the army, not carrying the material for bridging rivers, but destined to use such as they would not fail to seize in Italy. The First Consul had, moreover, reckoned on obtaining aid, from the monks established at the hospital of the Great Saint Bernard. All the world knows that these pious cenobites, established there for centuries, live in those awful solitudes, far above all inhabited regions, for the purpose of aiding travellers surprised by perilous weather, and sometimes buried in the snow. To these the First Consul had sent, at the last moment, a sum of money, in order that they should collect a large quantity of bread, cheese, and wine. A hospital was prepared at Saint Pierre, at the foot of the defile; another on the other side of the mountain at Saint Rémy. These two hospitals were to send their sick and wounded, if any there should be, to the larger hospitals established at Martigny and Villeneuve.

All these preparations were completed. The troops were beginning to appear. General Bonaparte, established at Lausanne, inspected them all, addressed them, animated them with that fire which burned so gloriously within himself, and prepared them for that immortal undertaking which should take rank in history thereafter, side by side with the grand exploit of Hannibal. He had been careful to direct two inspections, the first at Lausanne, and the second at Villeneuve. At the latter place, every foot-soldier, every horseman, was passed in review; and by means of hastily established magazines in both these places, every man was provided with the shoes, articles of dress, or arms, of which he was in want. This precaution proved to be most useful; for in spite of all the care that might be taken, the First Consul often saw veteran soldiers coming up, whose garments were worn, whose arms were unfit for service. He complained of this very angrily, and ceased those omissions to be repaired, which were produced by the undue haste or negligence of the agents, as always happens to a certain extent, and that unavoidably. To such a point had he carried his foresight, as to establish sadlers' workshops at the foot of the defile, for the repair of the artillery harness. On this apparently trivial subject, he had already written several letters; and I mention this circumstance, for the instruction of those generals and governments to whom the lives of men are intrusted; and who too often, through indolence or vanity, neglect such particulars. Nothing, in fact, that can contribute to the success of operations, or to the safety of soldiers, is below the genius or rank of commanding officers.

The divisions were advanced in échelon, from the Jura to the foot of Saint Bernard, to avoid confusion on the road. The First Consul was at Martigny, in a convent of Bernardines. Thence he gave out all his orders, and ceased not to correspond with Paris, and with the other armies of the republic. He had intelligence from Liguria, informing him that M. de Melas, always under illusion, was making every effort to take Genoa, and force the bridge over the Var. Satisfied on these important points, he at length gave orders to pass the mountain. He, himself, remained on this side the Saint Bernard, in order to correspond as long as possible with the government, and to expedite the movement of every thing across the mountain in person. Berthier, on the contrary, was ordered to betake himself to the other side the mountain, in order to receive the divisions and the material which the First Consul should send to him.

Lannes passed the first at the head of the vanguard, in the night of the 14th and 15th of May—24, 25 of Floreal. He commanded six regiments of choice troops, perfectly well armed, which, under their daring ardent chief,—sometimes insubordinate indeed, but always able, always very valiant—went gaily forth on their adventurous march. They set forth between midnight and two o'clock; in order to outspeed the moment at which the fierce glare of the sun, melting the snow, oft hurls down icy masses on the head of the bold traveller, who ventures to intrude into those frightful gorges. It would require eight hours to reach the summit of the pass, even unto the hospital of the Saint Bernard, and but two hours to descend thence to Saint Rémy. There was time therefore to pass over, before the period of the greatest danger. The soldiers confronted the difficulties of the road with the greatest alacrity; they were most ponderously laden; for they were obliged to carry biscuit, each man for several days, beside a quantity of cartridge. They scaled these craggy paths, singing among the precipices, and pondering the conquest of that Italy wherein they had so often heretofore tasted the joys of victory; and bearing within them a noble foresight of the deathless glory which they were rushing to achieve. The task was far less difficult for the foot soldiers than for the horsemen; the latter marched on foot, leading their horses by the bridle; in this there was no danger, while ascending; but when they came to the descent, the straitness of the paths obliged each cavalier to walk before his horse, so that each was exposed, at the least stumble of his animal, to be dragged with him headlong into the abysses; some accidents indeed of this kind happened, and yet not many. Some horses perished, but few only of the riders. Toward morning they arrived at the hospital, and there a surprise, arranged by the First Consul, renewed the energy and the good spirits of these gallant troops. The monks, provided before-hand with the necessary provisions, had prepared tables, and served out to every soldier a ration of bread, cheese, and wine. After a moment's rest, onward again they went, and reached Saint Rémy, without serious accident. Lannes established himself immediately on the opposite side of the mountain, and made all the preparations necessary for the reception of the other divisions, especially of the artillery and baggage.

Every day, one division of the army was destined to cross over. The operation therefore would last several days; the rather, for this reason that the material must needs be passed over with each separate division. To this work they applied themselves, while yet the troops were passing in succession. First the provisions and the ammunition were sent forward. For as regards this part of the baggage, which could be readily divided and loaded on the backs of mules in small boxes, the difficulty was not so great. As to the rest, what difficulty there was, lay chiefly in the insufficiency of means of transportation. For in spite of the liberal distribution of money, there could not be procured so many mules as were required for the vast weight which had to be transported to the other side of the Saint Bernard. Meanwhile the provisions and the ammunition having been forwarded in the rear of each division, and that by the aid of the soldiers, the transportation of the artillery was last undertaken. The gun-carriages and caissons had been dismounted, as I have said, and loaded on the backs of mules. The cannon themselves yet remained, the weight of which could not be reduced by division. For the twelve pounders and howitzers, the difficulty was much greater than was at first supposed. The sledges with rollers, which had been constructed in the arsenals, were wholly useless. Another mode was suggested, and immediately adopted; and it proved successful. This was to split pine trunks into two parts, hollow them out, secure a gun between them, and drag the pieces thus protected along the slippery ravines. Thanks to their wise precautions, no shock could occur to injure them. Mules were attached to these strange loads, and succeeded in bringing a few pieces to the top of the defile. But the descent was more difficult: it was only to be achieved by manual exertion, and by incurring imminent risk; as the piece had to be restrained and checked from rolling down the precipices. Unfortunately, at this juncture the mules began to fail; the muleteers too, who were now required in great numbers, became exhausted, and in consequence fresh means must be resorted to. A price as high as a thousand francs was offered to the neighboring peasants, for dragging a gun from Saint Pierre to Saint Rémy. One hundred men were required for one cannon, one day to bring it up, and another to let it down. Several hundred peasants presented themselves, and, in fact, under the direction of artilleryists, transported a few pieces.

But not even the allurements of such gain could induce them to maintain this effort. All disappeared ere long, and although officers were sent out to seek them, lavishing money, so to bring them back, it was in vain; and it became necessary to call on the soldiers of the several divisions to drag their own artillery themselves. It seemed that nothing could be asked, too arduous, of these devoted soldiers. The money which the exhausted peasants would no longer earn, was offered as a stimulus; but they refused it to a man, exclaiming that it was a point of honour for all troops to save their cannon; and they took charge of the abandoned pieces. Parties, each of a hundred men, leaving the ranks successively, dragged them, each in their turn. Their bands struck up lively tunes in the more difficult defiles, and animated them to surmount these novel obstacles. Arrived at the mountain top, they found refreshments prepared for them by the monks, and took some brief repose, as a preparation for greater and more perilous efforts to be exerted in descending. Thus the divisions of Chambarlhac and Monnier were seen toiling at their own artillery; and as the advanced hour of the day did not permit them to descend, they preferred bivouacking in the snow, to abandoning their cannon. Fortunately the sky was clear; nor had they to endure bad weather, in addition to the hard toils of the way.

During the days of the 16th, 17th, 18th, 19th, and 20th of May, divisions still continued to pass over with their provision, ammunition, and artillery, the First Consul still remaining at Martigny, pressing the expedition of his material. Berthier received it beyond the Saint Bernard, and saw it ordered and repaired by the mechanics. The First Consul, whose foresight never failed him, now thought immediately of pushing forward Lannes to take possession of the outlets of the mountains; for he had his division all united, and some four-pounders mounted, and in readiness. Him, then, he ordered to advance, as far as Ivrea and to take that town, securing thus the entrance to the plains of Piedmont. On the 16th and 17th of May, he marched upon Aosta, where he found some Croatians, whom he drove down the valley; he then proceeded to the borough of Châtillon, in which he arrived on the 18th. There a battalion of the enemy, which they met, was completely routed, and lost many prisoners. And now Lannes hurried down the valley, which widened sensibly as they descended, and displayed to the eyes of the delighted soldiers, houses, trees, cultivated fields, in one word, all the forerunners of Italian fertility. These brave men marched on joyously, until the valley, once again contracting, presented to them a very narrow gorge, blocked by a fort, bristling with cannon.

VOL. I. 16

This was the fort of Bard; heretofore mentioned as an obstacle, by the Italian officers, but as one that could easily be overcome. The officers of engineers attached to the vanguard advanced, and, after a prompt reconnaissance, declared that the fort completely barred the road, and that it was impossible to proceed farther, without forcing this barrier, which at first sight appeared almost impregnable. This information, running through the division, caused the most terrible surprise. This was the nature of that unexpected obstacle.

The valley of Aosta is traversed by a river which receives all the waters of the Saint Bernard, and carries them into the Po, under the name of the Dora-Baltea. As it approaches Bard, the valley narrows; the road lying between the base of the mountains and the bed of the river becomes gradually more contracted, until at length, a rock, which seems to have fallen from the neighbouring crags into the middle of the valley, almost entirely blocks it. The river then runs on one side of the rock, and the road proceeds on the other. This road lined with houses composes all the town of Bard. On the top of the rock stands a fort, impregnable by its position, though ill-constructed, which sweeps with its fire, on the right, the whole course of the Dora-Baltea, and on the left, the long street forming the little town of Bard. Drawbridges close the entrance and the outlet of this single street. A garrison, small in number, but well commanded, occupied this fort.

Lannes, who was not a man to be stopped easily, sent forward, on the instant, a few companies of grenadiers, who broke down the drawbridges, and, in spite of a heavily sustained fire, entered Bard. The commandant of the fort poured down a storm of shot and shell on this devoted town; but ceased at length, in compassion for the inhabitants.

Lannes stationed his division out of the town, under cover, but it was evidently impossible to pass the material of the army, under the fire of the fort, which swept the road in all directions. Lannes instantly made his report to Berthier, who, coming to the spot in haste, saw, with dismay, the difficulty of overcoming the obstacle which was thus suddenly revealed to him. General Marescot was sent for. He examined the fort, and declared it nearly impregnable, not on account of its construction, which was indifferent, but from its position, which was entirely isolated. The escarpment of the rock did not admit of escalading, and the walls, though not covered by an embankment, could not be battered in breach, as there was no possibility of establishing a battery in a position suitable for breaching them. Nevertheless, it was possible, by strength of arm, to hoist a few guns of small calibre to the top of the neighbouring heights. Berthier gave orders to this end. The soldiers, who were used to the most difficult undertakings, went to work eagerly to hoist up two four-pounders, and even two eight-pounders. These they in fact succeeded in elevating to the mountain of Albaredo, which overlooks the rock and fort of Bard; and a plunging fire, suddenly opened.

greatly surprised the garrison, which, nevertheless, did not lose courage, but replied, and soon dismounted one of our guns, which were of too feeble a calibre to be useful.

Marescot declared that there was no hope of taking the fort, and that some other means must be devised for overcoming this obstruction. Reconnoissances were now made to the left, along the sinuous flanks of the Albaredo mountain; and at length a path was found, which, through vast dangers, more perilous than those which the Saint Bernard had presented, rejoined the great road of the valley, below the fort, at Saint-Donaz. This path, though traversing a mountain of the second order, was, at the least, as difficult to cross as that of the Saint Bernard, since it was never trodden, except by shepherds and their flocks. If a second operation, like that which had been just accomplished, was here again to be performed—if this new defile must be passed by dismounting and remounting the artillery once more, and dragging it once more with similar efforts, the manual strength of the army would, it was likely, prove insufficient, and the guns and their carriages, so frequently separated and reunited, might finally be found unfit for service. Berthier, in great alarm, instantly counter-ordered all the columns as they successively came up; suspended the march of the men and the artillery all along the line, in order to prevent them from involving themselves further, should it be necessary, after all, to retreat. An instant panic circulated to the rear, and all men thought themselves arrested in this glorious enterprise. Berthier sent courier after courier to the First Consul, to inform him of this unexpected disappointment.

The latter tarried still at Martigny, not meaning to pass over the Saint Bernard, until he had seen, with his own eyes, the last of the artillery sent forward. But this announcement of an obstacle, considered insurmountable at first, made a terrible impression on him; but he recovered quickly, and refused positively to admit the possibility of a retreat. Nothing in the world should reduce him to such an extremity. He thought that, if one of the loftiest mountains on the globe had failed to arrest his progress, a secondary rock could not be capable of vanquishing his courage and his genius. The fort, said he to himself, might be taken by bold courage; if it could not be taken, it still could be turned. Besides, if the infantry and the cavalry could pass by it, with but a few four-pounders, they could then proceed to Ivrea at the mouth of the gorge, and wait until their heavy guns could follow them. And if the heavy guns could not pass by the obstacle which had arisen; and if, in order to get any, that of the enemy must be taken, the French infantry were brave and numerous enough to assail the Austrians and take their cannon.

Moreover, he studied his maps again and again, questioned a number of Italian officers; and learning from these that many other roads led from Aosta to the neighbouring valleys, he wrote letter after letter to Berthier, forbidding him to stop the progress of the army, and pointing out to him, with wonderful precision, what reconnoissances should be made around the fort of Bard.

He would not allow himself to see any serious danger, except from the arrival of a hostile corps, shutting up the debouché of Ivrea; he instructed Berthier to send Lannes as far as to Ivrea, by the path of Albaredo, and make him take a strong position there, which should be safe from the Austrian artillery and cavalry. When Lannes guards the entrance of the valley, added the First Consul, whatever may happen, it is of little consequence, the only result may be a loss of time. We have enough provisions to subsist ourselves awhile, and one way or other we shall succeed in avoiding or overcoming the obstacles which now delay us.

These instructions having been sent to Berthier, he addressed his last orders to General Moncey, who should debouch by the Saint Gothard; to General Chabran, who should come down by the Little Saint Bernard, directly in front of the fort of Bard; and then, at last, resolved to cross the Alps in person. Before he set forth, he received news from the Var, informing him that on the 14th of May—the 24th of Floreal—the Baron de Melas was still at Nice. As it was now the 20th of May, it could not reasonably be supposed, that the Austrian general, in the space of six days, could have marched from Nice to Ivrea. It was then on the 20th, before daylight, that he set out to pass the defile. His aid-de-camp Duroc, and his secretary Bourrienne, accompanied him. The arts have represented him bounding across the snowy Alps on a fiery charger; but here is the truth unvarnished.

He ascended Mount Saint Bernard, mounted on a mule, dressed in the gray great coat which he always wore, conducted by a guide of the country; displaying, in the most difficult paths, the abstraction of a mind occupied elsewhere; discoursing with the officers whom he met here and there on the road; and then at intervals conversing with the guide who accompanied him, making him talk of his life, his pleasures, and his troubles, like to some idle traveller who has no better occupation. This guide, who was quite young, laid before him, with ingenuous simplicity, the particulars of his obscure life, and above all the grief he endured for want of a little money, which rendered him unable to marry one of the maidens of the valley. The First Consul, now listening to him, now questioning the passengers, with whom the mountains were alive, arrived at the hospital, where the good monks received him with great eagerness. Hardly had he alighted, before he wrote a note, which he handed to his guide, desiring him to give it without delay to the administrator of the army, who had remained on the other side of the Saint Bernard.

In the evening, when the young man returned to Saint Pierre, he learned with surprise how mighty was the traveller he had conducted in the morning; and also that General Bonaparte had given him a field and house; in fact, the means of marrying, and realizing all the dreams of his modest and moderate ambition. This mountaineer died recently in his own country proprietor of the field which had been given to him by the ruler of the world.

This singular act of benevolence, at a moment of so much preoccupation, is worthy of attention. If it had been the mere caprice of a conqueror, distributing at random good and evil, alternately crushing an empire and building up a cottage; even such a caprice were worth the recording, if it should merely be to tempt the masters of the earth to do likewise. But such an act reveals something farther. The human soul, in the moment when it burns with ardent wishes, is inclined to benevolence, and does good, as it were, to merit that good which, itself, it seeks at the hands of Providence.

The First Consul halted a few minutes with the monks; thanked them for their cares toward his army; and made them a splendid gift, to be applied to the consolation of travellers and the poor.

He made the descent rapidly, after the custom of the country, by letting himself slide down the snow, and arrived the same evening at Etroubles.

The following morning, after having expended some time in examining the park of artillery and the provisions, he started for Aosta and for Bard. There, finding all that had been reported to him true, he resolved to make his infantry, cavalry, and the four-pounders, proceed by the path of Albaredo, which would be possible, after repairs. All the troops should be sent to take possession of the outlets of the mountains before Ivrea; and the First Consul, meanwhile, would attempt an attack on the fort, or find some means of avoiding its obstruction, by sending his artillery through one of the neighbouring defiles. He ordered General Lecchi, commanding the Italians, to proceed on the left, advancing by the road to Grassoney in the valley of the Sesia, which extended to the Simplon and the Lago Maggiore. This movement was intended to clear the road of the Simplon, to form a junction with the detachment, which was coming down it, and lastly to examine all the paths practicable to wheeled carriages. Meantime, the First Consul occupied himself with the fort of Bard. The single street, which composed this town, was in our possession, but only passable, if passable at all, under such storm of fire as would make it impossible to move artillery that way, even if the distance had been only five or six hundred yards. The commandant was summoned; but replied, with the firmness of a man who appreciated fully the importance of the post intrusted to his courage. Force, therefore, alone, could make us masters of the passage. The artillery, which had been placed in battery on the heights of Albaredo, produced no great effect; an escalade was attempted on the outer ramparts of the fort; but some brave grenadiers and an excellent officer, Dufour, were killed or wounded to no purpose. At this time the troops were defiling by the path of Albaredo; for fifteen hundred workmen had wrought the necessary repairs on it. Places that were too narrow they had enlarged by mounds of the earth; declivities too sudden they had eased, by cutting steps for the feet; trunks of trees they had thrown across other places, to form bridges over ravines, which were too broad to be leaped.

The army defiled man by man in succession, the cavaliers leading their horses by the bridles. The Austrian officer commanding in the fort of Bard, seeing our columns thus march past, was in despair that he could not stop their progress; he, therefore, sent a message to M. de Melas, informing him that he had seen the passage of a whole army of infantry and cavalry, without having any means to prevent it; but pledged his head that they should arrive without a single piece of cannon. During this time, our artillery-men made one of the boldest of attempts. This was, under the cloud of night, to carry a piece of cannon under the very fire of the fort. Unfortunately, the enemy, aroused by the noise, threw down fire-pots, which made the whole road light as day, enabling him by that means to sweep it with a hail-storm of deadly missiles. Out of thirteen gunners who had run the risk of taking this piece forward, seven were killed or wounded. There was in that enough to discourage hardy spirits; yet it was not long ere another way, ingenious, but still very perilous, was devised. The street was strewn with straw and litter; tow was fastened around all the cannon, to prevent the slightest resonance of those huge metallic masses on their carriages; the horses were taken out, and the bold artillerymen, dragging them with their own hands, were so daring as to carry them under the batteries of the fort, along the street of Bard. These means succeeded to perfection. The enemy, who occasionally fired as a precaution, wounded a few of our gunners; but soon, in spite of this fire, all the heavy artillery was transported through the defile; and this formidable obstruction, which had given the First Consul more anxiety than the Saint Bernard itself, was now entirely overcome. The artillery-horses had been sent by the path of Albaredo.

While this bold operation was in execution, Lannes, marching on at the head of his infantry, took, on the 20th of May, the town of Ivrea, which had not been repaired since the wars of Louis XIV., and which, by a singular presentiment, although it was too late, the Austrian staff were about arming at this very time. The fortifications of Ivrea consisted of a citadel detached from the body of the place, and a rampart protected by bastions. The valiant General Watrin, at the head of his division, assailed the citadel. Lannes rushed in person against the body of the place, and both were taken, one after the other, by escalade. There were in this place from five to six thousand Austrians, half of them cavalry, all of whom retreated with great precipitation. Lannes made some of them prisoners, drove the rest out of the valley, and took up a position at the entrance of the plain of Piedmont, at the point designated by the First Consul. A few days later, and the town of Ivrea, defended by the Austrians, would have been, though not an insurmountable, yet a serious obstruction. The French found here provisions and cannon; they finished the fortification of the town and completed the provision of it, so as to make it, in case of defeat, a cover for our line of retreat.

Meanwhile, General Chabran, with his division, descended from the Little Saint Bernard; and as this division contained many conscripts, recently incorporated, it was charged with the blockade of the fort of Bard, which could not hold out long, as it would find itself without resources, and as, now that the artillery had passed, it could be of no further service. General Thurreau, at the head of a body of 4000 men, carried the pass of Suza, made 1500 prisoners, and took some cannon, but was obliged to halt at the entrance of the valley, between Suza and Bussolino. General Lecchi, with the Italians, turned the valley of the Sesia, drove back the division of Rohan, took several hundred prisoners, and came up to clear the outlets of the Simplon, and unite his own force with a detachment of the division left in Switzerland at the beginning of the campaign. Lastly, the corps of General Moncey was scaling the heights of the valley of the Saint Gothard, by a succession of échelon movements.

Thus was the general movement of the whole army successful at all points; but it was now time to advance beyond the valley of Aosta. Lannes, always with the vanguard, left the valley on the 25th of May—the 6th of Prairial—and no longer hesitated to show himself on the plain. The Austrian General Haddick, with a few thousand infantry and a numerous cavalry, had been ordered to block up this outlet of the Alps. He was covered by a small river, the Chiusella, which empties itself into the Dora-Baltea. A bridge crossed this river. Lannes marched rapidly upon it with his infantry. Here our battalions were received with a sudden and well-directed fire of artillery: but that did not prevent them in their resolute advance. The brave Colonel Macon, with his half-brigade, entered the bed of the river, crossed it above and below the bridge, and appeared on the farther side. The Austrian cavalry, commanded by General Palfy, came rushing down to charge this demi-brigade, but the general himself fell dead, and his horsemen were routed. The French, rejoined by the remainder of Lannes division, advanced, pursuing the enemy with their usual order. General Haddick, taking advantage of some disorder in this movement, launched out his squadrons on them to great purpose. The 6th light infantry were checked, but the 22d, formed in close column, repulsed this fresh attack of the Austrian cavalry, by the weight of its fire only. Several thousand horse were then put at once into motion, to make a last effort on that valiant infantry. The 40th and 22d half-brigades, forming in square, sustained that formidable shock with rare resolution. Three times were they charged home, and three times did the squadrons of the enemy recoil from their bayonets. General Haddick, seeing himself thus unable to resist the van of the French army, gave orders to retreat, having lost many men, wounded, slain, and prisoners, surrendering all the plain of Piedmont to Lannes, and retiring behind the Orco. Lannes pursued his march, and on the 28th of May—the 8th of Prairial—advanced toward Chivasso on the banks of the Po. The Austrians, struck with surprise at this sudden invasion, hastened to evacuate Turin. Boats, loaded with wheat, rice, munitions of war, and wounded men, were sent down the Po. But Lannes took all of them. The abundance prepared by the Austrians for their own army was destined thus to minister to the enjoyment of the French.

Thirteen days only had elapsed, and the prodigious enterprise of the First Consul had fully succeeded. An army of 40,000 men, infantry, cavalry, artillery, had passed, without a beaten road, over the loftiest mountain range of Europe, dragging up their artillery by hand over the snow, or pushing it before them under the murderous fire of a fort, pouring its volleys in at point blank range. A second division of 5000 men had descended from the Little Saint Bernard; another of 4000 had debouched from the Mount Cenis; a detachment occupied the Simplon; and, to conclude, a corps of 15,000 French, under General Moncey, were on the heights of the Saint Gothard. Here were sixty and some odd thousand soldiers, who were about to enter Italy, separated as yet from each other, it is true, by considerable distances; but sure to be combined ere long, upon a main body of 40,000 men, which poured down by the way of Ivrea, in the centre of the half-circle of the Alps. And this extraordinary march was no rash madness of a general, who, intent on turning his adversary, exposes himself to a like danger. Master at once of the valleys of the Aosta, of the Simplon, and of the Saint Gothard, General Bonaparte had the certainty of being able, in case he lost a battle, to return to the point whence he had come; he would at the utmost lose some artillery, if he should be pressed in his march. Now, having nothing henceforth to conceal, he came in person to Chivasso, harangued the troops, and raised their firmness in presence of the Austrian cavalry; disclosed to them the great results which he foresaw, and showed himself not only to his own soldiers, but to the Italians and the Austrians, in order now to daunt, by his formidable presence, the enemy whom nevertheless he rather would have left to sleep in profound security.

What was the Baron de Melas about all this while? Always reassured by the cabinet of Vienna, and also by his own agents, on the subject of the fabulous army of reserve, this general maintained the siege of Genoa and the attack on the bridge of the Var. He had suffered considerable losses on these two points, but in other respects, he persisted in believing that the assemblage of troops at Dijon was nothing more than a swarm of conscripts, destined to fill up vacancies in the armies of the Rhine and Liguria. Information, which reached him about the middle of May, had inspired him with some uneasiness touching his rear; however, he soon became composed, and arrived at the conclusion that all the forces then assembled at Dijon must proceed ere long by the Saone and Rhone to join the corps of General Suchet on the Var. Instead of sending troops by the defile of Tende back to Piedmont, he kept all his forces under General Elsnitz before the bridge of the Var. Meanwhile the French columns, which debouched simultaneously from all the valleys of the Alps, seen and reconnoitred with the most complete certainty by General Wukassowich, at length dissipated his illusion, yet still without entirely undeceiving him. He left General Ott with 30,000 men before Genoa, General Elsnitz with 30,000 before the bridge of the Var, the latter to be reinforced by the troops of General Saint-Julien, which had become disposable since the taking of Savona, and he himself turned back with a detachment of 10,000 men through the Col de Tende, on his way to Coni, where he arrived on the 22d of May. Thus far, the Austrian general thought that the French troops, who had shown themselves, were nothing more than an assemblage of conscripts employed to make some demonstration in his rear, and so to deter him from the siege of Genoa; he did not yet think that it could be General Bonaparte himself at the head of a grand army. But now this last illusion vanished. One of his officers, who knew General Bonaparte well by sight, was sent to Chivasso on the banks of the Po. This officer saw with his own eyes the victor of Castiglione and Rivoli, and gave information of it to his commander-in-chief, who only then began to estimate the whole extent of the perils by which he was surrounded. For it was no assemblage of conscripts that the First Consul would deign to command. This was not all; it had been doubted whether the French had cannon, but at Chiusella the noise of their artillery had been heard. This venerable old man, who, in the preceding campaigns had displayed incontestable qualities, was now a prey to bitter anguish. Every day brought forth trouble; for he soon learned that the heads of General Moncey's columns were descending from the Saint Gothard.

He was indeed in a position of more than ordinary peril. Of 120,000 men, 25,000 at least he had lost before Genoa and the Var. Those left to him were scattered far and wide. General Ott, with 30,000 men, was before Genoa; General Elsnitz, with 25,000, before the bridge of the Var; General Kaim, under orders to guard the debouches of Suza and Pignerol with 12,000 men, had lost Suza and retreated upon Turin. General Haddick, who, with about 9000 men, was left to guard the valleys of Aosta and the Sesia, had just retreated before Lannes. And General Wukassowich, who, with 10,000 men, observed the valleys of the Simplon and the Saint Gothard, what would become of him before Moncey! The Baron de Melas himself was at Turin, with a body of but 10,000 men, brought back from Nice. Might not General Bonaparte fall down amidst all these dispersed troops, beat them in detail, one by one, and annihilate them? Perhaps there was yet time to take salutary determinations, but then they must be conceived and executed on the instant. The Austrian general lost a few days in recovering himself; in coming to a conclusion on the plans of his adversary; in forming his own; and last, in resigning himself to the sacrifices which must naturally be the consequence of concentrating all his forces. For he must needs abandon the Var instantly; perhaps Genoa, too; and certainly a great part of Piedmont.

While he deliberated thus, General Bonaparte, with his wonted promptitude and resolution, decided his own plans. The determinations, at which he must arrive, were not less grave than those of his adversary. For if the Austrians were dispersed, the French were dispersed likewise. For had they not descended the Mount Cenis, from the Great and from the Little Saint Bernard, and from the Saint Gothard? They must be reunited, they must cut off the retreat of the Baron de Melas, and lastly, they must raise the blockade of Massena, who, at this time, was reduced almost to the last extremity.

Having descended from the Saint Bernard, General Bonaparte had, on his right, the Mount Cenis and Pavia; on his left, the Saint Gothard and Milan, and fifty leagues in front of him Genoa and Massena. What then was to be done? To lean upon the right toward Mount Cenis, to combine the four thousand men of General Thurreau, would have been but a weak result. It would, moreover, have exposed him to an immediate encounter with M. de Melas, which, however, in the present state of his scattered forces, would not be very dangerous. Again, leaning to the right would be to open for him the roads to Milan and Placentia on his left, for his retreat. It would not indeed have been worth while to have made so great efforts to break down from the Alps upon the enemy's communications, if, after having gained the control of them, he had left them free. To press straight forward, passing the Po, rushing upon Genoa among the dispersed corps of the Austrian army, neglecting General Thurreau on the right, and General Moncey on the left, endangering all his lines of communication, would be nor wise, nor worthy of the profound prudence, which had combined all portions of his plan with as much reflection as boldness. No one could know what number of troops might be encountered on this route; the line of retreat towards the Alps would have to be sacrificed; Generals Thurreau and Moncey, abandoned to themselves, would probably be compelled to retreat toward the Mount Cenis and the Saint Gothard, after heaven only knows what adventures. A better plan would be to assist Massena directly by the way of Toulon, Nice, and Genoa. After all these considerations, there evidently remained but one part to take, that of bearing to the left toward the Saint Gothard and Milan, and so effecting a junction with the 15,000 men under General Moncey. Thus the principal detachment of the army would be united, amounting to 60,000 fighting men; the capital of Upper Italy would be occupied; the people would be raised, on the rear of the Austrians; all their magazines would be captured; the line of the Po, and all the bridges on that large river, occupied; and, to conclude, a position being gained to act at once on either bank, M. de Melas would be intercepted, by whichever line of retreat he might choose to attempt his escape. It is true that by this plan the succour to Massena would be delayed for eight or ten days, which would be vexatious. But General Bonaparte hoped that his presence would suffice to liberate the army of Liguria, for he supposed that M. de Melas would hasten to recall the troops besieging Genoa, and the bridge of the Var. At all events, Generals Massena and Suchet had accomplished the object assigned to them by detaining M. de Melas on the Apennines, fatiguing and exhausting him, and, above all, preventing him from blocking the debouches of the Alps. Thus the defender of Genoa, even should he be forced to yield, would only be consummating the long series of sacrifices imposed upon the noble and hapless army of Liguria, for the sake of the success of a vast combination.

When his plan was determined, General Bonaparte made his arrangements with the greatest promptitude, and directed his whole army to the left bank of the Po. He assembled his park of artillery, which had been put into good order, instructed Lannes to collect all the boats taken at Chivasso, and arrange them, as if for a bridge, to be thrown, in order to pass into Piedmont. His intention was to mislead M. de Melas again, in regard to his plans, and he was now no less successful than he had been before. At the sight of the movement, ordered by General Bonaparte, M. de Melas, still striving to flatter himself till the last moment, entertained the hope that the French could not have descended the Alps, but in small numbers. He thought that if General Bonaparte, as every thing led him to suppose, only desired to cross the Po, to proceed to Turin, and unite his force with General Moreau toward the Mount Cenis—he thought, I say, that it was possible to oppose him by breaking the bridges, and disputing the passage of the Po, with some thirty thousand men. He thus conceived the hope of being able to defend himself on this line, without making the double sacrifice of the position occupied on the Var, and the progress made before Genoa. Consequently M. de Melas united General Haddick, who had returned from the valley of Aosta, General Kaim, stationed at the outlet of Suza, and the 10,000 men, which he had himself brought back from Nice, beside a fresh detachment drawn from the Var; thus forming an assemblage of 30,000 men. And not supposing us to have a greater number, he hoped, with these forces, to dispute the river separating the two armies.

The First Consul made no efforts to remove this new illusion of his enemy, and leaving him occupied with this half concentration of his forces, in the direction of Turin, betook himself at once to Milan. Lannes, who had made a feint of ascending the Po for the purpose of marching from Chivasso upon Turin, suddenly turned down the river, advancing by Crescentino and Trino, upon Pavia, where were immense magazines of the Imperialists, consisting of provisions, ammunition, and artillery, and a most important position, from its commanding the passage of both the Po and Tessino. Murat was marching, by Vercello, on the point of Buffalora. The whole army followed this general movement toward Milan. On the 31st of May, they arrived before the Tessino; this river is wide and deep. They had no boats to cross it, and on the other side a numerous cavalry displayed itself, belonging to the corps of General Wukassowich, who guarded the Simplon and this part of the debouches of the Alps. Behind the Tessino runs the Naviglio-Grande, a wide canal, which crosses the country as far as Milan. For a certain distance it runs parallel to the course of the river, from which it is drawn, and is very near to it. The cavalry of the enemy, being crowded upon a very narrow neck of land between the Tessino and the canal, was much embarrassed in its movements, and could make little use of its strength.

The Adjutant-general Girard took some small boats, which the peasants of the environs had concealed near Galiate, and which they readily gave up to the army. He crossed over, followed by a handful of soldiers, and threw himself upon the Austrian van-guard! Successively reinforced by the going and coming of these boats, and covered by the fire of the artillery, he repulsed the cavalry, who did not dare to undertake too much on this unsuitable ground, and obliged it to re-cross the Naviglio-Grande at a point, called the bridge of Turbigio. Thus, at one dash, he crossed at once the Naviglio and the Tessino. But General Wukassowich arrived unexpectedly with Laudon's brigade of infantry, and attempted to penetrate the village of Turbigio. The Adjutant-general Girard had then 4000 or 5000 infantry against him, with only a few hundred soldiers to oppose them. He defended himself, however, for several hours, with much presence of mind and courage, and succeeded in saving the bridge of Turbigio, the loss of which would have thrown back the French beyond the Naviglio-Grande, and perhaps beyond the Tessino. While he was defending himself so bravely, General Monnier, who had succeeded in crossing a little way below, came to his aid, fell upon Laudon's troops and drove them from Turbigio. This line, which was calculated to stop the French army, was thus forced by a mere combat of the van-guard. On the following day, the 1st of June—12th Prairial—the division of Boudet passed towards Buffalora, and the whole army advanced upon Milan. Wukassowich, fearful of being hemmed in between the grand army, which was advancing upon Lombardy, and Moncey's division, which was descending from the Saint Gothard, retired hastily, ordering the brigade of Dedovich, which was at the foot of the mountains, to fall back upon the Adda, by the way of Cassano. He himself sought refuge behind the Adda, by Milan and Lodi, after having left a garrison of 2800 men in the Castle of Milan.

No obstacle henceforth arrested the course of the French army. Free entrance was afforded to the capital of Lombardy, which, for more than a year, had been groaning under the Austrian yoke. Up to this time these unhappy Italians had heard of nothing but the success of M. de Melas, and the distress of the French. Caricatures of the army of reserve had been circulated in Milan, as well as in Vienna and London. It had been represented as a medley of old men and children, armed with sticks and staves, mounted upon asses, and having for its whole artillery but a couple of blunderbusses. The censure thus heaped upon the French republic was not difficult to be endured; but not so the oppression, which the unfortunate Italians were condemned to undergo. Every man in Lombardy distinguished for fortune or education was either in prison or in exile, especially if he had taken any part in the affairs of the Cisalpine republic. And what was very remarkable, this persecution fell less heavily upon the ultra-patriots of the day,—men corresponding to the French jacobins,—than upon moderate men, whose example was more dangerous to the lower orders. With the exception of a few creatures of the Austrian government, and some nobles attached to the oligarchical party, all were sending up prayers for the return of the French. But they scarce durst cherish the hope, especially when they saw the Baron de Melas making such rapid advances in Liguria, on the point of taking Genoa, and passing the Var; and the First Consul so much occupied, in appearance at least, by the dangers of invasion which threatened France on the side of the Rhine. It was even circulated among the people, that the General Bonaparte, so well known in Italy, had died in Egypt; that, like another Pharaoh, he had been drowned in the Red Sea; and that the person whose name was then figuring in Paris was one of his brothers.

The surprise of the Italians may be readily conceived, when it was suddenly announced to them that a French army had made its appearance at Ivrea, that it had even passed that place, and was marching upon the Tessino; and later yet, that it had crossed that river. We may figure to ourselves the excitement that prevailed in Milan; the statements and counter-statements that met each other during forty-eight hours; and, finally, the joy that broke forth when the news was realized, by the appearance of General Bonaparte in person, marching with his staff at the head of the van-guard. On the 2d of June—13th of Prairial—the whole population poured forth to meet the French army, saluting the illustrious chief, whom they had so often seen within their walls, welcoming him with transports of enthusiasm, and hailing him as a saviour come down to them from heaven. Italian feeling, naturally so lively and so prompt to manifest itself, had never been displayed in so striking a manner, no similar combination of circumstances having ever arisen to call forth the emotions of a whole people. As soon as the French general entered Milan, his first act was to open the prisons, and render the government of the country friendly to France. He gave a provisional administration to the Cisalpine republic, composing it of the most respectable men of the city; and, faithful in Italy to the system which he had carried out in France, he permitted neither violence nor reaction; and while he restored power to the Italians of his party, he took care that they should not exercise it against the Italians of the opposite party.

After thus devoting his first cares to the affairs of Milan, he hastened to push his columns in every direction, as far as the lakes, the Adda, and the Po, so as to turn the insurrection to the profit of the French, to seize on the enemy's magazines, to make himself master of his communications, and to cut him off from every line of retreat. So far, things were proceeding favourably. For Lannes, whose direction was upon Pavia, had entered that city on the 1st of June, and made himself master of its immense magazines. That general found in Pavia, in the Austrian magazines, a considerable amount of corn, forage, ammunition, arms, and, above all, three hundred pieces of artillery, half of which were field-pieces. He also procured there several pontoons, which the French pontoon train, who had marched into Italy, without their material, were intended to employ upon the Po.

The division of Chabran, which had been left before Fort Bard, took possession of it on the 1st of June, and found there eighteen pieces of cannon. General Chabran, having left a garrison in it, as well as in Ivrea, occupied the course of the Po, from the Dora-Baltea, as far as the Sesia. Hence to Pavia the ground was occupied by Lannes. General Bethencourt, who had come from the Simplon, was stationed before Arona, toward the termination of Lago Maggiore. The Italian legion was directed through Brescia in pursuit of the Austrians, who were retiring in all haste. At the same time, the divisions of Duhesme and Loison passed the Adda, and rested upon Lodi, Cremona, and Pizzighittone. General Wukassowich, unable any longer even to make a feint of guarding the Adda, retired beyond the Mincio, under the cannon of Mantua.

Nothing now arrested the march of General Monecy, save the difficulty of subsisting in the barren valleys of Upper Switzerland. His first columns had begun to make their appearance; but it was necessary that they should wait some days for the others, and this proved to be one of the great inconveniences of his position, for it was necessary to press forward, if Genoa was to be prevented from falling into the hands of the Austrians. General Bonaparte was now sure of establishing a junction of all his columns, one only excepted, that of General Thurreau, who was cut off at the pass of Mount Cenis, without being able to extricate himself. In other respects, our army was strongly posted in the midst of the Milanese; having its retreat secured by the Mount Cenis, the Saint Bernard, the Simplon, and the Saint Gothard; holding the Adda, the Tessino, and the Po; living upon the magazines of the Austrians; intercepting all their routes, and in position to give them decisive battle; after which they would have no other resource, in case of discomfiture, than that of laying down their arms. The surrender of Genoa, if such must be, would be a painful circumstance, painful as regarded the brave army by which it was defended; and painful, inasmuch as the besiegers, by reinforcing General Melas, would render more difficult the great battle which was to terminate the campaign. But when General Bonaparte should carry the day it was by one and the same blow that Genoa and Italy would be reconquered. Nevertheless, he would have made every sacrifice to save Genoa; but the junction of Monecy's corps could not be looked for earlier than the 5th or 6th of June, and it was in vain to hope that Genoa could hold out till that period.

Baron Melas had, by the late news, been rendered fully sensible of the real state of things. After seeing his adversary enter Milan, where he was joined by all the columns which descended the Alps, in succession, he comprehended the vast plan laid out against him. To add to his misfortune, news was brought him of the reverses experienced by M. de Kray, and of his retreat upon Ulm. Upon this, he at length broke through his system of half-measures, and issued an imperative order to General Elsnitz to abandon the bridges of the Var, and to General Ott to break up the siege of Genoa, and to both of them to form a junction at Alessandria. It was this that led General Bonaparte to form hopes for the safety of Genoa. But it was decided that the noble but ill-fated army of Liguria should pay, even to the last, by its blood, by its suffering, and at length by a painful surrender, for the triumphs of the army of reserve.

Massena sustained to the last the greatness of his character. "He yield!" cried his soldiers; "No, he would sooner make us eat our very boots!" The meat had all been consumed, and they were subsisting upon horse-flesh; and, the latter having also failed them, the most unclean of animals were obliged to serve them for sustenance. The miserable bread, composed of oats and beans, had also been devoured. From the 23d of May—3d of Prairial—Massena, collecting the starch, linseed, and cacao, found in the magazines of Genoa, had it made into bread which the soldiers could with difficulty swallow, and which few among them succeeded in digesting. The hospitals were encumbered with the sufferers. The people being reduced to a vegetable soup, as their only support, experienced all the torments of famine. The streets were covered with wretched beings, expiring of inanition; women, extenuated with hunger, were seen exposing to the public charity their infants, whom they could no longer nourish. Another spectacle filled both the city and the army with dismay. This was the number of prisoners, whom Massena had taken, and for whom he had no food. He was unwilling to set them free upon their parole, having seen numbers of those, to whom this privilege had been granted, reappear in the ranks of the enemy. He had, therefore, proposed to General Ott, and afterwards to Admiral Keith, that they should furnish the provisions necessary for their daily subsistence, passing his word of honour that no part of the same should be abstracted for the garrison. The word of such a man might surely have been relied upon. But so deep was the spirit of animosity, that it was decided to impose on Massena the charge of feeding the prisoners, however cruel the privations to which such a resolution might lead. The general on the enemy's side had, therefore, the barbarity to condemn his soldiers to the horrible sufferings of hunger, in order to augment the famine in Genoa, by having some thousands of mouths more to feed. Massena supplied these prisoners with the same vegetable soup which he gave to the inhabitants. It was inadequate to the want of men of robust constitution, and habituated to the abundance of the rich plains of Italy. They were always upon the eve of revolt, to drive them from the thought of which, Massena caused them to be shut up in the hulks of some old vessels, which were placed in the middle of the port, and upon which a park of artillery, constantly pointed, stood ready to bellow forth destruction. The frightful howlings of these miserable beings deeply affected the whole population, already so immersed in their own sufferings.

Day by day the number of our soldiers diminished. They were seen expiring in the streets, and so great was the weakness of the men, that they were permitted to mount guard seated. Discouraged and disheartened, the Genoese no longer performed the service of the national guard, fearful of compromising themselves should the Austrians bring back the oligarchical party. From time to time, obscure rumours were afloat, that the despair of the inhabitants was about to break forth; and to prevent such an explosion, battalions, with loaded cannon, occupied the principal streets and squares of the city.

The imperturbable attitude of Massena had its effect upon the people and the army. The respect which this heroic officer inspired, eating, as he did, with the soldiers, their disgusting bread, living with them under the fire of the enemy, and sustaining, with unshaken firmness, the weight of duty and the cares of responsibility, added to all their physical calamities—the respect which he inspired, I say, acted as a powerful restraint upon all. In the midst of desolated Genoa, he exerted the ascendancy of a grand and lofty mind.

Meanwhile, a feeling of hope still supported the besieged. Several of the general's aides-de-camp had, by courageous and persevering efforts, crossed the lines, and brought in news. Colonels Reille, Franceschi, and Ortigoni, had adventured successfully, and had learned, at one time, that the First Consul had set forth, and was on his way; and at another, that he was crossing the Alps. One of the three, Franceschi, had left him descending the Saint Bernard. But since the 20th of May, no farther accounts of him had been received. Passed in this state of doubt and uncertainty, ten or twelve days seemed as so many ages, and it was asked, in a desponding tone, how it could happen that, in ten days, General Bonaparte should not have crossed the space which separates the Alps from the Apennines. Knowing him to be the man he is, said they, he is, by this time, either conqueror or conquered; if he come not, it is that he has fallen in this daring enterprise. Had he entered Italy, he would already have had the Austrian general in his grasp, and would have dragged him from the walls of Genoa. Others pretended that General Bonaparte regarded the army of Liguria in the light of a corps to be sacrificed to a grand operation; that he had one thing only in view, and that was to keep the Baron de Melas upon the Apennines; but this object attained, that he thought no more of dislodging him, but would march forward to an end of vaster purpose. Well, well! cried the Genoese, and our soldiers joined them in the sentiment, they have sacrificed us to the glory of France; be it so; but now that this object is attained, is it desired that the last man of us shall expire? Were it facing the enemy's fire, and with arms in our hands, well and good; but of hunger, of disease—no, that cannot be! The moment has come; we must at last surrender. Pushed to desperation, several of the soldiers went so far as to destroy their arms. Meanwhile, a plot was talked of, contrived by some men, whom suffering had driven to desperation. Massena addressed to them a beautiful proclamation, in which he reminded them of the duties of a soldier; duties which consist not less in supporting privations and suffering, than in facing dangers. He pointed to the example of their officers, eating of the same food with themselves, and exposing themselves, day by day, to be killed or wounded at their head. He told them that the First Consul was advancing at the head of an army for their deliverance; that to capitulate at this time of day, were to lose, in a moment, the result of two months of deeds of devotion. Yet a few days, said he, nay, a few hours, and you will be delivered, and that after having rendered the noblest service to your country.

And thus, in every sound, in every echo, toward the horizon, they thought they heard the cannon of General Bonaparte, and were seen to run eagerly together. One day, it was currently believed, that the firing of cannon was heard in the direction of Bocchetta; extravagant joy broke forth on every side; Massena, himself, hurried to the ramparts. Vain illusion! it was but the distant muttering of a storm in the gorges of the Apennines. Feelings of angry melancholy and depression grew upon every heart.

At length, on the 4th of June, there remained but two ounces, to each man, of that loathsome bread, composed of starch and cacao. To yield the place was now absolutely necessary; for reduced to extremity, as our soldiers were, the wretched men could not be called upon to devour each other; and their resistance had its inevitable term, in the physical impossibility of existing any longer without food. The army had, moreover, the sense, that it had done all that could be expected from its courage. The conviction was strong upon them, that they were not defending the Thermopylæ of France, but were serving to favour a manœuvre which, at the moment, must have succeeded, or failed utterly. Above all, a belief began to gain ground, that the First Consul was thinking more of extending his combinations than of relieving them. Massena shared this feeling, though he avowed it not; but he did not consider his duties as entirely accomplished, until he had held out unto the last possible term of resistance. These two miserable ounces of bread, which remained for each man, being consumed, nothing would remain but the necessity to surrender. To this, he resigned himself at last, but in grief and in bitterness of heart.

General Ott had sent him a flag of truce, for the Austrians were not less eager to come to terms than the French. In fact, this general had received the most positive orders to raise the sign of Genoa and to fall back upon Alessandria. Some historians have said, that these offers on the part of the enemy should have taught Massena what was the real state of things. Doubtless, he well knew that, could he wait a day or two longer, succours might possibly arrive; but those two days were not his to dispose of. "Give me," said he, to the Genoese, "only two days' provisions, or even one, and I will save you from the Austrian yoke, at the same time that I spare my army the pain of a surrender." At length, on the 3d of June, Massena was compelled to treat. A surrender at discretion was named, but he rejected the idea in a manner so decided, that it was not again proposed. He insisted that the army should retire whither it would, with its arms and baggage, with colours flying, and with the liberty to serve and fight, when beyond the besieger's lines. "If not," said he, to the Austrian flag of truce, "I will sally forth from Genoa, sword in hand. With 8,000 famished men, I will attack your camp, and I will fight, till I cut my way through you." The garrison was permitted to depart, but it was insisted that its commander should remain a prisoner in person, for they feared that with a leader such as he, this garrison might cut its way from Genoa to Savona, join with the troops of Suchet, and attempt some formidable enterprise upon the rear of Baron de Melas. To calm the indignation of Massena, the end of this condition, so honourable to himself, was avowed. He would not hear one word of it. It was then asked, that the garrison should leave by sea, that it might not have time to join Suchet's corps. To all these propositions he opposed his usual answer, that "He would cut his way through them." It was at length agreed, that 8,000 men should pass by land, that is to say, those who were still able to support the weight of their arms. The convalescents were to be successively embarked, and transported to Suchet's general quarters. There remained 4000 invalids, whom the Austrians contracted to feed and take care of, and to restore them afterwards to the French army. General Miollis was left to command them. In the stipulations of Massena, provision was made for the interests of the Genoese. He required, as an express condition, that no man among them should be prosecuted for opinions put forth during the period of our occupation, and that persons and property should be faithfully respected. M. de Corvetto, a Genoese of high standing, and since minister in France, was admitted to these conferences, and can bear witness to the efforts made in favour of the Genoese. It was also Massena's wish that the existing government—that for which they were indebted to the French Revolution, should be left untouched. Upon this point the Austrian general refused to make any engagement. "Very well!" said Massena, "do what you please; but, I give you notice that, ere fifteen days are passed, I shall be once more in Genoa."—Prophetic words, to which M. de Saint-Julien, an Austrian officer, made the following noble and delicate reply: "Monsieur le Géoral, you will find in this place the men whom you have so well taught how to defend it."

The definitive conference took place on the morning of the 4th of June, in a chapel, at the Ponte Cornigliano. The article relative to the conducting a portion of the army by land, gave rise to a last difficulty. But when Massena gave them the alternative, either of acceding to what he wished, or of coming to the issue of a desperate conflict on the morrow, the Austrian generals yielded the point. It was stipulated that this convention, in which evacuation was agreed upon, and from which the term capitulation was carefully excluded, should be concluded that very evening. It may be observed, that the Austrian officers were filled with admiration at the French general's conduct, and paid him every tribute of respect and regard.

When evening came, he still delayed signing, in the hope, which never abandoned him, that deliverance might come. At last, when it could no longer be deferred without breaking the word that had been passed, he affixed his signature to it. The following morning, our troops marched forth with General Gazan at their head, and found the rations prepared for them at the outposts. Massena went by sea, in order that he might more promptly reach Suchet's head-quarters. He left the port in a boat bearing the tri-colour flag, and under the guns of the English squadron.

Thus finished this memorable siege, during which a French army found occasion to display great virtues and to perform great services. It had made more prisoners and killed more enemies than it numbered soldiers. With fifteen thousand men, it had taken or put hors de combat more than eighteen thousand Austrians. It had moreover ruined the moral sense of the imperial army, by compelling it to be continually on the alert, and to make constant and prodigious efforts. But should it be asked, at what cost the brave garrison of Genoa accomplished all this?—The reply is here—of fifteen thousand effective soldiers, it had lost more than three thousand killed in action; four thousand had been wounded more or less grievously; only eight thousand were on their way to join the army in the field. Soult, the second in command, remained with a broken leg in the hands of the enemy. Of three generals of division, one, Marbot, had died of an epidemic: a second, Gazan, was severely wounded. Of six generals of brigade, four were disabled; Gardanne, Petitot, Fressinet, and d'Arnaud. Of twelve adjutant-generals, six were disabled, one taken prisoner, and an eighth killed. Two officers of the staff had been killed, seven taken prisoners, fourteen wounded. Eleven colonels, out of seventeen, had been put hors de combat, or made prisoners. Three-fourths of the officers had shared the same fate. It is self-evident, that nothing could have sustained this brave army through so many trials and reverses, but the example of endurance and devotedness set them by all their officers. But in return, they showed themselves worthy of such leaders; for never did French soldiers display more constancy or more heroic virtue.

Honour, then, to that luckless valour, which, by its all-unlimited devotion, contributed to the triumphs of that more lucky valour, the feats of which I have now to record!

While General Ott, himself under orders to raise the siege of Genoa, was granting to Massena the favourable terms we have just recounted, General Elsnitz, being recalled by the orders of the Baron de Melas, had abandoned the bridge of the Var. The attacks of the Austrians upon this point had been tardy, because their heavy artillery, transported by sea, had been long reaching them. Different attempts had been made in succession from the 22d until the 27th of May; the last, in particular, was a mere desperate effort of despair, on the part of General Elsnitz, who was desirous, before retiring, to leave no means untried that might lead to ultimate success. These attacks were all valiantly repelled, and General Elsnitz, perceiving that there was no chance of success, thought of repassing the mountains. Suchet, scanning with a prompt and experienced eye the intentions of the Austrian general, made dispositions to prevent him effecting his retreat in safety. He saw at a glance that, by manœuvring to his left, along the mountains, he should place the Austrians in a perilous situation, and might probably succeed in cutting off some of their detachments. In fact, without the line of the Var, where the inroads of the enemy had been stayed, lies the parallel line of the Roya, whose source is in the Col di Tende. Should the French, by moving across the Var, out-march the Austrians upon the sources of the Roya, they would make themselves masters of the Col di Tende, and force their adversaries to skirt the ridge of the Apennines in search of a passage.

This happy idea, executed with vigour, obtained for General Suchet the happiest results. He began by dislodging General Gorupp from Ronciglione; marched briskly on his left to the right of the Austrians, which was somewhat shaken; carried successively the defiles of the Rauss, which open from the valley of the Var into that of the Roya; took the famous camp Des Mille Fourches; and making himself master of the Col di Tende, found himself, on the first of June, placed in command of General Elsnitz's line of retreat. General Gorupp, being thrown into disorder on the heights of Roya, had still time to gain the Col di Tende, leaving, however, upon his route, a number of dead and prisoners. General Elsnitz, with the rest of his army, had no other resource than that of following the seaward declivity of the Apennines to Oneglia, and of returning by Pievia and San Giacomo into the valley of the Tanaro. He had to cross frightful mountains, with soldiers already disordered by this species of flight, having at his heels an enemy who was in high spirits at passing from defensive to offensive warfare. During five whole days the Austrians were pursued without intermission, and checked continually; and, at length, on the 6th of June, General Elsnitz, on reaching Ormea, had only ten thousand men left. On the 7th he was at Ceva. General Gorupp had retired upon Coni, with a feeble division. The loss sustained by the Austrian corps upon the Var is estimated at ten thousand men.

General Suchet, who had been so long separated from Massena, joined him again upon the seaboard, near Savona. The twelve thousand French, who came from the Var, joined the eight thousand who had left Genoa, thus forming a body of twenty thousand men, well situated for falling upon the rear of M. de Melas. But Massena having received rather a serious contusion in disembarking, could not mount his horse, while the eight thousand men whom he led were worn out with fatigue. And, add to this—for the truth must be told—that in the breast of all the defenders of Genoa, there lingered a secret irritation against the First Consul, who was now known to have triumphed at Milan, while the army of Liguria was reduced to capitulation. Massena was unwilling that General Suchet should run the risk of a descent upon Italy, without being apprized of the movements which the two generals opposed to each other were about to make on the other side of the Alps. Baron de Melas, being joined by all his lieutenants, Haddick, Kaim, Elsnitz, and Ott, might find himself at the head of a formidable force, fall upon General Suchet, and worst his forces, before proceeding to meet General Bonaparte. Massena did, however, permit his lieutenant, Suchet, to pass the Apennines; and to take up a position before Acqui; instructing him to hold this position, observing the Austrian army, and availing himself of every opportunity to annoy it; hanging suspended, as it were, over its head like the sword of Damocles. We shall shortly have an opportunity of seeing what service was again rendered by the army of Liguria, simply by its presence upon the summit of the Apennines.

It was thought by Massena, that this brave army, in terminating by a menacing movement the memorable defence of Genoa, had done its part toward the triumph of the First Consul, and that it could not do more without imprudence. This distinguished officer had reason for what he did. He was about to deliver over the Austrians, worn down by the efforts he had compelled them to exert, and reduced to a third of their number, into the hands of General Bonaparte. Of the 70,000 men who had passed the Apennines, not more than 40,000 had returned, including the detachment brought back by M. de Melas to Turin. The 50,000 in Lombardy had also been diminished greatly, and, above all, were dispersed over the country. Generals Haddick and Kaim, the former of whom guarded the valley of Aosta, and the other the valley of Suza, had suffered considerable losses. General Wukassowich, driven beyond the Mincio, and separated from his general-in-chief by the French army, which had descended from the Saint Bernard, remained paralyzed for the rest of the campaign. A corps of some thousand men had ventured into Tuscany. By at once forming a junction between Generals Elsnitz and Ott, who came from the borders of the Var, and from Genoa; and Generals Haddick and Kaim, who had returned from the valleys of Aosta and Suza, M. de Melas might have formed a mass of about 75,000 men. But he was compelled to leave garrisons in the strong holds of Piedmont and Liguria, such as Genoa, Savona, Gavi, Acqui, Coni, Turin, Alessandria, and Tortona. As matters therefore stood, he would not have more than 50,000 soldiers. or thereabout, to bring into the field, presuming that too many men were not sacrificed in the garrison of the strongholds in question, and that the junction of his generals were effected without accident.

The situation of the Austrian generalissimo was, therefore, very critical, even after the taking of Genoa. It was so, not only in respect to the dispersion and diminution of his forces, but also in regard to the line of march he must needs take, in order to emerge from the narrow precincts of Piedmont, in which General Bonaparte had shut him up. In fact, it was necessary to repass the Po, in the face of the French, and to regain, through Lombardy, which was occupied by them, the grand route of Friuli and the Tyrol. The difficulty was immense, in presence of an adversary whose distinguishing tact in the art of war was that of great and rapid movements.

M. de Melas had kept the upper course of the Po, from its source as far as Valencia. It was easy to pass this river at Turin, Chivasso, Casale, or Valencia; granted, but in passing it at any one of these points, he must necessarily fall upon the Tessino, which was occupied by General Bonaparte, and upon Milan, the centre of all the French forces. There was, therefore, but little chance of his escape in that direction. The choice was left him, of leaning to his right, and of taking the direction of the lower course of the Po, that is, of making for Placentia or Cremona, in order to gain the grand route to Mantua. Placentia thus became to both the adversaries the capital point of occupation. In respect to M. de Melas, it presented almost the only hope of escaping a second "Caudine Forks." In regard to General Bonaparte, it was the means of gaining the prize due to his daring march across the Alps. In fact, had the latter succeeded in delivering Piedmont, only at the sacrifice of allowing the Austrians to escape, such a result, balanced against the risks he had run, might have incurred some ridicule in the eyes of Europe, which was gazing intently at this campaign; for his manœuvre, the object of which is now manifest, would in this manner have been foiled. Consequently, Placentia was the key of Piedmont: it was a point equally essential to the party anxious to escape the adversary, and to the party anxious to prevent that escape.

For the above reasons, M. de Melas fixed upon two points of concentration for his troops; Alessandria, for those who were in Upper Piedmont, and Placentia for those around Genoa. He ordered Generals Kaim and Haddick to march from Turin upon Alessandria, by the way of Asti; and General Elsnitz, returned from the borders of the Var, on the same place, by way of Ceva and Cherasco. These three corps, once united, were instructed to transport themselves from Alessandria to Placentia. He ordered General Ott, who was on his way from Genoa, to descend directly upon Placentia, by the way of Bocchetta and Tortona. A corps of infantry, disencumbered of all the impediments of an army, had orders to march direct on the same place, by the route of Bobbio, along the valley of the Trebbia. Lastly, General Oreilly, who was already in the environs of Alessandria, with a strong detachment of cavalry, received instructions not to await the concentration of the troops of Upper Piedmont, but to make his way, at the top of his horses' speed, to Placentia. The small corps, which had adventured into Tuscany, also received orders to repair thither by the Duchy of Parma, and by the route of Fiorenzuola. Thus, while the principal part of the Austrian army was concentrating upon Alessandria, in order to march thence upon Placentia, the corps lying nearest to the latter place had the same orders to march thither direct, and without loss of time.

But it was doubtful whether General Bonaparte could be outstripped in so important an object. He had lost five or six days in Milan in collecting the corps which had come by the Saint Gothard; an interval of great importance, since during that time Genoa had fallen. But now that General Moncey, with the troops drawn from Germany, had scaled the Saint Gothard, he lost not a moment farther. Placed upon the route of the couriers coming to and fro from Vienna to M. de Melas, at Turin, he was perfectly initiated in all the projects of the imperial government. For instance, he had read the singular despatch, in which M. de Thugut, reassuring the Austrian general, advised him to be at his ease, and not to allow himself to be diverted from his purpose by the fable of an army of reserve; to lose no time in carrying Genoa and the line of the Var, in order to form a detachment to aid the army of Marshal de Kray, who was shut up on the Ulm. He had also read the despatches of M. de Melas, which opened, in a tone of confidence, but closed in a troubled and plaintive strain. All this was amusing enough, but the amusement was interrupted on the 2d of June, when he learned, through the same correspondence, that Massena had been compelled to surrender Genoa on the 4th. As for the rest, this news in no respect changed the plan marked out for his campaign; for having sought to throw himself upon the rear of the enemy, in order to surround him and force him to lay down his arms, had he succeeded, Italy, and the city of Genoa, would both be reconquered by the same blow. The real and serious inconvenience, resulting from the taking of Genoa, was that of having upon his hands the disposable troops of General Ott. But the intercepted despatch carried its consolation with it, for this despatch declared that the army of Massena were not prisoners of war. Hence, if on the one hand a larger body of Austrian troops was descending from the Apennines; on the other, a body of French troops, which had not at first been taken into account, was descending from the Apennines on the track of those Austrians.

Now that Genoa had opened its gates, the First Consul felt less eager to encounter M. de Melas. But he was very eager indeed to occupy the line of the Po, from Pavia to Placentia and Cremona; and to possess himself of these important points, that of Placentia in particular, he made dispositions quite as active as those of M. de Melas himself. While occupied in Milan, collecting the troops which had come from different points of the Alps, he stationed along the Po the troops which had come with him by the Saint Bernard. Lannes had already taken possession of Pavia with the division of Watrin. This general had instructions to pass the Po, a little way above its junction with the Tessino, that is, at Belgiojoso. Murat, with the divisions of Boudet and Monnier, had orders to cross at Placentia; Duhesme, with the division of Loison, was to pass at Cremona.

On the 6th of June, Lannes having collected at Pavia, in the Tessino, all the boats that could be disposed of, sent them to the Po, and having reached a point between Belgiojoso and San-Cipriano, began his passage there. General Watrin, who was placed under his orders, crossed the river with a detachment. Scarcely had this detachment reached the right bank, when it had an affair with the troops which had come from Valencia and Alessandria, and were hurrying to Placentia. It ran much risk of being driven into the river; but General Watrin held his ground firmly till the boats going and returning had brought him a reinforcement, when he remained, in the end master of the ground. The remainder of Watrin's division, led on by Lannes, afterward passed the Po, and took a position somewhat higher up, menacing the great road from Alessandria to Placentia.

On the same day, Murat reached Placentia. All the members of the Austrian administration were in this city, with some hundreds of men to guard them. On the approach of danger, the Austrian officer mounted cannon on the bridge-head of Placentia, situated on the left bank of the Po, and hoped to defend himself until the corps, which were advancing on every side, should come to his succour. The vanguard of Monnier's division, deeming the place, before which it presented itself, undefended, was met by a terrible fire of grape-shot, and as the position could not be carried by assailing it in front, a regular attack was deferred till the morrow.

On the day following, the 7th, General Oreilly, who had received orders from M. de Melas, to hasten from Alessandria to Placentia, arrived there with his cavalry. The other Austrian corps, that which had come up from Parma by Fiorenzuola, that which had gone down with General Gottesheim by Bobbio, and that which had come with General Ott by Tortona, had not arrived; nor was General Oreilly in condition, with his squadrons, to defend Placentia. The few hundred men who attempted a resistance at the bridge-head, had lost a fourth of their number. In this position of things, the Austrian commander drew off his artillery, and destroyed the bridge of Placentia, which was formed by boats; so that when General Boudet hastened to repair the check of the evening previous, he found the bridge head evacuated, and the bridge itself gone. But there remained a portion of the boats that had served for its construction; of these Murat took possession, and somewhat lower down, at Noceto, by successive embarkations, carried Monnier's brigade across the Po. This brigade threw itself upon Placentia, and effected an entrance, after a lively action. General O'Reilly lost not a moment in falling back, that he might be in time to save the park of artillery which was on its way from Alessandria, and which was in danger of falling into the hands of the French. In fact he arrived in time to prevent its falling into the hands of either of Murat or Lannes. He had to charge the troops of Lannes, which had passed the Po at Belgiojoso, more than once with his cavalry. He disengaged himself, however, and succeeded in counter-ordering the park of artillery, which shut itself up in Tortona. While General O'Reilly was clearing the road backward to Alessandria, having had the good fortune to get through our out-posts, the vanguard of General Gottesheim's infantry, having descended along the Trebbia, by Bobbio, presented itself before Placentia. One regiment came full-face upon the whole of Boudet's division, and was cut to pieces. It was that of Klebeck. This unfortunate regiment, which was assailed by superior numbers, lost many prisoners, and fell back in disorder upon Gottesheim's principal corps, in advance of which it was marching. General Gottesheim, alarmed at this rash skirmishing, returned with all speed up the acclivity of the Apennines, in order to regain Tortona and Alessandria, across the mountains, about which he had the ill luck to wander several days in succession. Again, the regiment returning from Tuscany, by the way of Parma and Fiorenzuola, arrived on the same day upon the suburbs of Placentia. This was a new disaster for this detached corps, which, falling suddenly into the midst of the enemy's army, was thrown back in disorder upon the road to Parma. Thus, out of four corps marching upon Placentia, three, the least important it is true, had been beaten, and had left prisoners in their flight. The fourth and most considerable, was that of General Ott, which, having to make a longer circuit, was still in the rear; and was on the point of coming up with Lannes, before reaching Belgiojoso. From this moment the French were masters of the Po, and in possession of the two principal passes, that of Belgiojoso, near Pavia, and that of Placentia. They were soon to be in possession of a third, for on the following day, General Duhême, at the head of Loison's division, took Cremona from a detachment which General Wukassowich had left there on quitting the place. Here he collected much materiel, and made 2000 prisoners.

General Bonaparte now directed all his operations from Milan. He had sent forward Berthier to the borders of the Po; and, day by day, sometimes hour by hour, conveyed to him, in an interesting correspondence, the movements he was to execute.

Though by taking possession of the Po, of Pavia, and Placentia, he was master of the line of retreat which M. de Melas would be tempted to follow, still all was not done; for, what rendered this route of Placentia the true line of retreat for the Austrians, was the presence of the French beyond the Tessino, and around Milan. In fact, in this position the French blocked the passage, which the Austrians might have opened to themselves by crossing the Po between Turin and Valencia. Nevertheless, if now, in order to encounter M. de Melas, the French should pass the Po between Pavia and Placentia, abandoning Milan, and weakening the Tessino, they would again tempt M. de Melas to pass either by Turin, Casale, or Valencia; and falling on the rear which we had left open, and on the city of Milan itself, to pay us back with nearly the same blow we had dealt him in the descent from the Alps. Nor was it impossible, that M. de Melas, deciding upon the sacrifice of a part or his baggage and heavy artillery, which he might have left in Piedmont, would retrace his steps to Genoa, and ascend by Tortona and Novi, as far as Bocchetta. Thence he might throw himself into the valley of the Trebbia, fall upon the Po below Placentia, in the environs of Cremona or Parma, and by this circuit succeed in gaining Mantua and the Austrian states. This march, however, across Liguria and the spurs of the Apennines, the same which had been marked out for General Gottesheim, was the least probable, as presenting great difficulties, and leading to the sacrifice of a part of his material; but it was strictly within the reach of possibility, and like other possibilities was to be provided against. It was to guard against these different chances, that General Bonaparte used every precaution; nor is there, perhaps, an example in history of dispositions so masterly and so profoundly conceived, as those which he devised on this decisive occasion.

A threefold problem was to be solved.—to close by a barrier of steel the principal route, leading directly from Alessandria to Placentia; to occupy, in such a way as to render it available in case of need, the route falling by the upper Po down on the Tessino; and lastly, to retain the power of descending in time upon the lower Po, should the Austrians, seeking to fly by the reverse of the mountain, endeavour to pass the river above Placentia, toward Cremona or Parma. General Bonaparte never ceased poring over the map of Italy, in search of a post, that would answer to these three conditions, and he made a choice worthy of everlasting admiration.

On examining the movement upon the chain of the Apennines, it will be seen that, owing to the turn which that chain takes in embracing the gulf of Genoa, it sweeps off in a northerly direction, and throws off spurs which descend to the very brink of the Po, from the position of the Stradella to the environs of Placentia. In this part of Piedmont and of the Duchy of Parma, these spurs press so closely upon the river as to leave but a very narrow space for the high road to Placentia. An army, stationed before the Stradella, at the entrance of a sort of defile several leagues in length, with its left upon the heights, its centre on the road, its right along the Po, and the marshes that border it, would be difficult to dislodge. It should be added, that this road is sprinkled with halets and villages, built of rough masonry, and very capable of resisting cannon. Against the imperial army, therefore, with its numerous cavalry and artillery, apart from its other advantages, this position was excellent, as rendering null those two important arms.

It had other advantages also, nor these less peculiar. It is close to this position, that the tributary streams of the other bank of the Po, the most important for occupation, such as the Tessino and the Adda, form their junction. The Tessino joins the Po a little way above Pavia, and below Belgiojoso, nearly opposite to the Stradella, at two leagues, for the farthest. The Adda, taking a longer course before joining the Po, falls into it between Placentia and Cremona. It will be readily understood, that, stationed at the Stradella, and master of the bridges of Belgiojoso, Placentia, and Cremona, General Bonaparte was in possession of the most decisive points, for he would bar the principal route, that from Alessandria to Placentia; and could, at the same time, by a vigorous march, either advance upon the Tessino, or fall down the Po as far as to Cremona, and make for the Adda, which covered his rear against the forces of Wukassow ch.

It was in this kind of net, formed by the Apennines, the Po, the Tessino, and the Adda, that he distributed his forces. He resolved in the first instance to throw himself upon the Stradella itself, with the 30,000 best soldiers of his army, the divisions of Watrin, Chambarlhac, Gardanne, Boudet, and Monnier, posted under the orders of Murat, Victor, and Lannes, in the position we have described, the left upon the mountains, the centre on the high road, and the right along the Po. The division of Chabran, which had come by the Little Saint Bernard, which had been charged in the first instance with the occupation of Ivrea, was afterwards sent to Vercelli, with orders to fall back upon the Tessino, in case of the approach of the enemy. The division of Lapoype, which had descended the Saint Gothard, was posted upon the Tessino, in the environs of Pavia. In all these amounted to 9000 or 10,000 men, who were instructed to fall back one upon the other, dispute the passage of the Tessino at the outset, and give time to General Bonaparte to fly in a single day to their succour. The detachment of the Simplon, under General Bethencourt, guarded, in the direction of Arona the route of the Saint Gothard, which was destined to serve as the retreat of the French army in case of disaster. The division of Gilly was appointed to guard Milan; which would render the presence of an Austrian garrison necessary in the castle of that city. Between 3000 and 4000 men were employed in this twofold object. Lastly, the division of Lorges, which had come from Germany, had orders to take up its station at Lodi, on the Adda. The division of Loison, which formed part of the army of reserve, was commissioned, under the orders of General Duhesme, to defend Placentia, and Cremona. This comprised another force of between 10,000 and 11,000 men, employed on these latter points.

Such was the disposition of the fifty and odd thousand soldiers, of whom General Bonaparte could dispose at this moment. 32,000 were at the central point of Stradella, from 9000 to 10,000 upon the Tessino, from 3000 to 4000 at Milan and Arona; and lastly, between 10,000 and 11,000 on the lower Po and the Adda; all so placed, as to be able mutually to support each other with the greatest celerity. In fact, in case of advice from the Tessino, General Bonaparte could in a single day succour the 10,000 French who guarded it. On notice from the lower Po, he could, in the same space of time, descend upon Placentia and Cremona, while General Loison, defending the passage of the river, would afford him time to hasten thither. The one and the other of them would, on their side, fall back upon the Stradella and reinforce General Bonaparte in as short a space of time as it would occupy him to reach them.

In the present instance, General Bonaparte seemed to abandon his usual principle of concentrating his forces on the eve of a general engagement. If such a concentration be regarded as a chef-d'œuvre of art, when operated seasonably, in the moment of a decisive action, and in the case of two opponents marching against each other, the very reverse is the case, when one of the two is seeking to escape; and when the secret of art consists in grasping him firmly before fighting him. Such was the case in the present instance. In fact, General Bonaparte had to draw a net round the Austrian army, and this net must be strong enough to hold him. Had he had nothing but outposts on the Tessino and the lower Po, fitted at the most to supply him with information, not to bar the enemy's route, he would have wholly failed of his purpose. Upon every point there were needed posts capable at the same time of conveying intelligence, and of arresting the course of the Austrians, always maintaining in the centre a principal mass, ready to speed in any direction, with decisive means; and never was the employment of such forces, and the application of his own principles, happily modified, combined with such profound skill, as by General Bonaparte on the occasion before us. It is in the application to peculiar circumstances of a true, but general principle, that men of action are the most distinguished.

This plan once decided, General Bonaparte gave his orders accordingly. Lannes, with the division of Watrin, had been sent to the Stradella, by the way of Pavia and Belgiojoso. It was necessary that the divisions of Chambarlhac, Gardanne, Monnier, and Boudet, which had gone to Placentia, should bring him the succour of their forces, before the Austrian corps, which, driven out of Placentia, had marched to effect a junction with General Ott near Tortona, should have time to fall upon him. This is what General Bonaparte, with his amazing sagacity, had foreseen. Unable to quit Milan until the 8th, in order to reach the Stradella on the 9th, he despatched to Berthier, Lannes, and Murat, the following instructions—"Concentrate yourselves," said he, "at the Stradella. On the 8th, or 9th at the latest, you will have upon your hands fifteen or eighteen thousand Austrians, coming from Genoa. Meet them, and cut them to pieces. It will be so many enemies the less upon our hands on the day of the decisive battle which we are to expect with the entire army of M. de Melas." These orders given, he set forth, on the 8th, from Milan, intending to pass the Po in person, and to be at the Stradella the day following.

It was impossible to divine, with more exactness, the movements of the enemy. I stated above, that three Austrian detachments had presented themselves before Placentia without effect; that the detachment which had reached Tuscany by the way of Fiorenzuola, had been driven from thence; that the detachment of General Gottesheim, which had descended with the infantry by the valley of Trebbia, had been pushed back upon that valley; and, lastly, that General Oreilly, who had come with the cavalry from Alessandria, had been compelled to return in the direction of Tortona. But, on his side, General Ott, marching with the main body by the route of Genoa to Tortona, reached the Stradella on the morning of the 9th of June, as General Bonaparte had foreseen. He brought forward with him Generals Gottesheim and Oreilly, whom he had met on their retreat, and intended to make a vigorous effort upon Placentia, not dreaming that the French army could be in échelon almost in its full strength in the defile of the Stradella. Including the troops which had joined him, he had between seventeen and eighteen thousand men. On the morning of the 9th, Lannes could not collect more than seven or eight thousand; but, thanks to the reiterated orders of the general-in-chief, five or six thousand would join him in the course of the day. The field of battle was that which I have already described. Lannes offered himself, with his left resting on the heights of the Apennine, his centre on the high road, near the small village of Casteggio, and his right in the plain of the Po. He had erred in posting himself somewhat too far in advance of the Stradella, in the direction of Casteggio and Montebello, where the road ceases to form a defile, owing to the opening of the plain. But the French, full of confidence, though inferior in numbers, were capable of the grandest devotion; above all, under a leader like Lannes, who possessed eminently the art of gaining their affections.

Lannes, by pushing the division of Watrin vigorously on Casteggio, drove in Oreilly's outposts. His plan consisted in gaining possession of the small village of Casteggio, situated upon his route, either by attacking it in front, or by turning it on the plain of the Po on one side, or on the declivities of the Apennine on the other. Stationed upon the road, the numerous artillery of the Austrians swept it in every direction. Two light battalions of the 6th attempted to take this murderous artillery by turning it to the right, while the whole of the third battalion of the 6th and 40th, made an effort to carry the neighbouring heights to the left, while the remainder of Watrin's division marched upon Casteggio itself, wherein the centre of the enemy rested. A furious engagement began upon all points. The French were on the point of carrying the positions attacked, but General Gottesheim, hastening with his infantry to the aid of Oreilly, drove back the battalion which had gained the heights. Lannes, under a most fearful fire, supported his troops, and prevented them from yielding to numbers. They were, however, on the point of giving way, when the division of Chambarlhac, forming a part of General Victor's corps, came up. General Rivaud, at the head of the 43d, regained the heights, rallied the French battalions, which had been driven thence, and, after unheard-of efforts, succeeded in establishing himself on that position. In the centre, that is upon the high road, the 96th came to the aid of General Watrin, in his attack upon Casteggio; and the 24th, extending themselves to the right upon the plain, essayed to turn the enemy's left, in order to put down the fire of his artillery. During this combined effort upon the wings, the brave Watrin maintained a stout and fierce attack upon Casteggio; he lost and retook this hamlet several times. But Lannes, present everywhere, gave the decisive stroke. By his orders, General Rivaud, on the left, being now master of the heights, and having cleared them of the enemy, rushed down upon the rear of Casteggio; the troops, pushed forward on the plain to the right, succeeded in turning the severely disputed hamlet, and, on both sides, marched upon Montebello; while General Watrin, making a last effort on the enemy's centre, cut his way through it, and thus, at length, passed out beyond Casteggio. The Austrians, at this moment finding themselves repulsed in every direction, fled to Montebello, leaving in our hands a considerable number of prisoners.

The action had lasted from eleven in the morning until eight in the evening. The Austrians, who were here in the plains of Piedmont, struggling with such desperate efforts to cut their way out, were the same soldiers who had blockaded Massena in Genoa, and who had been formed by him to encounter the rudest shocks. They were seconded by a numerous artillery, and had displayed more than their usual bravery. The First Consul arrived just at the termination of the battle, the time and place of which he had so well foreseen. He found Lannes covered with blood, but exulting in the happy result of the day, and the troops in transport at their success. They had, to use his own phrase, "the consciousness of having acted worthily." The conscripts had shown themselves worthy to vie with the veterans of the army; we had taken four thousand prisoners, and nearly three thousand had been killed or wounded. The victory had been a hard one for us to gain—twelve thousand combatants, at most, having encountered eighteen thousand.

Such was the battle of Montebello, which conferred upon Lannes and his family the title by which they are to this day distinguished: a glorious title, of which his sons have just reason to be proud!

This first encounter was a fine opening of the campaign, and one well calculated to impress M. de Melas with the conviction that the road would not be readily opened to his march. General Ott, weakened by the loss of 7000 men, retired in consternation upon Alessandria. The moral sense of the French army were raised to the highest degree of enthusiasm.

The First Consul hastened to unite his divisions, and to occupy strongly the route from Alessandria to Placentia, which, in all probability, would be attempted by M. de Melas. Lannes having advanced something too far forward, the First Consul made a slight retrograde movement, as far as to the point known by the name of the Stradella, as this defile, being contracted in this place between the heights and the river, presents a more secure position.

The 10th and 11th of June were passed in observing the movements of the Austrians; in concentrating the army; in allowing it time to rest from the fatigue of its rapid marches; and in organizing the artillery in the best manner possible; for until this moment he had not been able to collect on this point more than forty field-pieces.

On the 11th, Desaix, one of the most distinguished generals of the period, arrived at headquarters; who, in point of military talent, was, perhaps, equal to Moreau, Massena, Kleber, and Lannes; but who surpassed them all in certain rare qualities peculiar to himself. He had recently left Egypt, where Kleber had committed certain political blunders, which I shall shortly have the pain of relating. Desaix had attempted in vain to prevent the evil consequence of these false views of his brother in arms, in order to avoid the painful spectacle of which he had returned to Europe. These errors, be it observed, were afterward gloriously repaired. Desaix, having been made prisoner near the shores of France, had been treated in a very unworthy manner by the English. He arrived full of indignation, and demanded an opportunity of avenging himself sword in hand. He loved the First Consul with a warmth that had almost the air of passion; and the First Consul, touched with the affection of a heart so noble, repaid it with the liveliest friendship he ever manifested during his whole life. They passed a whole night together in talking over the events of Egypt and France, and the First Consul gave him, upon the spot, the command of the united divisions of Monnier and Boudet.

On the following day, June 12th, General Bonaparte, surprised at not seeing the Austrians appear, could not help feeling some apprehension. Astonished that, in such a situation, M. de Melas should hesitate, lose time, and allow all the outlets to be closed around him, and measuring his antagonist too closely by himself, he observed, that M. de Melas could not have sacrificed hours so precious, and that he must have escaped him, either by ascending toward Genoa, or by passing the upper Po, in order to force the Tessino. Fatigued with waiting, on the 12th, after mid-day, he quitted his position at the Stradella, and advanced, followed by all his army, as far as the heights of Tortona. He ordered the blockade of that place, and established his head-quarters at Voghera. On the morning of the 13th, he passed the Scrvia, and debouched into the immense plain extending between the Scrivia and the Bormida, which has since been known by no other name than the plain of Marengo. It was on that very spot that, not many months before, his active imagination had pictured to itself the great battle with M. de Melas.

In this place, the Po retreats from the Apennine, and leaves a vast space, across which the Bormida and the Tanaro roll their waters, now become less rapid, till meeting near Alessandria, they flow on together into the bed of the Po. The road, leading along the foot of the Apennine to Tortona, departs from it, abreast of this place, turns to the right, passes the Scrivia, and opens into a vast plain. The stream it crosses at a first village, called San Giuliano, runs forward to a second named Marengo, and at length crosses the Bormida, and terminates at the celebrated fortress of Alessandria. Did the enemy intend to follow the high road from Placentia to Mantua, said General Bonaparte to himself, it is here that he would await me; for here his numerous artillery and his fine cavalry could act to the best advantage, and exert their combined means with the best effect. To strengthen himself still more in his conjectures, General Bonaparte caused the plain to be scoured by his light cavalry, who were unable to discover a single Austrian. Toward the close of the day, he advanced with the corps of General Victor, composed of the divisions of Gardanne and Chambarlhac, as far as to Marengo. At this point they found a detachment, that of Oreilly, who for a moment defended the village of Marengo, but abandoned it immediately, and fell back over the Bormida. An ill-conducted reconnoissance induced the belief that the enemy was not in possession of the bridge of the Bormida.

From all these indications, General Bonaparte doubted no longer. He came to the conclusion that M. de Melas had escaped. He would never have given up the plain, and, above all, the village of Marengo, which formed the entrance to it, had he wished to deliver a battle, and force his way over it from Alessandria to Placentia. Deceived by a conclusion so natural to arrive at, General Bonaparte left General Victor with two divisions at Marengo; placed Lannes in échelon in the plain with Watrin's division, and hastened to his headquarters at Voghera, hoping for news of General Moncey, established on the Tessino, and of General Duhesne, established on the lower Po, and thus to hear what had become of M. de Melas. Staff-officers, from all these points, were appointed to meet him at his headquarters. But the Scrivia had overflowed its banks, and, very fortunately, he was obliged to stop at Torre-di-Garofolo. The news from Tessino and the Po, the news of that very day, announced the most absolute repose. M. de Melas had made no attempt whatever on that side. What could have become of him? . . . General Bonaparte conjectured that he must have ascended by Novi to Genoa, in order to pass by the valley of the Trebbia, and return to Cremona. It would seem, in fact, that not being at Alessandria, and not having proceeded up the Tessino, he could have done no other.

Another supposition was, that, following the example of Wurmser at Mantua, he might have shut himself up in Genoa, where, victualled by the English, his garrison of 50,000 men might have the means of protracting the war. These ideas having taken possession strongly of the First Consul's mind, he ordered Desaix to march upon Rivolta and Novi, with a single division, that of Boudet. For it was by the way of Novi that M. de Melas would necessarily pass, on his way from Alessandria to Genoa.

By a happy presentiment, however, he kept the division of Monnier, which was Desaix's second, in reserve at head-quarters; and, as far as possible, provided against every exigency, by leaving Victor at Marengo with two divisions, Lannes with one in the plain, and Murat at his side with all his cavalry. If the general disposition of the French forces at this moment be taken into account, part of which was spread upon the Tessino, part on the lower Po and the Adda, and part on the route to Genoa, we shall be struck by their wide dispersion. It was a necessary consequence of the situation of affairs, and of the circumstances of the moment, which no foresight could control.

On the evening of the 13th, the eve of one of the most memorable days in history, General Bonaparte slept at the village of Torredì-Garofolo, where he expected to receive news on the morrow.

During this time, Alessandria was a scene of confusion. The Austrian army was reduced to a state of despair. A council of war had been called, and not one of the resolutions, of which the French general was apprehensive, had been adopted. One point of their deliberation was, whether they should retire by the upper Po and the Tessino, or shut themselves up in Genoa; but the Austrian generals, like brave men as they were, preferred obedience to the voice of honour. After all, said they, for eighteen months we have been fighting like good soldiers; we have re-conquered Italy; we are marching upon the frontiers of France, whither our government directs us; yesterday, only, was that order again repeated. It is for that government to give us notice of the danger which threatens our rear. If there be any thing false in our situation, it is upon them that the error must rest; all the means proposed to avoid an encounter with the French army are complicated, difficult, doubtful; there is but one simple and honorable course to pursue, and that is to cut our way through it. To-morrow, we must open ourselves a path, though our blood pay the attempt. If we succeed, victory will regain for us the road to Placentia and Mantua; if not, we shall have done our duty, and the responsibility of any disaster that may befall will rest upon other heads than ours.

The First Consul had not conceived it possible, that, under such circumstances, so much time would be lost in deliberation. But to equal him in the promptitude of his decisions, was the lot of but few men; and M. de Melas was in too painful a position not to claim sympathy and pardon for the cruel perplexities that retarded his definitive resolution. In thus determining to deliver a battle, the Austrian general acted the part of an honourable soldier; but he might be reproached for having left twenty-five thousand men in the strongholds of Coni, Turin, Tortona, Genoa, Acqui, Gavi, and Alessandria, especially after the losses lately experienced by General Ott, at Montebello. With twenty-five thousand men in these places, three thousand in Tuscany, and twelve thousand between Mantua and Venice, there remained with him but forty thousand men at the farthest, to be present on the field of battle, whereby the fortune of the war must be decided. To such a fraction had the fine army of one hundred and twenty thousand men been reduced, which was to close its campaign, by forcing the southern frontiers of France! Forty thousand had fallen, forty thousand more were dispersed, and the last forty thousand men were about to engage in battle in order to escape a catastrophe like that of the Caudine forks; but, with these last there was a powerful cavalry, there were two hundred pieces of artillery.

It was decided that, on the morrow, the whole army should debouche by the bridges of the Bormida, for there were two covered by the same tête-de-pont, contrary to the false accounts returned to General Bonaparte; that General Ott, at the head of ten thousand men, half infantry and half cavalry, should debouche from the Bormida, and bearing to the left, should direct himself upon a village called Castel-Ceriolo; that Generals Haddick and Kaim, at the head of the main body of the army about twenty thousand in number, should carry the village of Marengo, which is at the entrance of the plain, and that General Oreilly with five or six thousand soldiers should take the right, ascending the Bormida. A powerful artillery was destined to support this movement. A considerable detachment, consisting principally of cavalry, was left behind at Alessandria, upon the road to Acqui, to observe the troops of Suchet, of whose arrival they had some vague information.

I have described the large plain of Marengo, traversed in all its extent by the high road from Alessandria to Placentia, and enclosed between the Scrivia and the Bormida. The French, marching from Placentia and the Scrivia, would first come upon San Giuliano, and afterward, at three quarters of a league farther, upon Marengo, which almost touches the Bormida, and forms the principal outlet which the Austrian army had to conquer, in order to issue from Alessandria. Between San Giuliano and Marengo extends, in a right line, the road which was to be disputed; and on each side wide spreads the plain covered with fields of wheat and vineyards. Below Marengo, to the right of the French, and left of the Austrians, lay Castel-Ceriolo, a large borough through which general Ott was intended to pass, in order to turn the corps of General Victor, stationed in Marengo. It was, therefore, upon Marengo that the principal attack of the Austrians would be directed, as this village commanded the entrance of the plain.

At day-break, the Austrian army passed the two bridges of the Bormida. But its movement was slow, because it had but one bridge head, from which to debouche. Oreilly passed first, and encountered the division of Gardanne, which General Victor, after having occupied Marengo, had led forward. This division was formed only of the 101st and 44th demi-brigades. Oreilly, supported by a numerous artillery, and with double the force of his opponent, compelled him to fall back, and shut himself up in Marengo. Fortunately, he did not throw himself into the place after him, but waited till the centre under General Haddick should come to his support. The slowness of their march across the defile formed by the bridges, cost the Austrians two or three hours. At length Generals Haddick and Kaim deployed their forces in the rear of Oreilly, and General Ott passed the same bridges on his way to Castel-Ceriolo.

General Victor immediately combined his two divisions for the defence of Marengo, and sent to acquaint the First Consul that the whole Austrian army was advancing, evidently with the intention to give battle.

An obstacle presented by the ground, favoured the bravery of our soldiers very greatly. In front of Marengo, between the Austrians and the French, lay a deep and muddy stream, called La Fontanone. It flowed between Marengo and the Bormida, and fell a little way below that place into the latter river. Upon his right, that is in the village of Marengo, Victor stationed the 101st and 44th demi-brigades, under General Gardanne; upon the left of the village, the 24th, 43d, and 96th, under General Chambarlhac; and somewhat in the rear of these, General Kellermann with the 20th, 2d, and 8th regiments of cavalry, and a squadron of the 12th. The rest of the 12th regiment was despatched to the upper Bormida, in order to observe the more remote movements of the enemy.

General Haddick advanced upon the stream, under cover of twenty-five pieces of artillery, which thundered on the French. He threw himself bravely into the bed of the Fontanone, at the head of the division of Bellegarde. General Rivaud immediately sallying from the cover of the village, with the 44th and 101st, began to fire on the Austrians as they were attempting to debouche, almost muzzle to muzzle. A terribly fierce struggle followed along the margin of the Fontanone. Haddick returned several times to the charge; but Rivaud, holding his ground sturdily under the Austrian batteries, checked Haddick's corps by the close fire of his musketry, and cast it back in disorder on the other bank. The unfortunate General Haddick received a mortal wound, and his soldiers retired. M. de Melas then caused the troops of General Kaim to advance, and gave orders to Oreilly to follow the Bormida, ascending it to a place named Stortigliona, in order to execute a charge on our left with the cavalry of Pilati. But, at this moment, General Kellermann was on horseback at the head of his division of cavalry, observing the movement of the enemy's squadrons, and Lannes, who had taken ground to the right of Victor, in the plain, had wheeled into line between Marengo and Castel-Ceriolo. The Austrians then made a second effort. The divisions of Gardanne and Chambarlhac, arranged in a half circle around the semi-circular head of the Fontanone, were so placed as to pour a converging fire into the point of attack, and thus ravaged the troops of General Kaim with their musketry. In the meanwhile, General Pilati, making his way up the stream, succeeded in crossing the Fontanone at the head of 2000 horse. The brave Kellermann, who, on this day, added so greatly to the glory he had won at Valmy, dashed upon the squadrons of Pilati, as they were attempting to deploy, sabred many, and drove the rest down headlong into the muddy bed of this inconsiderable water-course, which art itself could not have better traced for the cover of the French position.

At this moment, though our army, which had been taken by surprise, had only the two corps of Victor and Lannes, in line, that is to say, 15,000 or 16,000 men, to oppose to nearly 36,000; still, thanks to the error committed on the previous evening by the Austrians in not occupying Marengo,—an error which was not, however, without its advantages in this respect, that it had been the means of deceiving General Bonaparte—our army, I say, had gained time to let its leader rejoin them, and the reserves, either remaining in the rear, or sent on the route to Novi, to come into position.

Such was the state of things, when M. de Melas, determined to exert every effort to save the honour and liberty of his army, and being perfectly seconded by his soldiery, all veterans, whose hearts the victories of the preceding campaign had tended to elevate, made another advance upon the French line. General Ott, who had taken considerable time to defile, was by this time in a condition to act upon the left of the Austrians. He manœuvred with intent to turn us, passed Castel-Ceriolo, and outflanked Lannes, who, placed at the side of Victor, between Marengo and Castel-Ceriolo, formed the right of our line. While the column of General Ott engaged the attention of Lannes, the corps of Oreilly, Haddick, and Kaim, having rallied, were directed anew upon the Fontanone, in front of Marengo. All their movements were supported by a formidable artillery. The grenadiers of Latterman dashed into the stream, crossed it, and scaled the opposite bank; the division of Chambarlhac, stationed to the left of Marengo, and on the flanks of the Austrian grenadiers, pouring upon them a destructive fire. In spite of this, a battalion of these grenadiers succeeded in establishing themselves beyond the Fontanone. M. de Melas redoubled his cannonade upon the division of Chambarlhac, which was not covered by the houses of the village, as that was which defended Marengo. In the mean time the Austrian pioneers had constructed, in haste, a trestle bridge. The brave Rivaud, at the head of the 44th, then sallied from the village of Marengo, and marching upon his assailants, would, in spite of their grape-shot, have driven them into the Fontanone; but the 44th, already exhausted by the obstinate strife, was arrested by the frightful discharges of artillery, and Rivaud himself was wounded. Seizing this moment, Latterman's grenadiers advanced à masse, and penetrated Marengo. Though co vered with blood, Rivaud again placed himself at the head of the 44th, made a vigorous charge upon the grenadiers, and drove them out of Marengo; but being received on advancing beyond the cover of the houses, by a smashing fire of artillery, he could not bear them back across the stream, which had till now afforded so important a protection to our army. Weakened at length by the blood which he had lost, and supporting himself with difficulty, this valiant officer was obliged to allow himself to be carried off the field of battle. The Austrian grenadiers therefore established themselves in the position which they had conquered. At the same instant, the division of Chambarlhac, which, as we have said, was protected by no cover, but stood exposed to the enemy's grape-shot, was almost annihilated. General Oreilly repulsed the 96th, placed on our extreme left, and thence began to out-flank us. On the right, Lannes, who having at first to do only with the corps of General Kaim, was on the point of driving him into the bed of the Fontanone, found himself suddenly turned by General Ott, who was debouching from Castel-Ceriolo, with all his numerous cavalry. Champeaux's brigade of cavalry, stationed in the rear of Lannes's corps, as Kellermann's was in the rear of Victor's, made several brilliant charges, but to no purpose; and the unfortunate Champeaux himself received a mortal wound. Our army, out-flanked on the two wings, and driven from the point of Marengo, to which it had clung so stubbornly at first, had now no farther means of sustaining itself. It was in danger of being forced back into the plain behind it, where there was nothing to cover it against 200 pieces of artillery, and a stupendous cavalry.

It was ten o'clock in the morning. The carnage had been horrible. An immense mass of wounded encumbered the road between Marengo and San-Giuliano. Already a part of Victor's troops, overwhelmed by numbers, were retreating in disorder, crying that all was lost. In effect, all would have been lost, had not a reinforcement of fresh troops come to the rescue; and above all, a great leader, capable of grasping still the victory which was escaping from our hands.

General Bonaparte, informed that the Austrian army, the escape of which from his hands he had been deploring, had, on the contrary, surprised him on that very plain of Marengo, which the evening before had appeared so deserted, made all speed from Torre-di-Garofolo, thanking his happy stars for the overflow of the Scrivia, which had prevented him from going to pass the night at Voghera. He brought with him the Consular Guard, a troop small in number, but of matchless valour, which afterwards was known as the Imperial Guard; he brought with him Monnier's division, composed of three excellent demi-brigades, and ordered a reserve of two regiments of cavalry to follow him at a short distance; to conclude, he sent Desaix orders to march with all speed upon San-Giuliano.

The First Consul, at the head of his reserves, came at full gallop to the field of battle. He found Lannes out-flanked by the infantry and cavalry of General Ott, yet struggling, on the left, to hold to Marengo; Gardanne still defending himself amid the hedges of that village, the object of so desperate a struggle, and, on the other side, the division of Chambarlhac, mowed down by the Austrian artillery, and scattering itself before its fire.

At this aspect of things, a single glance of his experienced eye was sufficient to show him what was necessary to be done, to set things right again. The mutilated left was really routed; but the right was merely menaced, and still maintained itself; it was to the latter that his succours must be carried. By fixing it solidly at Castel-Ceriolo, he would have a point-d'appui in the midst of this vast plain; he might execute a pivot movement upon this wing, thus reinforced, and withdraw his battered left into the rear, and so save it from the enemy. Even if he were to lose by this movement the high road from Marengo to San-Giuliano, the evil would be reparable; for in the rear of his new position ran another road, leading to Salé, and from Salé to the banks of the Po. This line of retreat toward Pavia would, therefore, remain sure. Moreover, when in a position to the right of the plain, he would be on the flank of the Austrians, who must engage upon the high road from Marengo to San-Giuliano, if they would turn their victory to account.

These reflections, made with the rapidity of lightning, General Bonaparte at once proceeded to the execution of the plan he had conceived. He thrust forward into the plain the eight hundred grenadiers of the Consular Guard, ordering them to hold the Austrian cavalry in check until the arrival of the three demi-brigades of Monnier. These brave men, forming themselves into a square, received with admirable coolness the charges of the dragoons of Lobkowitz, and remained unshaken under the repeated assaults of a host of cavalry. Somewhat to their right, General Bonaparte ordered two demi-brigades of Monnier's, which came up at the moment, to direct themselves upon Castel-Ceriolo. These two demi-brigades, the 70th and 19th, led on by General Carra-Saint-Cyr, marched forward, sometimes throwing themselves into squares to arrest the cavalry, sometimes rushing in columns of attack to break the infantry, and succeeded in reconquering the lost ground, and effecting a lodgment among the hedges and gardens of Castel-Ceriolo. At the same instant General Bonaparte, at the head of the 72d, came to succour the left of Lannes, while Dupont, chief of the staff, rallied far in the rear the scattered remains of Victor's corps, pursued by the horse of Oreilly, but protected by Murat by the cavalry of reserve. The presence of the First Consul, and the sight of the bears in caps of the mounted guard, sufficed to reanimate the troops. The battle was renewed with fresh fury. The brave Watrin, of Lannes's corps, with the 6th of the line and the 22d, drove back Kaim's soldiers at the bayonet's point into the Fontanone. Lannes, inspiring the 40th and 28th with the fire of his own heroic spirit, launched them one after the other upon the Austrians.

In every part of this immense plain the battle raged with desperate fierceness. Gardanne essayed to regain Marengo; Lannes struggled to recover the stream which had before served as so important a cover to our troops, while the grenadiers of the Consular Guard, always in square, like a living citadel in the midst of this battle-field, filled the void between Lannes and the columns of Carra-Saint-Cyr, which were already entering the first houses of Castel-Ceriolo. But the Baron de Melas, with all the courage of despair, leading his combined masses against Marengo, at length issued from the village, driving before him the exhausted troops of Gardanne, who still clung in vain to every obstacle of the ground. Oreilly completed the destruction of Chambarlhac's division, which still remained uncovered under the fire of grape from his terrible artillery.

It was no longer possible to hold the ground; it was imperatively necessary to fall back. General Bonaparte ordered a slow retreat, still keeping a firm face to the enemy. But while his left, deprived of Marengo, and now without cover or defence, was rapidly recoiling upon San-Giuliano, where it hoped to find shelter, he still continued to cling to the right of the plain, and to defend himself slowly, thanks to the position of Castel-Ceriolo, thanks to the energy of the Consular Guard, and, above all, thanks to Lannes, whose efforts were prodigious. So long as he should maintain the right, the First Consul preserved a sure line of retreat by Salé toward the banks of the Po; and still, if Desaix, who, on the previous evening, had been directed upon Novi, should come up in time, he might reconquer the field, and bring the victory to his side.

It was at this moment that Lannes and his four demi-brigades made efforts which deserve the admiration of posterity. The enemy, who had debouched en masse from Marengo on the plain, pouring on him from eighty pieces of artillery a storm of round and grape; Lannes, at the head of his four demi-brigades, protracted his retreating combat, over three-quarters of a league, for two whole hours. For when the enemy came on in force, and pressed him too hard, he stopped, and charged with the bayonet. Though his artillery was dismounted, some light pieces, drawn by the best horses, and manœuvred with no less ability than daring, came to assist the demi-brigades, which were pressed too closely, and even ventured to place themselves in battery before the Austrians. The Consular Guard, on which no impression could be made by charges of cavalry, was now attacked with cannon. They strove to break it, as if it were a wall, and then launched upon it the cavalry of Frimont. It suffered fearful loss, it recoiled, but they could not break it. Carra-Saint-Cyr also gave way, and lost Castel-Ceriolo, maintaining still, however, a last hold among the vines in the rear of the village. We still kept possession of the road from Castel-Ceriolo to Salé. In every direction the plain displayed one vast field of carnage, whereon, to the blaze of artillery furious explosions were now added, for Lannes blew up the caissons which he could not bring off.

Half the day passed away, and at length M. de Melas imagined that he held in his hands the victory which he had bought so dear. This veteran, who, by his courage at least, had shown himself worthy of his opponent on this memorable day, returned to Alessandria exhausted with fatigue. He left the command in the hands of M. de Zach, the chief officer of his staff, and sent off couriers to all Europe, announcing his victory, and the defeat of General Bonaparte at Marengo. The chief of his staff, being thus charged with the command, formed the main body of the Austrian army into columns of march, on the high road from Marengo to San-Giuliano. He placed at the head two regiments of infantry, Latterman's column of grenadiers came next, and after these the baggage. To the left, he disposed General Oreilly; to the right, Generals Kaim and Haddick; and, in this order, he resolved on forcing the high road to Placentia, the great object of so many efforts, and the salvation of the Austrian army.

It was now three o'clock. Had no new circumstance arisen, the battle must be regarded as lost by the French; although, indeed, on the morrow, the evil of to-day might be perhaps repaired by the troops on the return from the Tessino, and the Adda, to the Po. Desaix, however, still remained with Boudet's division, as yet whole and uninjured; will he arrive in time! Such is the circumstance on which depends the fate of the battle. The aides-de-camp of the First Consul had galloped off in search of him, right early in the morning. But, long before they reached him, Desaix, at the first cannon-shot that was fired on the plain of Marengo, halted to listen. On hearing that remote cannon-shot, he judged that the enemy, whom he was on his way to seek at Novi, on the route to Genoa, was even at Marengo. He instantly despatched Savary with a few hundred horses to Novi, to see what was passing there, and put himself with his division in observation, still listening to the cannon of the Austrians and French, which boomed incessantly from the direction of the Bormida. Savary having found no one about Novi, Desaix was confirmed in his happy judgment, and, without farther hesitation, marched on Marengo, sending several aides-de-camp before him, to announce his approach to the First Consul. The whole day long he marched, and, at three o'clock, the head of his column began to appear on the verge of the plain, in the neighbourhood of San-Giuliano. Outstripping them all, at full gallop, he came into the presence of the First Consul. Oh! happy inspiration in a lieutenant, no less intelligent than he was devoted! Oh! happy fortune which belongs to youth! If, after fifteen years had flown, the First Consul, so well seconded on that day by his generals, had found a Desaix on the field of Waterloo, he would have saved his empire, and France her dominant position among the powers of Europe!

The presence of Desaix was destined to change the whole face of affairs. He was surrounded by his friends—informed of all of the events of the day. The generals drew in circle about him and the First Consul, and eagerly discussed their serious situation. Most were in favour of a retreat. The First Consul demurred; eagerly asked Desaix's opinion. Desaix cast his eye over the devastation of the battle-field, and then, taking out his watch and looking at the hour, answered General Bonaparte, in these simple, yet lofty words: "Yes, the battle is lost; but it is only three o'clock. There is yet time to gain another." Delighted with the answer of Desaix, General Bonaparte at once prepared to avail himself of the resources brought by this officer, and of the advantages assured him by the position which he had taken up since the morning. In fact, he was now on the right of the plain, while his enemy was on the left, in column of march upon the high road leading to San-Giuliano. Desaix coming up by the way of San-Giuliano with 6000 fresh troops, and confronting the Austrians, might hold them in check, while the main body of the army should rally and throw itself on their flank. On the spot, and without a moment's loss of time, dispositions were made accordingly.

Desaix's three demi-brigades were formed in front of San-Giuliano, a little way to the right of the main road. The 30th deployed in line, the 9th and 59th in close column, on the wings of the former. A slight undulation of ground concealed them from the enemy. On the right, rallying and somewhat recovered, were the shattered relics of Chambarlhac's and Gardanne's divisions under General Victor. To their right, in the plain, Lannes, whose retreat had been stopped; next to him the Consular Guard, and next again to that Carra-Saint-Cyr, who had maintained himself as near as possible to Castel-Ceriolio. In this position the army formed a long oblique line, from San-Giuliano to Castel-Ceriolio. In an interval between Desaix and Lannes, but somewhat more in the rear, was stationed Kellermann, with his cavalry. A battery of twelve pieces, the sole remains of the whole artillery of the army, was spread out in front of Desaix's line.

These dispositions made, the First Consul passed on horseback along the lines of his soldiers, speaking to several corps. "My friends," said he to them, "you have retreated far enough: recollect that I am in the habit of sleeping on the field of battle." After having re-animated his troops, who were reassured by the arrival of their reserves, and burning to avenge the events of the morning, he gave the signal. The charge was beaten along the whole length of the lines.

The Austrians, who were rather in order of march than of battle, kept the high road. The column directed by M. de Zach came first; a little behind it came the centre, half deployed on the plain and facing Lannes. General Marmont suddenly unmasked his twelve pieces of cannon. A heavy discharge of grape-shot fell upon the head of the column, which was completely taken by surprise, and suspecting nothing less than farther resistance, for they thought the French decidedly on their retreat. They had not yet recovered from their surprise, ben Desaix put the 9th light infantry in movement. "Go and inform the First Consul," said he to his aid-de-camp, Savary, "that I am charging, and that I must be supported by the cavalry." Desaix, on horseback, charged in person, at the head of this demi-brigade. He led it over the slight inequality of ground which concealed him from the view of the Austrians, and made them aware of his presence by a discharge of musketry at point blank distance. The Austrians poured in an answering volley; and Desaix fell on the instant, pierced by a bullet in the breast. "Conceal my death," said he to General Boudet, who was his chief of division, for it might, he thought, produce a panic among his men. Useless precaution of the young hero. He was seen to fall, and his soldiers, like those of Turenne, clamorously demanded to be led forward to avenge the death of their leader. The 9th light infantry, which on that day gained for itself the title of "The Incomparable," a distinction which it bore to the conclusion of the war; the 9th light infantry, after pouring its fire upon the enemy, formed in column, and fell upon the deep mass of the Austrians. At the sight, the two first regiments that led the march, surprised and confounded, fell back in disorder upon the second line, and disappeared amidst its ranks. Lattermann's column of grenadiers were now at the head, and received the shock as chosen troops might be expected to receive it. They were firm. The struggle extended to the two sides of the main road. The 9th light infantry was supported to the right by Victor's troops, which had rallied; to the left, by the 30th and 59th demi-brigades of Boudet's division, which followed the movement. Lattermann's grenadiers were defending themselves stoutly, though hard pressed, when suddenly a storm burst on their heads. General Kellermann, who, at the instance of Desaix, had received orders to charge, set off at full gallop, and passing between Lannes and Desaix, placed part of his squadron en poënce to make head against the Austrian cavalry, whom he saw before him, and then, with the remainder, threw himself on the flank of the column of grenadiers, already assailed in front by Boudet's infantry. By this charge, which was executed with extraordinary vigour, the column was cut in two. Kellermann's dragons sabred it to the right and left, till, pressed on every side, the unfortunate grenadiers threw down their arms. Two thousand of them surrendered themselves prisoners. At their head, General Zach himself was compelled to give up his sword, and in this manner the Austrians were deprived of any leader until the battle ended. For, as we have seen, M. de Melas, thinking himself secure of the victory, had returned to Alessandria. But Kellermann did not stop here, he dashed on the dragoons of Lichtenstein and broke them! These recoiled in disorder on the centre of the Austrians, as it was forming in the plain, in front of Lannes, and there caused some confusion. At this moment Lannes advanced, pressed vigorously on the Austrians' centre, which was shaken, while the grenadiers of the Consular Guard and of Carra Saint-Cyr again bore down upon Castel-Ceriolio, from which they were not far distant. Along the whole line from San-Giuliano to Castel-Ceriolo, the French had now resumed the offensive; they marched forward, drunk with joy and enthusiasm, at seeing the victory again returning to their hands. Surprise and discouragement had passed to the side of the Austrians.

Admirable power of the human will, obstinate to the last, and resolute to win back fortune by endurance! From San-Giuliano to Castel-Ceriolo, that oblique line of the French advanced at charging pace, pushing the Austrians back before them, who were now all amazed at being forced to fight a second battle. Carra-Saint-Cyr soon regained the village of Castel-Ceriolo, and General Ott, who had at first advanced beyond this village, fearful of being out-flanked, bethought him of retrograding ere he should lose his communication. The panic communicated itself to his cavalry; they set off at full gallop, crying, "to the bridges, to the bridges!" The struggle became, then, who should first reach the bridges of the Bormida. General Ott, re-passing Castel-Ceriolo, with the troops of Vogelsang, was obliged to cut his way through the French. He succeeded, and hastily regained the banks of the Bormida, into which his soldiers plunged headlong.

Generals Kaim and Haddick strove in vain to keep the centre together; Jannes gave them no opportunity to do so; he drove them back into Marengo, thence into the Fontanone, and from the Fontanone into the Bormida. But the grenadiers of Weidenfeld made head for a moment, to give Oreilly, who had advanced as far as Cassina-Grossa, the time to retrace his steps. The Austrian cavalry too, on its side, attempted a charge or two, to arrest the march of the French. But it was checked by the mounted grenadiers of the Consular Guard, led on by Bessières and young Beauharnais. At last, Lannes and Victor, with their united corps, threw themselves upon Marengo, and drove before them Oreilly and the grenadiers of Weidenfeld. The confusion on the bridges of Bormida thickened at every moment. Horse, foot, artillery, crowded to that point, and all was confusion and disorder. The bridges were insufficient to receive the press, and numbers precipitated themselves into the stream. A driver of artillery tried to cross with the piece of artillery which he had in charge, and succeeded in the attempt. The whole artillery hastened to follow his example, but a part of the wagons stuck fast in the river's bed. The French, ardent in pursuit, captured men, horses, cannon and baggage. The unfortunate Baron de Melas, who, scarce two hours before, had left his army victorious, hastened back at the noise of this disaster, and scarcely could believe his eyes. He was in despair.

Such was the bloody battle of Marengo, which, as we shall shortly have opportunity to see, produced a vast influence on the destinies of France and of the world at large. In fact, for the moment, it gave a peace to the republic, and, somewhat later, an empire to the First Consul. It was contested savagely, and was well worth the price it cost; for never was there a more serious issue to two combatants. M. de Melas fought to avoid a shameful capitulation; and General Bonaparte staked his whole fortune on the day. The loss, considering the number of combatants, was immense, and out of all proportion. The Austrians lost about 8000 men, in killed and wounded, and upwards of 4000 prisoners. Their staff was almost decimated, General Haddick being killed, and Generals Vogelsang, Lattermann, Bellegarde, Lamarsaille and Golllesheim, wounded; together with a great many of their officers. Altogether, with men hors de combat or taken, they lost one-third of their whole army, estimating it, as it has usually been, at 36 or 40,000 men. As for the French, they had 6000 killed or wounded, which, with 1000 prisoners left in the hands of the enemy, makes their loss one-fourth, from 28,000 soldiers, present on that day under arms. Their staff also was not less severely treated than that of the Austrians. Generals Mainony, Rivaud, Malher, and Champeaux, were wounded, the last mortally. But the heaviest loss was the death of Desaix; during ten years of war, France had endured none greater. So sensibly was it felt by the First Consul, as to annul in his breast all joy for the victory. His secretary, M. de Bourrienne, hastening to congratulate him upon this triumph, little less than miraculous, exclaimed, "What a glorious day!"—"Yes," replied the First Consul, "very glorious—could I, this evening, have embraced Desaix on the field of battle." "I was going," said he, "to make him minister of war; I would have made him a prince, had I been able." The conqueror of Marengo little dreamed that the day would come, when crowns would be his to bestow upon those who served him. The unfortunate Desaix was lying near San-Giuliano, in the midst of this vast field of carnage. His aid-de-camp, Savary, who had long been attached to him, sought for his body through the piles of dead, and recognised him by his long and flowing hair; he gathered his remains with pious care, covered them with a hussar's mantle, and, placing them on his horse, bore them to the head-quarters of Torre-di-Garofolo.

Though the plain of Marengo ran deep with French blood, joy reigned throughout the army. Soldiers and generals, privates and officers, all felt conscious of their meritorious conduct, and appreciated the immense importance of a victory gained over the last of the enemy. The Austrians, on the contrary, were filled with dismay. They knew themselves surrounded, and reduced to the law of the conqueror's will. The Baron de Melas, who, on this eventful day, had two horses killed under him, and, in spite of his great age, had shown all the spirit and vigour of youth, vieing with the most daring under his command, was plunged into the deepest sorrow. He had returned to Alessandria to take some slight repose, in the persuasion that the field was won. He now beheld his army half destroyed, flying in all directions, abandoning their artillery to the French, or plunging it into the marshes of the Bormida. To crown his misfortune, Zach. the head of his staff, and who enjoyed all his confidence, was at this moment a prisoner in the hands of the French. In vain did he turn his eyes upon his generals; not one would speak a word of counsel to him; all cursed the cabinet of Vienna, which had deceived them with such fatal illusions, and led them on to the brink of the abyss into which they had fallen. And still, some measure must be taken: What! . . . Fight to win a passage through the foe? They had done so, and failed. Retreat upon Genoa, or make for the upper Po, to force the Tessino!—But these plans, difficult before the battle, were impossible now, that it had been fought and lost. General Suchet was but a league in the rear, with the army of Liguria, in the neighbourhood of Acqui; General Bonaparte was before Alessandria, with the victorious army of reserve; these would now form a junction, and cut off the retreat to Genoa. General Mancey, who, with the detachment from Germany, was guarding the Tessino, might be reinforced by General Bonaparte in as short a space as it would take to march toward him. No chance, therefore, appeared on any side, and it was necessary to come to the cruel conclusion of capitulation. Happy if, by abandoning Italy, the liberty of the Austrian army could be saved, and if from the generosity of the conqueror, the boon could be obtained, that it should not be made prisoners of war! It was determined, therefore, to send a flag of truce to General Bonaparte, with a view to open negotiations. The Prince of Lichtenstein was chosen for the purpose, and on the following morning, the 15th of June—26th of Prairial—he was instructed to proceed to the head-quarters of the French general.

The First Consul, on his side, had many reasons for treating. His principal object had been obtained, for Italy had been delivered in a single day. After the victory he had gained, whereby the Austrians were completely surrounded, he was certain of obtaining the evacuation of Italy; he could have done more; he could have exacted that the vanquished should lay down their arms, and acknowledge themselves prisoners. But by galling the honour of these brave men too closely, they might, perhaps, be impelled to an act of desperation. It would have been to spill useless blood; it would have been to lose so much time. Having been absent from Paris for more than a month, it was important that he should return thither as speedily as possible. We had a prisoner, who might prove a very important intermediary, and that was M. de Zach. The First Consul opened his mind to him, expressed, in his presence, his sincere desire for peace, his disposition to respect the feelings of the imperial army, and to grant it the most honourable conditions. The Austrian flag of truce having, in the meanwhile, arrived, he manifested, in the presence of this envoy, the same disposition as to M. de Zach, and requested both of them to repair, with Berthier, to M. de Melas, to settle the base of a capitulation. According to his custom on all occasions of this kind, he stated, irrevocably, the conditions on which he had already determined, declaring that no future parley should lead him to modify them. He then consented not to require that the Austrian army should be declared prisoners; he was perfectly willing to let them march past with the honours of war; but he absolutely required that all the strongholds of Liguria, Piedmont, and Lombardy, should be immediately restored to France, and that the Austrians should evacuate the whole of Italy, as far as the Mincio. The negotiators set forth immediately for the Austrian head-quarters.

The conditions which they brought, though rigorous, were not harder than naturally might have been expected; nay, more, they might be termed generous. One only was painful, almost humiliating; and that was the surrender of Genoa, after so much blood had been shed, and after but a few days' occupation. But it was clear that they were terms from which the conqueror would not depart. M. de Melas, however, sent his principal negotiator to the First Consul, in order to raise some questions in relation to the proposed armistice. "Monsieur," said the First Consul, addressing him with some warmth, "my conditions are irrevocable. I did not begin to make war yesterday; your position is as perfectly comprehended by me, as by yourselves. You are in Alessandria, encumbered with dead, sick, and wounded, destitute of provisions, deprived of the élite of your army, surrounded on every side. I might exact every thing; but I respect the white hairs of your general, and the valour of your soldiers, and I ask nothing but what is rigorously justified by the present position of affairs. Return to Alessandria; take what steps you may, you will have no other conditions."

The convention was signed at Alessandria, on the 15th of June, according to the base laid down by General Bonaparte. It was agreed, in the first place, that there should be a suspension of arms in Italy, until such time as an answer should be received from Vienna. Should the convention be accepted, the Austrians were free to retire, with the honours of war, beyond the line of the Mincio. They bound themselves, in withdrawing, to restore to the French all the strongholds which they occupied. The castles of Tortona, Alessandria, Milan, Arona, and Placentia, were to be surrendered between the 16th and 20th of June—27th Prairial, and 1st of Messidor—the castles of Ceva and Savona, the strongholds of Coni and Genoa, between the 16th and the 24th, and the fort of Urbia, on the 26th of June. The Austrian army was to be divided into three columns, which were to withdraw one after the other, and proportionally to the delivery of the strongholds. The immense military stores accumulated by M. de Melas, in Italy, were to be divided into two parts; the artillery of the Italian foundries was granted to the French army; the artillery of the Austrian foundries to the imperial army. The Imperialists, after having evacuated Lombardy as far as the Mincio, were to fall back behind the following line:—the Mincio, La Fossa, Maestra, the left bank of the Po, from Borgo-Forte to the mouth of that river, on the Adriatic. Peschiera and Mantua were to remain in possession of the Austrian army. It was stated, without explanation that the detachment of this army, then actually in Tuscany, should continue to occupy that province. There could be no allusion made, in this capitulation, to the States of the Pope, or those of the King of Naples, because these potentates were strangers to the affairs of upper Italy. Should this convention not receive the emperor's ratification, ten days' notice was to be given of the resumption of hostilities. In the mean time, no detachment on the one side or the other should be sent into Germany.

Such was the substance of the celebrated convention of Alessandria, which in a single day procured for France the restitution of all upper Italy, and which led in the end to the restitution of all Italy. M. de Melas has since been much reproached, and much too severely, in regard to this campaign and convention. Men should be just toward misfortune, especially when that misfortune has been brought upon a man by his adherence to the laws of honour and integrity. M. de Melas was deceived in respect to the existence of any army of reserve, by the cabinet of Vienna, which never ceased to keep him labouring under the most unfortunate illusions. Once undeceived, he may be reproached fairly that he did not concentrate his forces quickly, or completely, as he might have done, and that he left too many men in his garrisons. It was not, in fact, behind the walls of these, but on the battle-field of Marengo, that he should have guarded the strongholds. This error once admitted, it must be acknowledged that M. de Melas, when surrounded, acted as brave men act,—that is to say, he strove to make his way with his sword. He did all that a brave man could, and he was conquered. After this there was but one thing to do, by which to save the liberty of his army, for Italy was irrecoverably lost to him. He could obtain no more than he obtained; he might, indeed, had the conqueror so wished, have undergone still greater humiliations. And the conqueror himself acted wisely in exacting no more. For by endeavouring to humiliate these gallant men, he would have run the risk of driving them to extremities, and of losing moments very precious to him. For at that time his presence was indispensable in Paris. While, therefore, we pity M. de Melas, let us admire, as we ought, the conduct of the conqueror, who was indebted for the vast results of this campaign, not to chance, but to combinations, deep in themselves, and marvellously executed.

Some detractors have sought to attribute to General Kellermann the gaining of the battle of Marengo, and consequently all the results which this memorable day brought in its train. But, if General Bonaparte is to be despoiled of the glory of that day, why not attribute it to that noble victim of the happiest inspiration, to that Desaix, who, divining the orders of his chief before he had received them, brought him the twofold offering of the victory and of his life? Why not attribute it again to that intrepid defender of Genoa, who, by detaining the Austrians on the Apennines gave General Bonaparte time to descend from the Alps, and handed them over to him already half-defeated? So speaking, Generals Kellermann, Desaix, Massena, could all be the true conquerors of Marengo! all except General Bonaparte! But in this world, it is by the voice of the people that glory is decreed; and it was by the voice of the people that he was proclaimed conqueror of Marengo, who, discovering by the glance of genius, what advantage might be taken of the upper Alps to burst down upon the Austrian rear, had, during three whole months, deceived their vigilance; who had brought into existence an army, which had before no being who had astounded Europe by the miracle of that creation; who had crossed the Saint Bernard without any beaten road; who had swooped suddenly upon the midst of startled Italy; who had surrounded his unfortunate adversary with unequalled art; who had, to sum the whole, delivered a decisive battle, which, if lost in the morning, was gloriously recovered in the evening. And certainly, had it not been won that night, it would have been won on the ensuing morning; for, independent of the 6000 men of Desaix's division, the 10,000 men from the Tessino, and the 10,000 posted on the lower Po, presented infallible means for the destruction of the enemy's army. Let us suppose a case. Let us suppose that the Austrians, conquerors on the 14th of June, had entangled themselves in the gorge of the Stradella, that they had found at Piacentia Generals Duhesme and Loison, with 10,000 men, to dispute the pass of the Po, with General Bonaparte in their rear, reinforced by Generals Desaix and Moncey—what would these Austrians have done in this narrow gorge, blocked by a well-defended river, pursued by a superior army? They would but have experienced a disaster, more serious than that on the plains of the Bormida. The true conqueror of Marengo, therefore, is he who mastered fortune by a series of combinations, admirable for their depth and power, unequalled in the history of mightiest captains.

What shall we say, then, more? He was well served by his lieutenants. Nor is it needful to detract from any glory to make his shine the brighter. Massena, by his heroic defence of Genoa; Desaix, by his most fortunate determination; Lannes, by his matchless firmness on the plain of Marengo; Kellermann, by his admirable charge of cavalry—all contributed to secure his triumph. He recompensed them all in the most striking manner; as for Desaix, he embalmed his fate with the most honourable regrets. The First Consul ordered the most magnificent honours to be done to the man who had performed for France services so important; he took every care of his military family, placing his two aides-de-camp near his own person, who were left without employment by the death of their master: these were the Colonels Rapp and Savary.

Before quitting the battle-field of Marengo,

¹ He did not recompense Kellermann. No other officer of his distinction but was made Maréchal of France; which he never was. It has been always stated, heretofore, that after Desaix's fall, Zach's men were rallied, and assumed the offensive, and that the French foot were again in disorder, when Kellermann charged, without orders and retrieved the fight.

the First Consul determined to write a second letter to the Emperor of Germany. Although the former had received no other than an indirect answer, addressed through M. de Thugut to M. de Talleyrand, he thought that victory permitted him to renew demands already repulsed. At this moment, he most ardently desired peace; he thought that his true part was now to bring about a pacification with the foreign foes, as he had already done with the domestic enemies of France, and that this task, well accomplished, would render his growing authority far more legitimate than new victories. Being susceptible, moreover, of the strongest emotions, he had been singularly affected by the sight of this plain of Marengo, on which was lying a fourth part of the two armies. Under the influence of these feelings, he wrote rather a singular letter to the emperor. "It is on the field of battle," said he to him, "amid the sufferings of a multitude of wounded, and surrounded by 15,000 corpses, that I beseech your majesty to listen to the voice of humanity, and not to suffer two brave nations to cut each other's throats for interests not their own. It is my part to press this on your majesty, being upon the very theatre of war. Your majesty's heart cannot feel it so keenly as does mine."

The letter was long. In it the First Consul discussed, with his peculiar eloquence, and in language far different from that of diplomacy, the motives which France and Austria might still have to remain armed against each other. Is it for religion that you fight? said he to him. Then make war on the Russians and the English, who are the enemies of your faith, and be not their ally! Do you wish to guard against revolutionary principles? It is war, that has extended them over one half the continent, by extending the conquests of France; nor can it fail to diffuse them farther. Is it for the balance of Europe? The English menace this balance far more than we do; for they have become the masters and the tyrants of commerce, and are beyond the reach of resistance; while Europe will always be able to restrain France, should she seriously endanger the independence of other nations—reasoning unfortunately very true, and which fifteen years of war have but too clearly justified. Is it, added the diplomatic warrior, is it for the integrity of the German empire? But your majesty has yourself ceded to us Mayence and the German states, on the left bank of the Rhine. Moreover, the empire anxiously implores you to grant her peace. Lastly, is it for the interests of the house of Austria? Nothing can be more natural, if it be so. Let us then execute the treaty of Campo Formio, which secures to your majesty large indemnities in compensation for the provinces lost in the Netherlands, and secures them to you where you most wish to obtain them; that is, in Italy. Your majesty may send the negotiators whither you will, and we will add to the treaty of Campo Formio stipulations, calculated to assure you of the continued existence of the secondary states, all of which the French republic is accused of having shaken. The First Consul here alluded to Holland, Switzerland, Piedmont, the Roman States, Tuscany, and Naples, which the Directory had excited into revolution. Upon these conditions, he continued, peace is made, if you will. Let us make the armistice general for all the armies, and enter into negotiations instantly.

M. de Saint-Julien, one of the generals who had the confidence of the emperor, was directed to carry this letter to Vienna, together with the treaty of Alessandria.

A few days after this, when he had recovered a little from his first impressions, the First Consul felt some regret, such as he had often experienced before, when he happened to write an important document, upon the first impulse, without consulting minds colder than his own. Giving an account of this step to the Consuls, he told them; I have despatched a courier with a letter to the emperor, which the minister of foreign affairs will communicate to you. You will think it somewhat original, but it was written on the field of battle, 22d of June.

After having bid adieu to his army, he set out for Milan, on the morning of the 17th of June—28 of Prairial—three days after the battle of Marengo. He was expected there with the most lively impatience, and arrived in the evening after it was dark. The population, informed of his arrival, came out into the streets to see him pass. They uttered cries of joy, and threw flowers into his carriage. The town was illuminated with that brilliant display, which the Italians alone know how to give their festivals. The Lombards, who for ten or twelve months had borne the Austrian yoke, rendered still more galling by the war, and the violence of circumstances, trembled at the idea of being replaced under their insupportable authority. During the many hazards of this short campaign, they had received reports the most contradictory, endured anxieties the most cruel, and were now delighted to see their deliverance finally insured. General Bonaparte immediately proclaimed the re-establishment of the Cisalpine republic, and hastened to put the affairs of Italy, the face of which his last victory had completely changed, into something like order.

I have already said, that the war undertaken by the formidable coalition of the Russians, English, and Austrians, for the purpose of restoring the princes dethroned by the pretended invasions of the Directory, had not yet restored one to their former situation. The King of Piedmont was at Rome, the Grand-duke of Tuscany in Austria: the pope had died at Valencia, and his provinces were invaded by the Neapolitans. The royal family of Naples only were in their own dominions, which were given up entirely to the English, and undergoing the most sanguinary struggles. The Queen of Naples, the Chevalier Acton, and Lord Nelson, permitted, if they did not order, the most abominable cruelties. The victory of the French republic was to change all this: humanity had as much interest in it as ponies.

The First Consul instituted a provisional government at Milan, until there should be time to reorganize the Cisalpine republic, and define her frontiers, which would only be possible after the peace. He did not consider that he, any more than Austria, was under obligations to the King of Piedmont, and consequently did not hurry himself to re-establish him in his dominions. There also he substituted a provisional government, and appointed General Jourdan commissioner, with orders how to direct it. The First Consul had long since desired to employ, and separate from his enemies, this upright and wise man, who was not calculated for a ruler of the anarchists in France. Piedmont was thus kept in reserve, with a view of disposing of it for the benefit of the French republic, at the conclusion of a peace; or as a gage of reconciliation with Europe, in the re-establishment of the secondary states, which had been destroyed under the Directory. Tuscany would remain occupied by an Austrian corps. The First Consul was on the watch, ready to interfere at a moment's notice, if the English should enter it, or if men should be raised there any farther to act against France. He neither spoke, nor did, any thing as regarded Naples; waiting for the consequences of his victory on the mind of this court. The Queen of Naples, now much alarmed, was already preparing to go to Vienna, to demand the support of Austria, and yet more that of Russia.

The court of Rome remained; here the temporal interests became entangled with spiritual interests of the gravest nature. Pius VI., as we have seen, had lately died in France, a prisoner to the Directory. The First Consul, faithful to his policy, had given orders for funereal honours to be paid him. A conclave had assembled at Venice, and with much difficulty obtained permission from the Austrian cabinet to name a successor to the deceased pope. This conclave was composed of thirty-five cardinals; its secretary was a prelate, Monsignor Consalvi, a Roman priest, young, ambitious, remarkable for the pliability, penetration, and agreeable qualities of his mind, and lately mingled with all the great affairs of the age. The conclave, following the custom of all elections, political or religious, was divided. Twenty-two of its members took the side of Cardinal Braschi, a nephew of the late pope, and voted for the Cardinal Bellisomi, Bishop of Cesena, for the pontificate. Those who did not wish to perpetuate the dominion of the Braschi family at Rome, headed by Cardinal Antonelli, voted for Cardinal Mattei, a signer of the treaty of Tolentino. But they gave him only thirteen votes. Several months had elapsed, in the maintenance, on both sides, of this silent but obstinate contest. So far neither of the competitors had obtained any advantage over the other. The learned Cardinal Gerdil, who had figured in the controversies of the last century, was then suggested; this new candidate was a native of Savoy, and, since the victories of the republic, had become a subject of France. Austria exercised her right of exclusion against him. To finish the matter, Cardinal Mattei lost two votes, which promised to go for Cardinal Bellisomi, thus giving him twenty-four votes, that is, two-thirds of the whole, which was the number rigorously required by the laws of the church, to make an election valid. But as they were in the dominions of Austria, previous to this nomination, they thought proper to submit it to her government, in order to obtain her tacit consent. The court of Vienna was so imprudent as to suffer more than a month to elapse before giving an answer. This wounded the susceptibility of the princes of the church; the parties were all disunited, and the election of Cardinal Bellisomi became impossible. This was the moment of disorder and fatigue for which the cunning secretary of the conclave, the prelate Consalvi, had been waiting, for the purpose of producing a new candidate, the object of his long and secret meditations. Addressing all the parties in the language most calculated to impress them, he proved to these the inconveniences of the Braschi domination, and to those, the little reliance to be placed upon Austria and the different Christian courts. Addressing himself thereafter to the ancient Roman interest, so sagacious and profound as it was, he displayed before their astonished eyes a perspective altogether new to them. "It is from France," said he to them, "that persecutions have come upon us, for the last ten years. Well, it is from France, perhaps, that we shall derive aid and consolation in the future. France has always been, since the days of Charlemagne, the most useful and least troublesome protector of the Church. A very extraordinary young man, one very difficult as yet to judge, holds dominion there at the present day. He will before long, do not doubt it, reconquer Italy." The battle of Marengo was not fought at this time. "Remember that he protected the priests in 1797, and that he has recently given funeral honours to Pius VI. Singular words, which he has been heard to utter, upon the religion and the Court of Rome, have been repeated to us by witnesses worthy of belief. Let us not neglect the opportunities which may present themselves from him. Let us make a choice which cannot possibly be construed into an intention of hostility with France, but which may even, to some extent, be agreeable to her, and we shall perhaps effect something more beneficial to the church, than by soliciting candidates from all the Catholic courts of Europe."

This was certainly a flash of that genius of the Roman court, which, in the beginning of this century, still threw out some bright gleams. Monsignor Consalvi then brought forward the name of Cardinal Chiaramonti, bishop of Imola. No better choice could be made for the object he had in view. Cardinal Chiaramonti, a native of Cesena, fifty-eight years of age, a relation of Pius VI., educated by him for the Roman purple, enjoyed universal esteem for the qualities of his mind, his learning, and his gentle virtues. To his attractive character was united great firmness; he had been known at a former period, to contend nobly, and with a constancy that insured success, against the trickeries of his order, that of Saint Benedict, and against the persecutions of the Inquisition. His last and most celebrated action of public life, was a sermon, delivered in his own character as bishop of Imola, on the occasion of the union of his diocese with the Cisalpine republic. He had then spoken of the French Revolution with moderation, which charmed the conqueror of Italy, and disgusted the fanatics of the ancient regime. Nevertheless, being universally respected, he pleased the Braschi party, was not disagreeable to the opposite faction, was well enough esteemed by these cardinals who were fatigued with the length of the conclave, and seemed a happy choice to those who expected much from the good will of France in the future. The unexpected adherence of an illustrious person decided his election, which met with no farther real difficulty than his own personal resistance to such an honour. The adhesion in question was that of Cardinal Maury. This celebrated champion of the old French monarchy had retired to the Roman court, where he lived, recompensed for his contests with Barnave and Mirabeau, by the cardinal's hat. He was an emigrant; but an emigrant who possessed a remarkable mind, and great sense, and who welcomed, with secret satisfaction, the idea of connecting himself again with the government of France, since glory in some sort compensated for the novelty of this government. He had the disposal of six votes, and gave them all to Cardinal Chiaramonti, who was elected Pope just about the time of the arrival of General Bonaparte at Milan by the way of the Saint Bernard.

The new pontiff was at Venice, not having been able to obtain permission from the court of Vienna to be crowned at Saint Mark's, or from the court of Naples, that Rome should be restored to him. Departing suddenly, however, for Ancona, he negotiated in that city the evacuation of the States of the Church, and his own restoration to the capitol of the Christian world. In this precarious situation, France, having become friendly to the Holy See, could render him very valuable assistance, and the peculiar foresight of Monsignor Consalvi was about to be very suddenly accomplished. This meeting of the Cardinal Chiaramonti and the First Consul, the one elevated to the pontifical throne, the other to the dictatorship of the republic, nearly at the same time, was not to be one of the least astonishing accidents of this century, or least prolific of future events.

Bonaparte, while yet a youth, in 1796, a general under the orders of the Directory, not yet daring, or having any pretension to direct the French Revolution, had upheld the Pope by the treaty of Tolentino, and had only taken the Legations from him in order to bestow them upon the Cisalpine republic. Having become First Consul, now at liberty to do what he thought proper, and determined to undo a great part of the things done by the French Revolution, he could not hesitate in his conduct towards the newly elected Pope. Scarcely had he returned to Milan, when he saw Cardinal Martiniana, bishop of Vercelli, a friend of Pius VII., and declared to him that he was resolved to maintain good terms with the Holy See, to reconcile the French Revolution with the Church, and even to sustain the latter against its enemies; if the new Pope should show himself reasonable, and comprehend clearly the present situation of France and the world. These words were not lost on the ears of the old cardinal, but were destined soon to produce abundant fruit. The Bishop of Vercelli sent his own nephew, the Count Alciati, to Rome to conclude a negotiation.

To this communication General Bonaparte added an act, still bolder, which he would not have ventured to attempt in Paris, though he was well enough pleased that the fame of it should reach France from a distance, as a sign of his future intentions. The Italians had prepared a solemn Te Deum, in the old Cathedral of Milan, at which he determined to be present, and on the 18th of June—29th Prairial—he wrote these words to the consuls:—

“To-day, whatever our atheists of Paris may say to it, I go in great state to the Te Deum, which is to be chanted in the metropolis of Milan.

“Office of the Secretary of State.”

After having given his attention to the general affairs of Italy, he effected some indispensable dispositions for the distribution of the army in the conquered countries, for its subsistence and reorganization. Massena had of late rejoined him. The ill humour of the defender of Genoa speedily disappeared before the flattering reception of the First Consul. He received the command of the army of Italy, which surely he well merited. This army was composed of the corps which had defended Genoa; of that which had defended the Var; of the troops which had crossed St. Bernard; and of those which, under General Moncey, had arrived from Germany. All these formed an imposing mass of 80,000 hardy veterans. The First Consul established them in the rich plains of the Po, so as to allow them to repose from their fatigues, and to compensate for their privations by the abundance they were about to enjoy.

With his accustomed foresight, the First Consul gave the order to blow up all the forts and citadels which blocked the approaches to France and Italy. In consequence of this, the demolition of the forts of Arona, of Bard, of Seravalle, and of the citadels of Ivrea and Ceva, was ordered and executed. He prescribed the mode and the extent of the contributions which were destined to subsist the army; he superintended the departure of the Consular Guard in person, and calculated its halts, so that it should arrive in Paris in time for the celebration of the 14th of July, which, as he meant, should be conducted with extraordinary pomp. He applied himself, even at Milan, to regulate the details of this festival. “It is necessary,” he wrote, “to render the solemnity of the 14th of July imposing and brilliant, and to take care that no ridiculous fooleries are introduced into the ceremonies, which has been too much the case of late. Chariot races might do very well in Greece, where they fought in chariots, but they will not do for us in Paris.”—Milan, 22d of June. Office of the secretary of state.—He forbid them raising triumphal arches to him, saying he wished no better triumphal arch than public satisfaction. If in spite of all that recalled him to Paris, the First Consul yet remained ten days at Milan, it was for the purpose of securing the faithful execution of the convention of Alessandria. He placed no confidence in Austrian faith, and thought even that he perceived some delays in the surrender of certain strong places. He immediately reprimanded Berthier for his weakness, and ordered him to detain the second and third columns of M. de Melas's army. The first had already departed. Apprehensions might well have been entertained; above all for Genoa, which the Austrians must have been tempted to deliver up to the English before the French entered it. The Prince of Hohenzollern, in fact, whether of his own accord, or excited by the English, refused to deliver up, at this moment, to Massena's troops, a place conquered with so much trouble. M. de Melas, hearing of these difficulties, insisted, with the frankness of an honest man, on the immediate execution, by his general, of the convention of Alessandria; threatening him, at the same time, if he resisted, with the consequences which his disobedience would provoke. The words of M. de Melas were respected, and Genoa was delivered up to the French on the 24th of June, in the midst of the joy of the Ligurian patriots; thus released in a few days from the presence of the Austrians, and the power of the oligarchs. Thus the words of Massena were verified: "I swear to you that I shall be in Genoa before fifteen days!" All this being done, the First Consul set off from Milan, on the 24th of June, with Duroc, his favourite aide-de-camp; Bessières, commander of the Consular Guard; M. de Bourrienne, his secretary; and Savary, one of the officers whom he had attached to his person, in memory of Desaix. He stopped some hours at Turin, to order the construction of works at the citadel, crossed the Mount Cenis, and entered Lyons under triumphal arches, and through a population astonished by the prodigies he had just accomplished. The men of Lyons, who were delighted in the same degree by his glory and policy, absolutely invaded the hotel of the Céléstines, at which he had alighted, and insisted on seeing him. He was obliged to present himself to them. The moment he appeared, there were unanimous bursts of acclamations. They now requested him so urgently to lay the first stone in the Place Bellecour, the reconstruction of which was about to be commenced, that he was obliged to consent. He passed a day at Lyons, in the midst of a concourse of all the people of the neighbourhood. After having addressed to the people of Lyons words that charmed them, relating to the restoration of peace, of order, and of commerce, he set out for Paris. The inhabitants of the provinces through which his road passed, collected from all sides to see him. This man, at that time favoured so much by fortune, enjoyed his glory keenly, yet in conversing with his companions of the road, he addressed to them these extraordinary words, which paint well his insatiate love of renown: "Yes," he said to them, "in less than two months I have conquered Cairo, Milan, Paris; what then? were I to die to-morrow, I should not have half a page in a universal history." He arrived, in the night of 2d and 3d of July, in Paris.

His return was necessary, for having been at a distance from the capital nearly two months, his absence, above all at the moment of the false news of Marengo, had given birth to new intrigues. For a time it was believed that he was either dead or vanquished, and the ambitious set themselves to work. Some turned their thoughts to Carnot, others to M. de la Fayette, lately dismissed from Olmutz, and re-admitted to France, by the kindness of the First Consul. They wished to make of Carnot, or M. de la Fayette, the president of a republic. M. de la Fayette had no concern with these intrigues, neither had Carnot; but Joseph and Lucien Bonaparte conceived unjust suspicions of the latter; and induced their brother to partake them. From that circumstance arose the unhappy resolution which the First Consul executed some time afterward, of taking the portfolio of the minister of war from Carnot. It was even supposed that Messrs. Talleyrand and Fouché, who mutually hated each other, were drawing together, without doubt to concert measures and profit by events. Nothing could be perceived to excite suspicion against the man most called upon to act in case of General Bonaparte's disappearance from the scene; I mean M. de Sieyès; but he was the only one who showed so much reserve. However, all this had scarcely time to ripen; so thoroughly was the ill news effaced by the good which followed. But what had passed, was very much exaggerated in the report; and the First Consul conceived feelings of resentment against certain individuals, which he had the good sense to conceal, and even entirely to forget, after a while, as regards all those who had been pointed out to him, one alone excepted, the illustrious Carnot. The First Consul, however, now completely occupied with the joy of his successes, did not wish that any passing cloud should obscure the public felicity. He welcomed every one, and was welcomed by every one, with transport; above all, by those who felt that he had cause to complain of them. The people of Paris, when they heard of his return, crowded under the windows of the Tuileries, and during the whole day filled the courts and gardens of the palace. The First Consul was obliged to show himself to the multitude several times. In the evening the city of Paris was spontaneously illuminated. Men celebrated with rapture the miraculous victory, which they considered a certain prelude to the ardently desired peace. This day had so powerful an effect upon the feelings of him who was the object of all this homage, that twenty years afterward, alone, exiled, a prisoner in the midst of the Atlantic solitudes, he spoke of it—in collecting and relating the events of his past life—as the happiest of his existence. The next day the officers of state waited on him, and set the first example of those congratulations, the pompous spectacle of which we have seen often renewed under all the reigns. This spectacle was at that time new, and had a motive. Next came to the Tuileries, the Senate, the Legislative Corps, the Tribunal, the officers of the great tribunals, the Préfecture of the Seine, the civil and military authorities, the Directors of the Bank of France, and, last of all, the Institute, and the learned societies. These distinguished bodies were collected together to compliment the conqueror of Marengo, and spoke to him as they had formerly, and have since, spoken to kings. But it must be said, that the language, although uniformly adulatory, was dictated by deep enthusiasm. In fact, the aspect of affairs having so changed in the last few months; security having succeeded trouble; a prodigious victory having placed France at the head of the European powers; the certainty of peace having caused all anxieties of a general war to cease; and last of all, prosperity announcing itself everywhere, how could they be otherwise than transported with enthusiasm at such results, and so soon to be realized? The president of the Senate concluded his address with the following words, which may give some idea of the others. "We are happy to acknowledge that the country owes its safety to you, that the republic will owe its strength to you, and the people that prosperity, which in one day you have made to succeed to ten years of tempestuous revolution."

While these things were passing in Italy, and in France, Moreau, on the banks of the Danube, was yet carrying on his glorious campaign against M. de Kray. We left him manœuvring about Ulm to oblige the Austrians to leave that strong position. He had posted himself between the Iller and the Lech, resting his left and right on these two rivers, facing the Danube, his back to Augsburg, ready to receive M. de Kray if he wished to fight, and in the mean time blocking up his road to the Alps, which last was the essential end of the campaign. If Moreau's success had been neither prompt nor decisive, it had been constant, and sufficient to admit of the First Consul accomplishing all, in Italy, which he had proposed. But the moment had now arrived when the general of the army of the Rhine, emboldened by the state of the times and by the successes of the army of reserve, was going to try a serious manœuvre to force M. de Kray from his position of Ulm. Now, at this moment, though he had heard nothing of the battle of Marengo, he had learned the success of the passage of the Alps. No longer caring about covering the road across the mountains, he was at perfect liberty to move as he thought best. Of all the possible manœuvres to force the position at Ulm, he preferred that which consisted in passing the Danube below that position, and so compelling M. de Kray to decamp, by threatening to cut off his line of retreat. This manœuvre was, in fact, the best; for that which consisted in dashing on straight to Vienna, by way of Munich, was too bold for a mind like Moreau's, and, perhaps, premature in the general state of affairs. That which would have consisted in passing the river higher up, and quite close to Ulm, in order to carry the Austrian camp by storm, was hazardous as all such attacks must be. But to pass below Ulm, and, by threatening M. de Kray's line of retreat, to oblige him to secure it, was the wisest and the surest manœuvre. From the 15th to the 18th of June, Moreau put himself in motion to execute this new resolution. The organization of his army, as has been said, had received some change, in consequence of the departure of the Generals Sainte-Suzanne and Saint-Cyr. Lecourbe always formed the right, and Moreau the centre, commanding the corps of reserve. The corps of Saint-Cyr, now under the command of General Grenier, formed the left. Sainte-Suzanne's corps, now reduced to a strong division, and given to the bold Richepanse, was destined to perform the duty of light troops, observing Ulm, while the rest were manœuvring below. Some affairs had taken place before Ulm, one particularly, on the 5th of June, in which two French divisions had maintained themselves against forty thousand Austrians. It was a part of M. de Kray's plan to fix us before Ulm, by constantly occupying our attention. On the 18th of June, Richepanse was in sight of Ulm; Grenier, with the left, at Guntzbourg; the centre, formed of the corps of reserve, at Burgau; while Lecourbe, with his right, extended as far as to Dillingen. The enemy had broken down all the bridges from Ulm to Donauwerth. But a reconnaissance made by Lecourbe had decided Moreau to choose the points of Blindheim and Gremheim whereat to pass the Danube, because on those two points the bridges, imperfectly broken down, were easier to be repaired. Lecourbe was intrusted with this dangerous operation. To render it less difficult for him, he was reinforced by General Boyer with five battalions and the whole reserve of cavalry under the orders of General Hautpoul. The centre, under the general-in-chief, advanced from Burgau to Aisligen, so as to have it in his power to second the passage. Grenier, with the left, received orders to make a false attempt on his side, in order to draw the attention of the enemy to himself. On the 19th of June, early in the morning, Lecourbe placed his troops between the village of Blindheim and Gremheim, the bridges of which had been but imperfectly destroyed. He took care to cover himself behind some clusters of trees. He had no pontoon train, and only a limited quantity of timber and planks; but he made up, by audacity, for all his wants. General Gudin superintended this projected passage under Lecourbe; some pieces of artillery were placed on the banks of the Danube to keep the enemy at a distance, and, at the same time, his assistant, Quenot, boldly threw himself into the stream, to seize upon two large boats, which were in sight on the other bank. This brave officer brought them off under a shower of balls, and returned with only a slight wound in the foot. The best swimmers of the division were now chosen; they laid their arms and clothes in two boats and threw themselves into the waters of the Danube, under the fire of the enemy. Arrived on the other bank, and without even taking the time to dress themselves, they seized their arms and rushed furiously on some companies of Austrians who were guarding that part of the river, dispersed them, and took two pieces of cannon with their tumbrils. That being done, they rushed to the bridges, the piers of which still remained entire. They worked hard on both banks, placing thereon ladders, beams, and planks, and establishing the first portions of a communication. Some French artillery-men took advantage of this to pass from the other side of the Danube, and began to work the two guns, which we had taken, against the enemy. We were soon masters of both banks, and the bridges, ere long, were sufficiently repaired, to afford a passage for most of the troops. The infantry and cavalry began to pass over. It was to be expected that numerous Austrian reinforcements should come up promptly from Donauwerth, and rush down ~~and~~ from all their positions above, at Gundelfingen, Guntzbourg, and Ulm. Lecourbe, who had repaired in person to the spot, posted all the infantry of which he could dispose, with some troops of cavalry, in the village of Schwenningen, which was situated on the road to Donauwerth. This point was important, for it was that by which the Austrians ascending the Danube must needs present themselves. Four thousand infantry, five hundred cavalry, and six pieces of cannon, soon showed themselves and attacked the village, which was, within two hours, taken and retaken several times.

Nevertheless the numerical superiority of the Austrians, and their determination to retake a position so decisive, would have given them the victory over our troops, and forced them to abandon the village, had not Lecourbe received a timely reinforcement of two squadrons of carabineers. He combined with these a few troops of the 8th hussars, which he had in hand, and launched them on the enemy's infantry, which was extending itself on the vast plain by the side of the Danube. This charge was executed with so much vigour and rapidity, that the Austrians were thrown back in disorder, leaving us their artillery, 2000 prisoners, and 300 horses. Two battalions of Wurtembergers who endeavoured to resist and formed square, were broke like the rest. After this brilliant combat, fought by Puthrod's brigade, Lecourbe had no longer any thing to fear from the lower Danube.

But it was not from that side that the principal dangers were like to arise. The main force of the Austrians was above him, that is to say, at Dillingen, Gundelfingen, and Ulm; and it was necessary to wheel round so as to front the enemy coming thence. Fortunately the divisions of Montrichard, and Gudin, and Hautpoul's reserve, had passed the reconstructed bridges of Gremheim and Blindheim, and were lining the celebrated plain of Hockstedt, which had gained a celebrity sadly famous for us in the time of Louis XIV.—13th of August, 1704. The enemy who had assembled hastily at Dillingen, from the nearest points, at some distance from Hockstedt, was drawn up near the Danube; the infantry to our left, along the marshes by the river, and behind some tufts of wood; the cavalry to our right, in very great numbers. They presented themselves thus in admirable order, awaiting the reinforcements which were continually coming up, and falling slowly back in order to be nearer their support. The 87th demi-brigade and a squadron of the 8th hussars, followed step by step this retrograde movement of the Austrians. Lecourbe, disembarassed of the enemy from the lower Danube by the combat of Schwenningen, came up at full gallop, at the head of the 2d regiment of carabineers, of the cuirassiers, of the 6th and 9th cavalry, and of the 9th hussars. This was nearly the whole of Hautpoul's cavalry reserve. Our troops were in the plain, divided from the enemy by a little watercourse, the Egge, on which stands a village, that of Schrezeim. Lecourbe passed the village at a gallop with his cuirassiers; formed them as fast as they filed through it; and threw them upon the Austrian horse, who, surprised by this rough and sudden charge, recoiled in disorder, and left 9000 infantry, whom it was their duty to protect, entirely uncovered. The foot, thus abandoned, endeavoured to cast themselves across the ditches which cut up the whole plain of the Danube about Dillingen; but the cuirassiers, well led on, cut their column, and separated from it 1800 men, who became our prisoners. Already had two successful combats been fought in one day, due, in good part, to the cavalry, and there was yet to be another. Lecourbe took post on the Egge, awaiting the rest of his reserves which were arriving by the bridge of Dillingen, which we had now won. But M. de Kray's cavalry was coming up in haste, outstripping the infantry, and formed in two great lines behind Lauingen. Here was the opportunity to profit by the high spirits it had gained from its success this morning, and to measure its prowess in the plain with the numerous and brilliant squadrons of the Austrian army. Lecourbe, having occupied Lauingen with his infantry, combined all the cavalry of all his divisions with Hautpoul's reserves, deployed them in the plain, and offered the enemy that sort of cavalry combat which was sure to tempt him, as the number and quality of his cavalry were superb. The first Austrian line was put in movement with that coolness and precision natural to well-trained cavalry. In fact, it drove back the 2d regiment of carabineers, which had behaved so gallantly in the morning, and a few squadrons of hussars who had charged with it. Then our cuirassiers went at it, rallied the carabineers and hussars, who faced about, as soon as they felt themselves supported, and altogether dashed vigorously at the Austrian squadrons, whom they beat back in turn. On seeing this, the second line of the enemy's horse charged, and having the advantage of speed over our cavalry, which had not re-formed after their shock, drove them in, with great haste. But the 9th was still in reserve. Manœuvring both skilfully and boldly, it was wheeled upon the flank of the Austrian cavalry, surprised it, and, maltreating it severely, secured the possession of the plain of Hockstedt to our victorious squadrons.

The results in killed, wounded, and prisoners were not very considerable, for encounters of cavalry with one another, unless infantry is in the case, are never very serious. But the plain was ours. And our horse had proved their manifest superiority to that of the Austrians, which had not happened before. From this moment all our arms of service had a decided superiority to the similar arms of the enemy. It was now eight o'clock in the evening; and in the long days of June, there still was time enough in which the Imperialists could dispute with us the left bank of the Danube, so gloriously won in the morning. Eight thousand infantry now came up to the succour of the corps which had been beaten, and was followed by a numerous artillery. Moreau also arrived at the head of all his reserves. A new battle now began more fiercely than any of those that preceded it. The French infantry first attacked the Austrians, under a tempest of round and grape. M. de Kray's troops, fighting for a great interest, the maintenance of the position of Ulm, displayed extraordinary vigour. Moreau was several times personally engaged in this melée, but his infantry, supported by the cavalry, who had come back from their charge, remained victorious at about eleven o'clock at night. At the same moment, the 37th demi-brigade entered Gundelfingen, and from that time all the positions in the plain were ours. We had crossed the Danube, made 5000 prisoners, taken twenty pieces of cannon, 1200 horses, 300 carriages, and considerable magazines at Donauwerth. We had been fighting for eighteen successive hours. This operation, which effaced the sad memories of Hochstedt by recent glory, was, after Marengo, the finest operation of the campaign, and was equally creditable to Lecourbe and Moreau. The latter had become gradually bold; and at length stimulated by the grand examples set him in Italy, had taken wider views, and had now gathered a laurel fresh from the same tree which had yielded its noblest to the First Consul. Happy and noble rivalry, had it never proceeded farther!

After so bold and decisive a manœuvre of his adversary, M. de Kray could no longer hold Ulm, without suffering his communications with Vienna to be cut off. To rush straight upon the French and give them battle, was too hazardous, with soldiers whose moral sense had been severely shaken by the last events. He determined then to decamp in haste that very evening. He caused a park of nearly a thousand carriages to pass out before him, and followed on the next day with the bulk of his army on the road to Nordlingen. He marched in dreadful weather, over roads completely broken up. Notwithstanding this, the rapidity of his retreat was such that he reached Nersheim in twenty-four hours. To support his troops, who were beginning to fail, he spread a report that an armistice had been signed in Italy, which would soon extend to Germany, and that peace would surely follow. This rumour spread joy among his soldiers, and gave them new strength. They reached Nordlingen.

Moreau had learned too late the departure of the enemy. Richepanse had not been able to discover the evacuation of Ulm, until the last detachments were retiring from it, and he had immediately informed his general-in-chief. But, in that interval, the Austrian had gained two days on us, and it would not be possible for us to overtake him but by a forced march. Nevertheless, Moreau reached Nordlingen on the 23d of June, in the evening, pressing M. de Kray's rear-guard, as he continued to retreat, very hard. Seeing, however, that owing to the wretched state of the roads he could not gain sufficiently on them to strike a blow at the Austrian army, and that he was likely to be drawn into a fruitless pursuit, and one of unknown distance, Moreau determined to halt and select a position suited to the present position of affairs. M. de Kray, without choosing to give him the good news of the victory of Marengo, which was not yet known in the French army, caused him to be informed of the suspension of arms in Italy, and proposed one for Germany likewise. Moreau, suspecting thereupon that great events had occurred beyond the Alps, never doubting but that they were fortunate, and expecting to receive a courier who should inform him of them, resolved to make no terms until he should know more, and until he should have won better cantonnements for his soldiers. He resolved, therefore, to repossess the Danube; to trust Richepanse with the investment of the two principal places situate on the river—Ulm and Ingolstadt; and to move, himself, with the bulk of his army, beyond the Lech, in order to occupy Augsburg and Munich; so as to insure to himself a part of Bavaria for his subsistence; and to conquer the bridges of Isar, and all the roads which open upon the Inn.

Moreau then repossessed the Danube and the Lech, by Donauwerth and Rhain, directed his different corps by Pottmoss and Pfaffenhausen, even to the banks of the Isar. He occupied on that river the points of Landshut, Moosburg, Freisingen, and detached Decaen on Munich, which places he entered in triumph on the 28th of June. While he was executing this movement, the two armies encountered for the last time, and, on this occasion, unexpectedly, and in a battle without end or object. It was at Newbourg, on the right bank of the Danube, while both parties were marching on the Isar. A French division, engaged at too great a distance from the army, was forced to sustain an unequal combat, but triumphed at last, after enduring a serious loss in the death of the brave Latour d'Auvergne. That noble soldier, honoured by General Bonaparte with the title of First Grenadier of France, fell by a lance thrust in his heart. The army shed tears over his tomb; nor did it leave the field until it had raised a monument on the spot.

On the 13th of July—14th Messidor—Moreau was in the heart of Bavaria, blockading Ulm and Ingolstadt, and occupying on the Isar Landshut, Moosburg, Freisingen, and Munich. This was the moment to think of striking a blow at the Tyrol, and of taking from the Prince de Reuss the strong positions which he held along the mountains, to the sources of the Iller, the Lech, and the Isar—positions, by means of which he always had the power of disturbing the French. He was not, it is true, very dangerous, but his presence compelled us to make considerable detachments, and he became a subject of constant anxiety to our left wing. To this intent, General Moreau was reinforced, and received means of attacking the Grisons and the Tyrol. The positions of Fussen, Reitti, Immenstadt, and Feldkirch were carried in succession promptly and briliantly, and our establishment on the Isar was thus perfectly consolidated.

M. de Kray had crossed the Isar, and thrown himself behind the Inn, occupying the camp of Ampfing in advance of that river, and the bridge-heads of Wasserbourg and of Muhl-dorf. It was now the middle of July—end of Messidor. The French government had left it to General Moreau to act at his own pleasure, and to dispose of his armies as he judged best. He thought justly that he ought not to be the only person who was fighting. The repose enjoyed by the soldiers of Italy caused some envy among those of Germany. Although a stipulation of the convention of Alessandria forbade either the French or the Austrians to detach men to Germany, it yet fell out naturally enough, that a convention of this nature was not very strictly observed, and the army of the Rhine soon found that it had on its hands an enemy unexpectedly augmented.

Moreau, who had received several propositions from M. de Kray, determined at length to listen to him, and on the 16th of July—26th Messidor—consented to sign an armistice at Parsdorf, a place a little way in advance of Munich, on terms nearly similar to that of Italy. The two armies should retire each behind a line of demarkation, which, setting out from Balzers in the Grisons, ran along the Tyrol, between the Isar and the Inn, equidistant from the two rivers, struck the Danube at Wilshofen, ascended that river to the mouth of the Alt-Muhl, followed the Alt-Muhl, the Reanitz, the Main, to Mayence. The garrisons of Ulm and Ingolstadt remained blockaded. But it was agreed that every fifteen days they should receive provisions in proportion to the amount of their garrisons. The two armies should have twelve days' notice of the resumption of hostilities. The French army should have for its subsistence, Franconia, Suabia, and a great part of Bavaria. Our soldiers, placed on the Mincio, on one side of the Alps, and the Isar on the other, were now about to reap, in the rich fields of Italy and Germany, the recompense of their privations and their labours. They had deserved it well, by the noble exploits which had distinguished the French arms. The army of the Rhine, although the splendour of its deeds had not been so glaring as the glory of its Italian rival, had borne itself in the field with equal vigour and wisdom. The last great event of this campaign, the passage of the Danube at Hochstedt, will bear comparison with any feat of arms recorded in our military history. The opinion which, in 1799, was unfavourable to Moreau, had now become almost partial to him. After the name of General Bonaparte, far distant, it is true, but at such a distance as did not preclude much honour, men ranked that of Moreau. And as opinion is unstable, he now excelled the conqueror of Zurich, as much as in the previous year he had been excelled by him.

The news of the successes of the army of the Rhine completed the joy produced by the extraordinary victory of the army of Italy; and changed the hopes of peace which filled the public mind, into the certainty of it. The joy was universal. The public funds, nominally at five per cent., which had been sold on the 18th of Brumaire, for thirteen francs, had risen to forty. A decree of the consuls announced to the stockholders that the interest of the first six months, which would end on the 22d of September, 1800, would be paid to them entirely in silver. Happy news; such as had not been given for many a day to the unfortunate creditors of the state. All this was attributed to the armies, to the generals who had led them, and chiefly to the young Bonaparte, who governed and fought in a style equally superior and uncommon. The festival of the 14th of July, moreover, one of the two republican festivals preserved by the constitution, was celebrated with great splendour. A magnificent ceremony was prepared at the Invalids. The musician Mehul had composed some fine songs, and the first singers of Italy, from which we were then beginning to take both arts and artists, were brought to perform them. After hearing these strains under the dome of the Invalids, the First Consul, accompanied by a numerous staff, repaired to the Field of Mars, to receive the Consular Guard. It had marched in, that very morning, covered with dust, its uniforms in tatters, for it had never ceased marching since the day following the battle of Marengo, in order exactly to keep the appointment, which the First Consul had made with it, for the 14th of July. It carried to the Invalids the conquered standards of the last campaign, in order to add them to that common depository of our trophies. The crowd which lined the sides of the Champ de Mars, rushed eagerly in to see the hero of Marengo. This boundless enthusiasm necessarily produced accidents. The First Consul was for a long time closely pressed in that popular melée. He entered the Tuileries, surrounded by the multitude, closely following his steps. The day was consecrated wholly to public rejoicings.

A few days afterward, on the 21st of July—2d Thermidor—the arrival of the Count of St. Julien was announced, the confidential officer of the Emperor of Germany, intrusted with the ratification of the convention of Alessandria, and empowered to confer with the First Consul, on the conditions of that long desired peace, which was destined to terminate the second coalition. France, it must be admitted had never witnessed days so glorious.

BOOK V.

HELIOPOLIS.

State of Egypt after the Departure of General Bonaparte—Deep Grief of the Army: its Desire to return to France—Kléber excites, instead of repressing, that Feeling—His Report on the State of the Colony.—This Report, destined for the Directory, is received by the First Consul—its falsehood—Great Resources of the Colony, and Facility of securing it to France—Kléber, influenced by the Feeling which he had encouraged, is induced to treat with the Turks and the English—Shameful Convention of El Arisch, stipulating the Evacuation of Egypt—Refusal of the English to execute that Convention: they calculate upon obliging the French Army to lay down its Arms—Noble Indignation of Kléber—Breach of the Armistice and Battle of Heliopolis—Dispersion of the Turks—Kléber pursues them to the Frontiers of Syria—The Vizier's Camp taken—New Distribution of the Army in Lower Egypt—Return of Kléber to Cairo, to reduce that City, which had risen in his Rear—His skilful Temporizing—Having collected his Means, he attacks and retakes Cairo—General Subinisation—Alliance with Murad Bey—Kléber, who thought it impossible to keep Egypt when subdued, re-conquers it in thirty-five Days from the Turkish Forces and the revolted Egyptians—His Errors gloriously repaired—Emotion of the Mussulman Populations on learning that Egypt is in the hands of the Infidels—A Fanatic travels from Palestine to Cairo to assassinate Kléber—Lamentable Death of the latter, and its Consequences to the Colony—Present Tranquillity—Kléber and Desaix both killed on the same Day—Characters and Lives of those two Warriors.

IN August, 1799, General Bonaparte, being determined by news from Europe to leave Egypt suddenly, ordered Admiral Ganteaume to send out of the harbour of Alexandria the frigates La Muiron and La Carrère, the only ships left after the destruction of the fleet, and to cast anchor in the little roadstead of the Marabout. At that place, about two leagues westward of Alexandria, he purposed to embark. He took with him Generals Berthier, Lannes, Murat, Andréossy,¹ Marmont, and the two men of science to whom he was more attached than to any of the others belonging to the expedition, Monge and Berthollet. On the 22d of August—5th Fructidor, year VII.—he proceeded to the Marabout, and embarked hastily, in constant apprehension that the English squadron would make its appearance. The horses on which the party rode thither, being left upon the beach, galloped back to Alexandria. The sight of these horses, saddled, but riderless, created a sort of panic; it was supposed that some accident had befallen some of the officers of the garrison, and a detachment of cavalry was despatched from the entrenched camp. Presently, a Turkish groom, who was present at the embarkation, explained what had happened, and Menou, who alone had been initiated into the secret, made known in Alexandria the departure of General Bonaparte, and the appointment of General Kléber to succeed him. The latter had been directed to meet him at Rosetta, on the 22d of August, but General Bonaparte was in such haste to embark, that he went the day before. Besides, when he imposed on Kléber the heavy burden of command, he was not sorry to leave him absolute orders, which admit of neither objection nor refusal.

This intelligence caused a painful surprise throughout the army. At first, it was discredited; General Dugua, commandant of Rosetta, caused it to be contradicted, not believing it himself, and fearful of the bad effect it was likely to produce. It was not, however, possible to doubt it long, and Kléber was officially proclaimed the successor of General Bonaparte. Officers and soldiers were in consternation.

All the ascendancy exercised over them by the conqueror of Italy had been required to draw them after him into distant and unknown countries, and it was all required to retain them there. Regret for home is a passion, which becomes violent, in proportion as distance, strangeness of scene, and fears founded on the uncertainty of return, conspire to increase it. Oftentimes, in Egypt, this passion showed itself in murmurs, sometimes in suicide. But the presence of the commander-in-chief, his language, his incessant activity, dispelled these gloomy vapours. Well knowing how to employ himself, and how to employ others, he captivated their minds to the highest point, and either banished from his presence, or prevented the generation of those irksome feelings to which he was altogether a stranger. The men often said to themselves that they should never see France again, that they should never recross the Mediterranean, especially since the fleet had been destroyed at Aboukir, but General Bonaparte was on the spot; with him they could go anywhere, find their way back to their country, or make a new country for themselves. With his departure the aspect of things was totally changed. The intelligence of it came, therefore, like a thunderbolt. The most opprobrious epithets were applied to this departure. They did not consider that irresistible impulse of patriotism and ambition, which, on the news of the disasters of the Republic, had urged him to return to France. They perceived only the forlorn state in which he left the unfortunate army, which had felt sufficient confidence in his genius to follow him. They said to themselves that he must surely have convinced himself of the imprudence of that enterprise. of the impossibility of its success, since he had run away, and left to others what seemed to him henceforth impracticable. But to sneak off alone, leaving beyond sea those whom he had thus imperilled, was cruelty, nay, cowardice, said some traducers; for he had ever some traducers, and those very near to his person, even in the most brilliant epochs of his career.

¹ ANDROSSY. Served with distinction in Italy, in 1797. Accompanied Bonaparte to Egypt, and was one of those who returned with him, and supported him on the 18th Brumaire. After the peace of Amiens, he was minister at St. James. He wrote several memoirs relative to Egypt.—Biographie Méricenne.

Kléber did not love General Bonaparte, and endured his ascendancy with a sort of impatience. If he restrained himself in his presence, he indulged elsewhere in unbecoming expressions. A grumbler and whimsical, Kléber had ardently desired to accompany the expedition to Egypt, that he might extricate himself from that state of disgrace to which he had been consigned under the Directory; and he was now sorry that he had quitted the banks of the Rhine for the banks of the Nile. With weakness unworthy of his character, he allowed that feeling to betray itself. This man, great as he was in danger, yielded to it as much as the meanest of his soldiers. The chief command did not console him for the necessity of remaining in Egypt, for he did not love command. Encouraging the discontent against General Bonaparte, he committed the error, which would deserve to be called criminal, had it not been repaired by heroic actions, of contributing himself to produce in the army a feeling which soon became general. Following his example, everybody began to say that they could not stay any longer in Egypt, and must absolutely return to France at all hazards. Other feelings combined with this passion for return, to destroy the moral feeling of the army, and to produce in it the most mischievous dispositions.

An old rivalry divided at that time, and long continued to divide, the officers who had belonged to the armies of the Rhine and of Italy. They were jealous, these of those, each party pretending to carry on war in a different and a superior manner; and although this rivalry was repressed by the presence of General Bonaparte, it was the principal cause of the diversity of their opinions. All who had come from the armies of the Rhine, showed but little inclination to the Egyptian expedition; on the other hand, the officers originally attached to the army of Italy, though sorry to be so far distant from France, were well-inclined to the expedition, because it was the work of the general-in-chief. After his departure, all restraint was thrown off. Kléber's partisans rallied tumultuously around him; they loudly repeated with him what, it is true, began to be the conviction of every one, that the conquest of Egypt was a mad undertaking, which ought to be abandoned as soon as possible. This opinion, however, found dissentients; some generals, such as Janusse, Menou,¹ Davout,² Desaix, in particular, dared to express other sentiments. The army was henceforth split into two parties; the one was called the colonist, the other the anti-colonist party. Unluckily Desaix was absent. He was completing the conquest of Upper Egypt, where he was delivering brilliant battles, and ruling with admi-nable wisdom. His influence could not, therefore, be opposed at that moment to Kléber's. To crown the misfortune, he was not destined to remain in Egypt. General Bonaparte, wishing to have him about his person, had committed the error of not appointing him commander-in-chief, and had left orders for him to return as speedily as possible to Europe. Desaix, whose name was universally cherished and respected in the army, whose administrative talents equalled his military capacity, would have governed the colony most ably, and would have avoided all those weaknesses to which Kléber gave way, at least for a moment.

Kléber, however, was the most popular of the generals among the soldiery. His name was hailed by them with entire confidence, and somewhat cheered them for the loss of the illustrious commander who had just left them. The first impression once over, their minds, though they had not recovered their wonted tone, acquired more calmness and justice. Other language was held; men said among themselves that, after all, it behoved General Bonaparte to fly to the succour of France, now in danger; and that, the army once established in Egypt, the best thing he could do for it was to go to Paris, to represent strongly its situation and its wants, and to claim that assistance which he alone could extort from the supine government at home.

Kléber returned to Cairo, assumed the command with some ostentation, and took up his abode in the fine Arabian mansion which his predecessor had occupied in the Ezbekyeh Place. He displayed a certain pomp, not so much to gratify his own taste as to make an impression on the Orientals, and resolved to make his authority felt, by exercising it with vigour. But it was not long before the solitudes of chief command, which were insupportable to him, the new dangers with which the Turks and the English threatened Egypt, and the grief of exile, which was general, filled his soul with the most gloomy discouragement. A report of the state of the colony having been made to him, by his order, he addressed to the Directory a despatch full of errors, and accompanied it with a report by Poussielgue, the administrator of finances—a report in which things were represented in the most false, and moreover in the most injurious light, as regarded General Bonaparte.

In this despatch and report, dated the 26th of September—4th Vendémiaire, year VIII.—General Kléber, and Poussielgue, the administrator, stated that the army, diminished by one half, was at this moment reduced to about 15,000 men; that these men were nearly naked, which in that climate was extremely dangerous on account of the difference of temper-

¹ MENOU, J. BARON DE. Deputy from the nobility of Touraine to the States General. He was one of the first who joined the chamber of the Tiers Etat. He distinguished himself as a speaker and statesman, during the years 1789, '90, and '91. In the latter year he was employed as major-general, and in 1792 was second in command of the regular army. In 1793 he was employed against La Vendée, and was defeated by young La Roche Jacquelin, at the bridge of Le and at Vihiers. In 1795 he defended the National Convention against the Jacobins, and was rewarded by a suit of gilt armour. In 1798 he followed Bonaparte to Egypt, where he displayed both courage and conduct. He there embraced Mahometanism, and married a rich young Egyptian girl, daughter to the keeper of the baths at Alexandria.—Biographie Moderne.

² DAVOUT, LOUIS NICHOLAS. Born of a noble family, in 1770. Studied with Napoleon at Brienne. He distinguished himself under Dumouriez. In the Italian campaigns he sedulously attached himself to Napoleon. He followed Napoleon to Egypt, and after the battle of Marengo was made chief of the grenadiers of the Con-sular Guard.—Encyclopædia Americana.

ture between day and night; that they were in want of cannon, muskets, projectiles, powder, all which things it was difficult to replace, because cast-iron, lead, timber for building, and materials for making gunpowder, were not to be found in Egypt; that there was a considerable deficit in the finances, since the sum of 4,000,000 of francs was due to the soldiers for pay, and 7,000,000 or 8,000,000 to the contractors for various supplies; that the resource to be derived from the levying contributions was already exhausted, the country being ripe for immediate insurrection should new ones be imposed; that, the inundation having failed this year, and the crops therefore likely to prove deficient, the Egyptians would be alike destitute of means and will to pay the tax; that dangers of all kinds threatened the colony; that the two old chiefs of the Mamelukes, Murad Bey and Ibrahim Bey, still maintained their ground, the one in Upper, the other in Lower Egypt; that Djeddar, the celebrated pasha of Acre, was about to send to the Turkish army a reinforcement of 20,000 excellent soldiers, the former defenders of St. Jean d'Acre, against the French; that the grand vizier himself having set out from Constantinople, was already in the neighbourhood of Damascus, with a powerful army; that the Russians and the English were preparing to add a regular force to the irregular forces of the Turks; that, in this extremity, but one resource was left, namely, to treat with the Porte; and that, General Bonaparte having set the example thereof, and given express authority therefor, in his instructions to his successor, an attempt was about to be made to negotiate with the grand vizier a mixed domination, by means of which the Porte should occupy the open country of Egypt, and levy the miri or land-tax, while France should occupy the towns and the forts, and levy the revenue of the customs. Kléber added, that the commander-in-chief had seen the crisis approaching, and that this was the real motive for his precipitate departure. M. Poussielgue concluded his report with a calumny. General Bonaparte, when he left Egypt, had, he said, carried away two millions. To complete this picture, it should be known that General Bonaparte had loaded M. Poussielgue with favours.

Such were the despatches sent to the Directory by Kléber and M. Poussielgue. General Bonaparte was therein treated as a man who is held to be ruined, and to whom there is no need of showing indulgence. It was believed, in fact, that he was exposed to the two-fold danger of being taken by the English, and severely condemned by the Directory for deserting his army. What would have been the embarrassment of the writers of those despatches, had they known that they would be opened and read by the man who was the object of their calumnies, and who had ere this time become the absolute head of the government!

Kléber, too careless to ascertain himself the real state of things, not even taking the pains to examine whether the statistics he was sending agreed with his own assertions,—Kléber, I say, knew not that he was advancing falsehoods; he transmitted, through negligence and ill-humour, the hearsays which passion had multiplied around him to such a degree as to give them a kind of public credibility. These despatches were intrusted to a cousin of Barras, the Director, and accompanied by a multitude of letters, in which the officers of the army gave vent to a despair as unfounded as it was imprudent. This cousin of Barras was taken by the English; he hastily threw overboard the packet of despatches of which he was the bearer; but it floated, was perceived, picked up, and sent to the British cabinet. We shall soon see what was the result of these mischievous communications, which thus fell into the hands of the English, and were published throughout all Europe.

Kléber and M. Poussielgue, however, had sent duplicates of their despatches to Paris. These duplicates, transmitted by a different channel, reached France, and were delivered to the First Consul.

What truth was there in this picture, drawn by diseased imaginations? Of this we shall soon be enabled to judge with certainty by actual events; meanwhile, we must rectify the false assertions just laid before the reader.

The army, according to Kléber, was reduced to 15,000 men; yet the returns sent to the Directory made it amount to 28,500. When, two years later, it was brought back to France, it still numbered in its ranks 22,000 soldiers, and, in these two years, it fought several pitched battles, and innumerable combats. In 1798 there had left France, in various convoys, 34,000 men. Of these 4000 were landed at Malta; 30,000, therefore, arrived at Alexandria. Subsequently, 3000 sailors, the remnant of the crews of the fleet destroyed at Aboukir, reinforced the army, and again raised it to 33,000 men. In 1798 and 1799, it had lost from 4000 to 5000 soldiers; it was, therefore, reduced to about 28,000, of whom at least 22,000 were fit for duty.

Egypt is a salubrious country, where wounds heal with extreme rapidity: there were, this year, few sick, and no plague-patients. Egypt was full of Christians, Greeks, Syrians, or Copts, urgent to be enlisted into our ranks, and capable of furnishing excellent recruits, to the number of 15,000 or 20,000. The blacks of Darfur, bought and made free, added so many as 500 good soldiers to one of our demi-brigades alone. Egypt, moreover, was subdued. The peasants who cultivate it, accustomed to obey under all masters, never thought of lifting a musket. With the exception of a few insurrections in the towns, there was nothing to be feared but from undisciplined Turks, coming from a distance, or English mercenaries, transported with great trouble by sea. Against such enemies the French army was more than a match, if it were commanded, I do not say with genius, but with ordinary judgment.

Kléber alleged in his despatches that the soldiers were naked; but General Bonaparte had left cloth for clothing them, and, a month after the transmission of this despatch, they were entirely new clothed. At any rate, Egypt abounded in cotton stuffs; it furnished all Africa with them. It could not be difficult to procure these stuffs by purchase, or by requiring them in part payment of the taxes. As regards provision, Egypt is the granary of those countries which are destitute of corn. Wheat, rice, beef, mutton, poultry, sugar, coffee, were then cheaper by tenfold there than in Europe. So low was the price of necessities, that the army, though its finances were not in the most flourishing condition, was able to pay for all that it consumed. Kléber asserted that it was in want of arms. Yet there remained 11,000 swords, 15,000 muskets, and 1400 or 1500 cannon, 180 of which were field-pieces. Alexandria, which, according to him, had been destitute of artillery ever since the siege of St. Jean d'Acre, contained more than 300 pieces in battery. For ammunition, there remained 3,000,000 musket-cartridges, 27,000 gun-cartridges made up, and material for making more; for there were still in the magazines 200,000 projectiles, and 1,100,000 pounds of powder. Subsequent events demonstrated the truth of these allegations, since the army continued to fight two years longer, and surrendered considerable stores to the English. What, in fact, could have become, in so short a time, of the immense matériel carefully accumulated by General Bonaparte on board the fleet which conveyed the army to Egypt?

In regard to the finances, Kléber's report was equally false. The soldiers were paid up. It is true that nothing had yet been decided respecting the financial system best adapted for provisioning the army, without exhausting the country; but the resources existed, and by merely levying the taxes already imposed, the troops might live in abundance. There was due upon the imposts of the year sufficient to provide for all current expenses; that is to say, above 16,000,000*f.* There was, consequently, no danger of driving the population to insurrection by the imposition of new taxes. The financial documents subsequently made public proved that Egypt was capable of furnishing 25,000,000*f.* per year, and that with ease. At this rate it would be paying but half the amount wrung from it, with a thousand vexatious circumstances by the numerous tyrants who oppressed it under the name of Mamelukes. At the price of things in Egypt, the army could be subsisted for 18,000,000*f.* or 20,000,000*f.* As for the chests, so far was General Bonaparte from having exhausted them that, at his departure, he had not even taken the whole of his pay.

As for the dangers with which the colony was threatened, the truth was this: Murad Bey, utterly disheartened, was flying to and fro through Upper Egypt with a handful of Mamelukes. Ibrahim Bey, who, under the government of the Mamelukes, shared the sovereignty with him, was at that time in Lower Egypt, toward the frontiers of Syria. He had not 400 horse with him, much less several thousands. Djeddar Pasha was shut up in St. Jean l'Acre. So far from preparing a reinforcement of 80,000 men for the army of the grand-vizier, he viewed, on the contrary, with high displeasure, the approach of a fresh Turkish army, especially since his pashalic had been delivered from the French. As for the grand-vizier, he was not yet across the Taurus. The English had their troops at Mahon, and were thinking at this moment of employing them in Tuscany, at Naples, or on the coast of France. As for a Russian expedition, that was a mere fable. The Russians never had any idea of taking so long a voyage, for the purpose of furthering the policy of England in the east.

The inhabitants were not so much disposed to insurrection as was represented. By humouring the sheiks, who are the priests and the lawyers of the Arabs, as General Bonaparte had recommended, their attachment would very easily have been gained. We had already begun to make ourselves a party among them. We had, moreover, on our side the Copts, the Greeks, and the Syrians, who, being all Christians, behaved toward us as friends, and were useful auxiliaries. Thus nothing imminent from that quarter was to be apprehended. No doubt, if the French experienced disasters, the Egyptians, with the fickleness of conquered nations, would do as the Italians themselves had recently done, they would join the conqueror of one day against the conqueror of the preceding day. Still they appreciated the difference between the sway of the Mamelukes, who fleeced them, and never were seen but sword in hand, and that of the French, who respected property, and rarely struck off heads.

Kléber, then, had indulged in dangerous exaggerations, the melancholy results of hatred, weariness, and exile. By his side, General Menou, viewing every thing under the most favourable colours, believed the French to be invincible in Egypt, and regarded the expedition as the commencement of a near and momentous revolution in the commerce of the world. Men never can sufficiently divest themselves of personal prejudice in forming opinions of this kind. Kléber and Menou were both honest, upright men; but the one wanted to leave Egypt, the other to stay in it: the clearest, and the most authentic returns, bore to them totally contrary significations—misery and ruin to one, abundance and success to the other.

At any rate, be the situation what it might, Kléber and his party were themselves seriously culpable when they took thought of evacuation, for they had no right to do so. It is true that General Bonaparte, in instructions replete with wisdom, envisaging all possible circumstances, had foreseen the very case in which the army might be obliged to evacuate Egypt. "I am going to France," said he, "either as a private man or as a public man; I will procure succours to be sent to you. But if, next spring,—he was writing in August, 1799—you shall have received no succours, no instructions; if the plague should have carried off more than 1500 men, independently of losses by war; if a considerable force, which you are incapable of resisting, should press you hard, negotiate with the vizier; consent even, if it must be so, to an evacuation, subject to one condition, that of communicating with the French government; and, until that can be effected, continuing to occupy. You will thus nave gained time, and it is impossible that, during the interval, you will not receive succour." These instructions were very sound; but the case foreseen was far from being realized. For this, in the first place, it would have been requisite to wait till the spring of 1800; it would have been requisite that, at this period, no succours, and no orders, should have arrived in Egypt; it would have been requisite that the army should have lost part of its effective force by the plague; and, lastly, that it should be pressed by superior forces: now, nothing of this sort had happened, or did happen. A negotiation opened without these conditions was a real transgression.

In September, 1799—Vendémiaire, year VIII. —Desaix, having completed the conquest and subjugation of Upper Egypt, had left two movable columns for the pursuit of Murad Bey, to whom he had offered peace on condition of his becoming a vassal of France. He had then returned to Cairo by order of Kléber, who wished to make use of his name in those luckless negotiations into which he was about to enter. During these proceedings, the army of the grand-vizier, so long announced, was slowly advancing. Sir Sidney Smith, who conveyed with his squadron the Turkish troops destined to be transported by sea, had just arrived off Damietta with 8000 Janissaries. On the 1st of November, 1799—10th Brumaire, year VIII. —the landing of the first division, of 4000 Janissaries, was effected, towards the Boğaz of Damietta, that is, at the entrance of that branch of the Nile which runs past this town. General Verdier, who had only 1000 men at Damietta, marched out with this small force, and proceeded beyond the fort of Lesbeh, to a narrow tongue of land, on the shore of which the Turks had disembarked, and, without giving time for the other 4000 Janissaries to arrive, attacked the 4000 who had already landed. In spite of the fire of the English artillery, advantageously placed upon an old tower, he beat them, drowned or put to the sword 3000, and took the rest prisoners. The gun-boats, at this sight, returned to their ships, and did not land the remainder of the Turkish troops. The French had only twenty-two men killed and 100 wounded.

On the first tidings of this disembarkation, Kléber had despatched Desaix with a column of 3000 men; but the latter, uselessly sent to Damietta, had found the victory won, and the French filled with unbounded confidence. This brilliant achievement ought to have sufficed to encourage Kléber: unfortunately he was swayed at once by his own chagrin and by that of the army. He had before influenced the troops, who in their turn influenced him to the fatal resolution of an immediate evacuation. General Bonaparte became the theme of renewed invective. That rash young man, it was said, who had exposed the French army to chance, and exposed himself to another chance in braving the seas and the English cruisers in order to return to France, that rash young man could not have escaped the dangers of the passage. The prudent generals trained in the school of the Rhine ought to relinquish the mad delusion, and to carry back to Europe the brave soldiers, indispensable to the Republic now threatened in all quarters.

In this disposition of mind, Kléber had sent to the vizier, who had entered Syria, one of his officers to make new overtures of peace. At a previous period General Bonaparte, with a view to embroiling the vizier with the English, had adopted the idea of setting on foot negotiations, which, on his part, were but a feint. His overtures had been received with great distrust and pride. Kléber's met a more favourable reception, through the influence of Sir Sidney Smith, who was preparing to play a prominent part in the affairs of Egypt.

This officer of the English navy had contributed largely to prevent the success of the siege of St. Jean d'Acre; he was proud of it, and had devised a ruse de guerre, according to the expression of the English agents, which consisted in taking advantage of their momentary weakness to wrest from the French their valuable conquest. Accordingly, as all the intercepted letters of our officers clearly showed their impatient desire to return to France, Sir Sidney Smith wished to induce the army to negotiate and to sign a capitulation; and before the French government should have time to give or to refuse its ratification, to ship it off immediately and to throw it upon the coast of Europe. With this view, he had disposed the grand-vizier to listen to the overtures of Kléber. As for himself, affecting to load the French officers with civilities, he permitted them to receive news from Europe, taking care however that only such intelligence should reach them as was anterior to the 18th of Brumaire. Kléber, on his part, despatched a negotiator to Sir Sidney Smith, for as the English were masters of the sea, he wished to induce them to take part in the negotiation, so that the return to France might be rendered possible. Sir Sidney lent a willing ear to this message, and manifested a disposition to enter into arrangements, adding, moreover, that, by virtue of a treaty of the 5th of January, 1799, negotiated by himself, there existed a triple alliance between Russia, England, and the Porte; that those powers had bound themselves to do every thing jointly; that, in consequence, no arrangement with the Porte could be valid and carried into execution, if it should not be concurred in by the agents of all the three courts. In his communications, Sir Sidney Smith assumed the title of "Minister plenipotentiary of his Britannic Majesty to the Ottoman Porte, commanding his squadron in the waters of the Levant."

Sir Sidney Smith here attributed to himself a title which he had held, but which he had ceased to hold since the arrival of Lord Elgin as ambassador at Constantinople; and, in reality, he had at this moment no other power than what a military commander always has—that of signing conventions of war, suspensions of arms, &c.

Kléber, without closer examination, without knowing whether he was treating with agents sufficiently accredited, blindly entered upon that perilous course into which he was hurried by a feeling common to the whole army, and which would have ended in ignominy if fortunately for him, Heaven had not endowed him with an heroic soul, which could not fail to retrieve itself with glory, as soon as he should discover the extent of his error. He entered, then, into negotiation, and offered to Sir Sidney Smith, as well as to the vizier, who had advanced as far as Gaza in Syria, to appoint officers furnished with full powers to treat. Disliking to receive the Turks in his camp, and unwilling, on the other hand, to risk his officers amidst the undisciplined army of the grand-vizier, he resolved to propose Sir Sidney Smith's ship The Tigre! for the place of the conferences.

Sir Sidney, who was cruising with two ships only—which, be it observed by the way, sufficiently proved the possibility for France to communicate with Egypt—Sir Sidney had at this moment but one; the other, the Theseus, was under repair at Cyprus. Boisterous weather frequently obliging him to stand off shore, his communications with the land were neither regular nor prompt. It took some time to obtain his assent. At length, his answer arrived: it was to this effect, that he would appear successively off Alexandria and Damietta, to take on board the officers whom Kléber should send to him.

Kléber appointed Desaix and Poussielgue, the administrator, the same who had so clumsily slandered General Bonaparte, and whom the Egyptians, in their Arabic narratives, have designated Sultan Kléber's vizier. Poussielgue was an advocate for evacuation, Desaix was opposed to it. The latter had made the utmost exertions to withstand the torrent, to raise the spirits of his companions in arms, and he had undertaken the negotiation commenced by Kléber, solely with the hope of protracting it, and gaining time for the arrival of succour and instructions from France. Kléber, in order to excuse himself to Desaix, told him that it was General Bonaparte who first began to parley with the Turks; that, moreover, he had himself provided, and authorized beforehand, a treaty of evacuation, in case of imminent danger. Desaix, misinformed, still hoped that the first ship which should arrive from France would clear up these obscurities and perhaps change the deplorable dispositions of the staff of the army. He set forth with M. Poussielgue, and unable to join Sir Sidney Smith off Alexandria, found him before Damietta, and went on board the Tigre, on the 22d of December, 1799—1st Nivose, year VIII. It was just at this moment that General Bonaparte was invested with the supreme power in France.

Sir Sidney Smith, delighted to have on board such a plenipotentiary as Desaix, gave him a most flattering reception, and strove by every means of persuasion to bring him to the idea of evacuating Egypt.

Desaix was perfectly competent to defend himself, and held out for the conditions which his principal had instructed him to demand. These conditions being held inadmissible by the English commodore, admirably suited the plans of Desaix, who wished to gain time; on the part of Kléber they were extremely ill-advised, for their extravagance rendered any agreement impossible. But Kléber sought in that very extravagance an excuse for his fault. He demanded, for instance, that the army, retiring with the honours of war, with arms and baggage, should be allowed to land at any point of the continent that he might be pleased to select, in order to afford the Republic the aid of its presence, wherever it might be deemed most serviceable. He demanded that the Porte should restore to us immediately the Venetian islands, which had become French property by the treaty of Campo-Formio, that is to say, Corfu, Zante, Cephalonia, &c., and which were occupied at the moment by Turco-Russian garrisons; that these islands, and above all, Malta, one of much greater importance, should be given up to France; that the possession of them should be guaranteed to her by the persons signing the treaty of evacuation; that the French army, on retiring, should have a right to reinforce and revictual the garrisons; and lastly, that the treaty which united the Porte, Russia, and England, should be instantly annulled, and the triple alliance of the East dissolved.

These conditions were unreasonable, it must be confessed: not that they were an exorbitant equivalent for what was given up by the cession of Egypt, but because they were not feasible. Sir Sidney made Kléber sensible of this. Officers treating for a mere suspension of arms cannot include topics of such vast extent in their negotiation. Zante, Cephalonia, Corfu, were occupied by Turkish and Russian troops; it was requisite, therefore, to refer not only to Constantinople but also to Petersburg. Malta was held under the king of Naples as lord paramount: it could not, therefore, be disposed of without the consent of that prince, who had always refused to cede it to France. To land French troops in the island at that moment, would be in a manner deciding the question. There would be found therein cruisers or garrisons of all the combined powers, who would not retire upon an order from Sir Sidney Smith or the grand vizier. Besides this, England would never consent to a condition insuring the possession of Malta to France. To land a French army on a point of the continent, where it might derange the combinations of the war by its unexpected appearance, would be a step too bold for a mere commodore to think of taking. Lastly, to demand the abolition of the triple alliance was to require of Sir Sidney Smith the abrogation by himself alone, on board his ship, of a treaty ratified by three great powers, which had acquired great importance for the East. Supposing that all these stipulations should be accepted by all the courts whose consent was requisite, it would still be necessary to send to Naples, to London, to St. Petersburg, to Constantinople. Of course this would no longer be a military convention of evacuation, like that which was signed at Marengo, capable of execution on the very instant. If it were referred to London, it must necessarily be referred to Paris also, which Kléber had no wish to do. All this evidently far exceeded the limits of a military capitulation.

When captured ships are taken into the British navy, even when the French name is retained, the English article is used—The Temeraire, The Tigre, &c. H.

Sir Sidney Smith had no difficulty in making the French negotiators feel the force of these reasons. But it was urgently necessary to gain two objects immediately—the departure of the wounded, and of the scientific men attached to the expedition, for whom Desaix solicited safe-conduct, and secondly, a suspension of arms; for the army of the grand-vizier, though marching slowly would soon be in presence of the French. It had actually arrived before the fort of El Arisch, the first French post on the frontiers of Syria, and had summoned it to surrender. Kléber, apprized of this circumstance, had written to Desaix and ordered him to require, as an indispensable condition of these conferences, that the Turkish army should halt on the frontier.

The first point, that relating to the departure of the wounded, and the men of science, rested with Sir Sidney Smith. He assented to it with great cheerfulness and courtesy. As for the armistice, Sir Sidney declared that he would willingly propose it, but he could not answer for obtaining it; for the Turkish army was composed of fanatic and barbarous hordes, and it was a difficult thing to make regular conventions with it, and still more so to insure their execution. To remove this difficulty, he adopted the idea of going to the camp of the grand-vizier, which was in the environs of Gaza. The negotiations, in fact, had been going on for a fortnight, on board the Tigre, while floating at the pleasure of the winds off the coast of Syria and Egypt: the parties had said all that they had to say, and the negotiation could not be continued to any useful purpose but in conjunction with the grand-vizier. Sir Sidney Smith, therefore, proposed to repair thither, in order to arrange there a suspension of arms, and to prepare for the arrival of the French negotiators, if he thought he could insure them safety and respect. This proposal was accepted. Sir Sidney, availing himself of a favourable moment, pushed off in a boat which landed him on the coast, after incurring some danger, and ordered the captain of the Tigre to meet him in the port of Jaffa, where Poussielgue and Desaix were to be put ashore, if the place of conference should be transferred to the camp of the grand-vizier.

At the moment when the English commodore reached the camp, a horrible event had occurred at El Arisch. The Turkish army, composed of a minority of Janissaries, and a majority of Asiatic militia, whom the Mussulman laws place at the disposal of the sultan, presented a confused and undisciplined mass, extremely dangerous to all who wore the European dress. It had been raised in the name of the Prophet; for the Turks were told that this was the last effort that would be required to drive the Infidels out of Egypt; that the redoubtable Sultan of Fire, Bonaparte, had left them: that they were weakened and disheartened; that for the Turks to show themselves would be to conquer; that all Egypt was ready to rise against their domination. These and other things, repeated everywhere, had collected around the grand-vizier a host of 70,000 or 80,000 fanatic Mussulmans. The Turks had been joined by the Mamelukes. Ibrahim Bey, who had sometime before retired to Syria, and Murad Bey, who had descended by a long circuit from the cataracts to the environs of Suez, had become the auxiliaries of their former adversaries. The English had created for this army a sort of field artillery, drawn by mules. The Bedouin Arabs, in the hope of plundering the vanquished, to whichever party they might belong, had placed 15,000 camels at the disposal of the grand-vizier, to assist him to cross the desert which separates Egypt and Palestine. The Turkish generalissimo had in his semi-barbarous staff some English officers, and some of those guilty emigrants, who had taught Djeddar Pasha how to defend St. Jean d'Acre. We shall now see of what horrors those miserable refugees became the cause.

The fort of El Arisch, before which the Turks were at this moment sitting down, was, according to the declaration of General Bonaparte, one of the two keys of Egypt: Alexandria was the other. According to him, an army arriving by sea could not land in great force anywhere but on the beach of Alexandria. An army advancing by land, and compelled to cross the desert of Syria, would be obliged to pass El Arisch, in order to get water at the wells situated at that place. He had therefore ordered important works to be constructed about Alexandria, and the fort of El Arisch to be put in a state of defence. A body of 300 men, supplied with provision and ammunition, were in garrison there, commanded by a valiant officer named Cazals. The Turkish advanced guard having reached El Arisch, colonel Douglass, an English officer in the service of Turkey, summoned Cazals, the commandant, to surrender. A French emigrant in disguise was the bearer of the summons. A parley ensued, and the soldiers were told that the evacuation of Egypt was imminent; that it was already announced as resolved upon; that it would soon be inevitable; and that the desire to oblige them to defend themselves was a piece of useless cruelty. The guilty feelings which the officers had but too much encouraged in the army, then burst forth. The soldiers in garrison at El Arisch, vehemently longing, like their comrades, to leave Egypt, declared to the commandant that they would not fight, and that he must make up his mind to surrender the fort. The gallant Cazals, indignant at this, called them together, addressed them in the noblest language, told them that if there were cowards among them, they might leave the garrison and go to the camp of the Turks, that he gave them full liberty to do so, but that he would resist unto death with those Frenchmen who continued faithful to their duty. These words revived for a moment the feeling of honour in the hearts of the soldiers. The summons was rejected, and the attack commenced. The Turks were not capable of carrying a position that was defended, were it never so little. The batteries of the fort silenced all their artillery. Under the direction, however, of English and emigrant officers, they pushed their treaches to the salient angle of a bastion. The commandant ordered a few grenadiers to make a sortie, for the purpose of driving the Turks from the first branch of the trench. Captain Ferray, who was appointed to head the party, was followed by three grenadiers only. Finding himself deserted, he returned to the fort. Meanwhile the mutineers had struck the colours, but a sergeant of grenadiers had hoisted them again. A struggle ensued. During this contest, the recreants, who insisted on surrendering, threw ropes to the Turks; these ferocious enemies, once hoisted up into the fort, fell sword in hand upon the dastardly beings who had given them admission into the fort, and slaughtered many of them. The rest, returning to their senses, joined the remainder of the garrison, defended themselves with desperate courage, and were most of them cut in pieces. Some few obtained quarter, thanks to Colonel Douglass, and owed their lives to the interference of that humane, gallant, and distinguished officer.

Thus fell the fort of El Arisch. This was a first effect of the deplorable disposition prevailing in the army, the first fruit reaped by the leaders from their own errors.

It was now the 30th of December—9th Nivôse:—the letter written by Sir Sidney Smith to the grand-vizier, to propose to him a suspension of arms, had not reached him in time to prevent the melancholy catastrophe at El Arisch. Sir Sidney Smith was a man of generous feelings. This barbarous massacre of a French garrison disgusted him; and, above all, it made him fear a rupture of the negotiations. He lost no time in sending explanations to Kléber, both in his own name and in that of the grand-vizier, and he added formal assurances that all hostilities should cease pending the negotiations.

At the sight of these hordes, which rather resembled a migration of savage tribes than an army going to battle, fighting among themselves at night over their provisions or for the possession of a well, Sir Sidney Smith felt alarmed for the safety of the French plenipotentiaries. He insisted that the tents destined for their reception should be pitched in the very quarter of the grand-vizier and the reis-effendi, who were both present with the army; and that a guard of picked men should be stationed about these tents; he caused his own tents to be pitched beside them; and, lastly, he provided a detachment of English seamen, to secure both himself, and the French officers intrusted to his honour, from all violence. Having taken these precautions, he sent to Jaffa, to fetch Messrs. Poussielgue and Desaix to the place where the conferences were to be held.

Kléber, when informed of the massacre of El Arisch, did not manifest so much indignation as he ought to have done; he was aware that, if he should be too warm upon that subject, all the negotiations would be broken off.

He was more urgent than ever for a suspension of arms; and, at the same time, as a measure of precaution, and in order to be nearer to the theatre of the conferences, he left Cairo, and transferred his head-quarters to Salahieh, on the very border of the desert, two days' march from El Arisch.

In the mean time, Desaix and Poussielgue, detained by contrary winds, had not been able to land at Gaza till the 11th of January—21st Nivôse,—or to reach El Arisch before the 13th. The conferences commenced as soon as they arrived, and the indignation of Desaix had wellnigh broken off the negotiations. The Turks, ignorant and barbarous, interpreting in their way the conduct of the French, attributed their disposition to treat, not to an immoderate desire to return to France, but to fear of fighting. They required, therefore, that the army should surrender themselves prisoners of war. Desaix was for putting an end at once to all kind of communication, but Sir Sidney interposed, prevailed on both parties to moderate their terms, and proposed honourable conditions, if honourable they could be as pertaining to a resolution of this nature. It was no longer possible to advance Kléber's original conditions. Of this he was himself convinced, by the letters which had been written to him from on board the Tigre, and he said no more about the Venetian Islands, Malta, or the revictualing of those islands. To give a colour, nevertheless, to his capitulation, he still adhered to one point—that the Porte should withdraw from the triple alliance. This point, strictly considered, was susceptible of being negotiated at El Arisch, since the grand-vizier and the reis-effendi were at hand; but it could scarcely be demanded of the English negotiator, whose intervention, however, was indispensable. This condition, therefore, was set aside, like the others. It was a vain artifice, which Kléber and his advisers employed toward themselves, in the desire of concealing from their own eyes the unworthiness of their own conduct.

The pure and simple evacuation, and its conditions, ere long became the sole subject of negotiation. After long discussion, it was agreed that all hostility should cease for three months; that those three months should be employed by the vizier in collecting, in the ports of Rosetta, Aboukir, and Alexandria, the vessels requisite for the conveyance of our army; by General Kléber in evacuating the Upper Nile, Cairo, and the contiguous provinces, and in concentrating his troops upon the points of embarkation; that the French should depart with arms and baggage, that is to say, with the honours of war; that they should take with them such military stores as they had need of, and leave the rest; that, from the day of the signature, they should cease to impose contributions, and should abandon to the Porte such as were still due; but that, in under Moreau, whose successes he shared, and frequently insured. After the peace of Campo Formio he was appointed second in command to the army of England, and subsequently accompanied Bonaparte to Egypt. On his return to Europe he chiefly contributed, as related in vol. I of the text, to the victory of Marengo.—Biographie Moderne.

• DESAIX, L. C. A. Born 1768 at the Chateau de Vengon near Riom, of a noble family, went through his studies at the college of Emat. In 1784 entered the foot regiment of Brittany as sub-lieutenant. In the campaign of Alsace, 1793, he displayed considerable talent. In 1794 joined the army of the North under Pichegru, in 1796 was recalled to the army of the Rhine

return, the French army should receive 3000 purses, equivalent at that time to 3,000,000 francs, and representing the sum necessary for its subsistence. During the evacuation and the passage. The forts of Katieh, Salahieh, and Belbeis, forming the frontier of Egypt towards the desert of Syria, should be given up ten days after the ratification; Cairo forty days after. It was agreed that the ratification should be given within eight days by General Kléber alone, and without any reference to the French government. Lastly, Sir Sidney engaged, in his own name, and in the name of the Russian commissioner, to furnish the army with passports, which should prevent molestation from English cruisers.

The French commissioners here committed an error in form, which was of serious consequence. The signature of Sir Sidney Smith was indispensable, for, without that signature, the sea continued closed to them. They ought to have required Sir Sidney Smith, since he was the negotiator of that convention, to sign it. The mystery of his powers would then have been cleared up. It would then have transpired that the English commodore, though he formerly held powers to treat with the Porte, had none at this moment, Lord Elgin having arrived as minister at Constantinople; that he had no special instructions for the present case; that he had merely very strong presumptions that his conduct would be approved in London. The French plenipotentiaries, not conversant with diplomatic usages, supposed that Sir Sidney Smith, offering passports, was qualified to give them, and that these passports would be valid.

The terms of the convention being arranged, there was nothing more to be done but to sign it. But the noble heart of Desaix revolted from what he was obliged to do. Before placing his name at the foot of such a paper, he sent for Savary,¹ his aide-de-camp, directed him to proceed to head-quarters at Salahieh, where Kléber then was, to communicate to him the draft of the convention, and to declare that he would not sign it, till he should receive from him a formal order to that effect. Savary went, repaired to Salahieh, and delivered to Kléber the message with which he was charged. Kléber, who had a vague sense of his error, determined, in order to cover it, to assemble a council of war, to which all the generals of the army were summoned.

The council met on the 21st of January, 1800—1st Pluviôse, year VIII. The minutes of it still exist. It is painful to see brave men, who had shed their blood, who were going to shed it again for their country, accumulate wretched falsehoods to colour a criminal weakness. This example ought to serve as a lesson to military officers; it ought to teach them that it is not enough to be firm under fire, and that the courage which braves balls and bullets is the least of the virtues imposed by their noble profession. In this council of war, great stress was laid on the intelligence which had then reached Egypt, that the great combined French and Spanish fleet had sailed out of the Mediterranean into the ocean; whence it was concluded that all hope of succour from France was at an end. In proof of this, it was argued that five months had elapsed since the departure of General Bonaparte—five months, during which no despatch had arrived. An argument was made of the discouragement of the army, which the very persons who used it had themselves contributed to produce. They adverted to what had recently happened at Rosetta and Alexandria, where the garrisons had behaved like that of El Arisch, threatening to revolt, if they were not immediately taken back to Europe. They alleged that the active army was reduced to 8000 men; they exaggerated, beyond measure, the force of the Turkish army; they talked of a pretended Russian expedition that was about to join the grand-vizier—an expedition which had no existence but in the heated imaginations of those who were desirous to forsake Egypt at any rate. They asserted, as a positive fact, the impossibility of resistance—an assertion which was so soon to be contradicted, in an heroic manner, by the very persons who so stoutly maintained it. Lastly, to keep as closely as possible within the instructions of General Bonaparte, they brought forward some cases of plague, extremely doubtful and, for the rest, absolutely unknown in the army.

Notwithstanding all that was said, however, the partisans of the evacuation were far from adhering to the instructions left by General Bonaparte. He had laid down as conditions:—1. That no succours, no orders, should have arrived by the spring of 1800. 2. That the plague should have carried off 1500 men, besides the losses from war. 3. That the danger should be so great as to render all resistance impossible: and, these circumstances being realized, he had recommended to his successor to gain time in negotiating, and not to consent to the evacuation, but on condition of its ratification by France. Now, it was still only January, 1800; there was no plague, no pressing danger; and yet an immediate evacuation was the point to be decided, and without any reference to France.

A man who has exhibited in war something superior to courage, that is to say character, General Davout, since marshal and prince of Eckmühl, was the only one who durst withstand this culpable impulsion. He was not afraid to oppose Kléber, to whose ascendancy all the rest bowed, and combated with energy the proposed capitulation. But he was not listened to; and, from a mischievous complaisance, he consented to sign the resolution of the council of war, by suffering an entry to be made in the minutes that it had been adopted unanimously.

Davout, nevertheless, took Savary aside, and charged him to assure Desaix that if he choose to break off the negotiation he would find support in the army. Savary returned to the

¹ SAVARY, RENE. Son to the major of the Castle of Sedan. The revolution quickly made him an officer, and he was successively aide-de-camp to Generals Férino and Desaix. He distinguished himself under the latter in the passage of the Rhine, accompanied him to Egypt, was beside him when he received his mortal wound at Marengo, and was thenceforth attached to the person of Napoleon.

camp at El Arisch, and communicated to Desaix what had passed, and the message which Davout had desired him to deliver. Desaix, finding Davout's name subscribed to the deliberations, replied with warmth to Savary, "Whom then would you have me trust, when the very man who disapproves the convention dares not make his signature agree with his opinion? He would have me disobey, and yet dares not maintain to the end the sentiments which he has expressed!" Desaix, though deeply grieved, yet, on seeing the torrent, gave way to it himself, and affixed his signature on the 28th of January, to that unlucky convention, afterwards celebrated by the title of the convention of El Arisch (8th Pluviôse.)

When the thing was done, people began to be sensible of its importance. Desaix, on his return to the camp, spoke of it with grief, and did not conceal his deep mortification at having been selected for such a mission, and forced to fulfil it by an order from the general-in-chief. Davout, Menou, and some others, launched out into bitter invectives: dissensions broke forth on all sides in the camp of Salahieh.

Meanwhile, preparations were making for departure: the great majority of the army were overjoyed at the prospect of leaving their distant lands, and soon beholding France again. Sir Sidney Smith had returned to his ship. The vizier advanced and took possession, consecutively, of the intrenched positions of Katiéh, Salahieh, and Kelbeis, which Kléber, in haste to execute the convention, faithfully delivered up to him. Kléber returned to Cairo, to make his preparations for departure, to call in the troops that were guarding Upper Egypt, to concentrate his army, and then to direct it upon Alexandria and Rosetta, at the time stipulated for embarkation.

While these events were occurring in Egypt—baneful consequences of a sentiment which the chiefs of the army had fanned instead of stifling—other events, natural consequences of the same causes, were taking place in Europe. In fact, the letters and despatches, sent in duplicate, had, as we have seen, arrived at the same time in London and Paris. The accusatory despatch directed against General Bonaparte, and addressed to the Directory, had been delivered to General Bonaparte himself, who had become the head of the government. He was shocked at so many weaknesses and falsehoods; but he was sensible how much the army needed Kléber; he appreciated the great qualities of that general, and, not conceiving that his discouragement could proceed to such a length as to induce him to give up Egypt, he took no notice of his own grievances. He hastened, therefore, to despatch from France instructions and an intimation of the great success which he was preparing to send.

The British government, on its part, having received a duplicate of Kléber's despatches, and a great number of letters written by our officers to their families, caused them all to be published, with a view to exhibit to Europe the situation of the French in Egypt, and to embroil Generals Kléber and Bonaparte. It was a perfectly natural calculation on the part of an hostile power. At the same time, the English cabinet had received advice of the overtures made by General Kléber to the grand-vizier and to Sir Sidney Smith. Believing that the French army was reduced to the last extremity, it lost no time in sending off an express order not to grant any capitulation, unless they surrendered themselves prisoners of war. Mr. Dundas even made use, in his place in parliament, of odious expressions. "An example," he said, "must be made of that army, which, in a time of profound peace, has dared to invade the dominions of one of our allies; the interests of mankind require that it should be destroyed."

This language was barbarous; it displays the violence of the passions which then filled the hearts of the two nations. The English cabinet had taken literally the exaggerations of Kléber and of our officers; it considered the French as reduced to submit to any conditions that might be imposed upon them; and, not foreseeing what was passing, it had the imprudence to give positive orders to Lord Keith, the admiral commanding in the Mediterranean, not to sign any capitulation but on the express condition that the French troops should become prisoners of war.

These orders, despatched from London on the 17th of December, reached Admiral Keith in the island of Minorca in the first days of January, 1800; and, on the 8th of the same month, that admiral hastened to forward to Sir Sidney Smith the instructions which he had just received from his government. It took time, especially at that season, to cross the Mediterranean. The communications of Lord Keith did not reach Sir Sidney Smith before the 20th of February. The latter was deeply chagrined. He had acted without precise instructions from his government, reckoning upon it that his acts would be approved. He thus found himself in a false position with the French, for they might, with apparent reason, accuse him of breach of faith. Better acquainted, besides, with the real state of things, he was well aware that Kléber would never consent to surrender himself prisoner of war; and he saw the convention of El Arisch, so adroitly wrung from the weakness of a moment, wholly set aside. He lost no time in writing to Kléber, to express his mortification, to apprise him honestly of what was passing, to advise him to suspend immediately the delivery of the Egyptian fortresses to the grand-vizier, and to conjure him to wait for fresh orders from England before he took any definite resolutions.

Unfortunately, when these advices from Sir Sidney arrived at Cairo, the French army had already executed in part the treaty of El Arisch. It had delivered up to the Turks all the posi-

* LORD KEITH. A very gallant man and able officer. On the 4th of May, 1798, he offered battle off Cadiz with sixteen sail to twenty-six French sail of the line, which they declined. On the 19th of June he captured the La Junon, L'Alceste, La Courageuse, La Salamine, and L'Alerte, bound from Egypt to Toulon. He rejected the treaty of El Arisch, signed the capitulation of Menou, afterward commanded in the North Sea; and finally was the admiral who gave the sailing orders for St. Helena to the Bellerophon with Napoleon on board.—Brown's Naval History.

sons on the right bank of the Nile, Katieh, Salahieh, Belbeis, and some of the positions of the Delta, particularly the town of Damietta and the fort of Lesbeh. The troops were already on march for Alexandria, with their baggage and stores. The division of Upper Egypt had put the Turks in possession of the Upper Nile, and was falling back upon Cairo, for the purpose of rejoining the rest of the army towards the sea. Desaix, availing himself of the order which he had received to return to France, and disliking to have any hand in the details of that ignominious retreat, had set out with Davout, who, for his part, could not stay any longer with Kléber. Kléber, forgetting his bickerings with Davout, was anxious to retain him, and had offered him the rank of general of division, which he had authority to confer as governor of Egypt. Davout refused it, saying that he should not like his promotion to bear the date of such a deplorable event. But, when Desaix and Davout were embarking, M. de Latour Maubourg, arriving from France, with the despatches of the First Consul, met them on the beach, informed them of the revolution of the 18th of Brumaire, and of the elevation of General Bonaparte to the supreme power. Thus Kléber, at the moment when he had just given up the fortified positions, learned that the convention of El Arisch would not be executed, and received the intelligence, not less momentous to him, of the establishment of the consular government.

But there had been sufficient weakness for a great character: an ignominious offer was now about to recall Kléber to himself, and to make him what he really was—a hero. He was obliged either to surrender himself prisoner, or to defend himself in a much worse situation than that which he had declared to be untenable in the council of war at Salahieh; he was obliged either to submit to dishonour, or to engage in a desperate struggle. Kléber did not hesitate, and we shall see that, notwithstanding his much worse situation, he contrived to do what a few days before he judged to be impossible, and thus gave the noblest of contradictions to himself.

Kléber instantly countermanded all the orders previously given to the army. He brought back from Lower Egypt to Cairo part of the troops that had already descended the Nile; he ordered his stores to be sent up again: he urged the division of Upper Egypt to make haste to rejoin him, and gave notice to the grand-vizier to suspend his march towards Cairo, otherwise he should immediately commence hostilities. The grand-vizier replied that the convention of El Arisch was signed; that it must be executed; that, in consequence, he should advance towards the capital. At the same instant, an officer sent from Minorca with a letter from Lord Keith to Kléber, arrived at the headquarters. Among other expressions, that letter contained the following: "I have received positive orders from his Britannic Majesty, not to consent to any capitulation with the army under your command, unless the troops lay down their arms, surrender themselves prisoners of war, and give up all the ships in the harbour of Alexandria."

Kléber, fired with indignation, caused Lord Keith's letter to be inserted in the order of the day, adding to it these few words: "Soldiers, to such insults, there is no other answer than victory. Prepare for action."

This noble language found an echo in every breast. The situation was greatly changed since the 28th of January, the day on which the convention of El Arisch was signed. The French then held all the fortified positions in Egypt; they ruled the Egyptians, who were quiet and submissive; the grand-vizier was on the other side of the desert. Now, on the contrary, the most important posts were given up; they had possession of the plain only; the population was everywhere awake; the inhabitants of Cairo, excited by the presence of the grand-vizier, who was at the distance of five hours' march, was waiting only for the first signal to rise. The dismal picture drawn in the council of war, in which the convention of El Arisch was discussed,—that picture, then false, was now strictly true. The French army was about to fight in the plain which borders the Nile, having in front the vizier, with 80,000 men, and on its rear the 300,000 inhabitants of Cairo ready to revolt; and it was without fear! Glorious reparation of a great fault!

Agents of Sir Sidney Smith's had hastened up, to interpose between the French and the Turks, and to make fresh proposals of accommodation. Letters, they said, had just been written to London; when the convention of El Arisch was known there, it would be ratified to a certainty; in this situation, it would be right to suspend hostilities, and wait. To this the grand-vizier and Kléber consented, but on conditions that were irreconcilable. The grand-vizier insisted that Cairo should be given up to him; Kléber, on the contrary, that the vizier should fall back to the frontier. In this state of things, fighting was the only resource.

On the 20th of March, 1800,—29th Ventôse, year VIII.—before daybreak, the French army marched from Cairo, and deployed in the rich plains which border the Nile, having the river on the left, the desert on the right and in front, but at a distance, the ruins of ancient Heliopolis. Night, almost luminous in this climate, facilitated the manœuvres, but without rendering them distinct to the enemy. The army formed itself into four squares; two on the left, under General Reynier,² two on the

¹ LATOUR MAUBOURG, VICTOR FAY, Marquis de. Born at Vivarais of an ancient family, in 1756. Was in the king's body-guard, and defended the royal family on the night of October 5. Emigrated August 10, 1792. He returned on the amnesty of the 18th Brumaire. Entered the service of the republic, and distinguished himself in Egypt and elsewhere.—Encyclopædia Americana. H.

² REYNIER, E. Born at Lausanne in 1771. In 1792 served on the staff in Holland. Was promoted to the rank of adjutant-general, and contributed to the successes of the French army at Lille, Menin, and Courtrai.

Distinguished himself at the passage of the Waal in Holland: and yet farther in the first campaign of the Rhine, under Moreau, in which he displayed singular nobleness and incorruptibility of character. In Egypt, no general gained more honour. At the Pyramids he did much for the victory. At El Arisch he defeated 20,000 Turks with four French battalions. He conducted the siege of Acre, while Bonaparte was fighting at Mount Tabor, and did much toward the victory of Heliopolis.—Biographie Moderne. ■ sight, under General Friant. They were each composed of two demi-brigades of infantry, drawn up in several lines. At the angles and outside were companies of grenadiers, with their backs to the squares, serving to reinforce them during the march and in charges of cavalry, and separating from them to attack defended positions when the enemy attempted to make a stand. At the centre of the line of battle, that is to say, between the two squares on the left, and the two squares on the right, the cavalry was disposed in a deep mass, having light artillery on its wings. At some distance in the rear, and on the left, a fifth square, smaller than the others, was destined to act as a reserve. The number of the troops that Kléber had collected in this plain of Heliopolis might be estimated at somewhat less than 10,000 men. They were firm and tranquil.

Day began to dawn. Kléber, who, since he had been commander-in-chief, had displayed a sort of magnificence, in order to make an impression on the Egyptians, was dressed in a rich uniform. Mounted on a horse of great height, he exhibited to the soldiers that noble countenance which they so much loved to behold, and the manly beauty of which filled them with confidence. "My friends," said he, as he rode through their ranks, "you possess in Egypt no more than the ground under your feet. If you recoil but a single step, you are undone!" His presence and his words were everywhere hailed with the greatest enthusiasm; and, as soon as it was quite light, he gave orders for marching forward.

As yet, only part of the army of the grand-vizier was in sight. In that plain of the Nile which extended before us, appeared the village of El Matarieh, which the Turks had entrenched. Here was an advanced-guard of from 5000 to 6000 Janissaries, very good soldiers, escorted by some thousand horse. A little beyond, another body appeared to harbour a design to glide between the river and our left wing, for the purpose of raising Cairo in our rear. In front, and at a much greater distance, the ruins of ancient Heliopolis, a wood of palm-trees, and considerable undulations of the ground, hid the bulk of the Turkish army from the view of our soldiers. The total number of all these forces, including the principal body, the corps placed at El Matarieh, and the detachment on march to penetrate into the city of Cairo, might be computed at 70,000 or 80,000 men.

Kléber first ordered a squadron of mounted guides to charge the detachment manœuvring on our left, for the purpose of introducing itself into Cairo. The guides dashed off at a gallop upon this confused mass. The Turks, who never feared cavalry, received and returned the shock. They completely enveloped our horse, which was in danger of being cut to pieces, when Kléber sent to their relief the 22d regiment of chasseurs and the 14th of dragoons, who, charging the dense mass by which the guides were, in a manner, surrounded, used their swords so well as to disperse and put them to flight. The Turks then retired out of sight.

This day Kléber hastened to attack the entrenched village of El Matarieh, before the main body of the enemy's army had time to come up. This duty he assigned to General Reynier, with the two squares on the left; and he himself, with the two squares on the right, wheeling about, posted himself between El Matarieh and Heliopolis, to prevent the Turkish army from coming to the assistance of the attacked position.

Reynier, having reached the village of El Matarieh, detached the companies of grenadiers which lined the angles of the squares, and ordered them to charge the village. These companies advanced, forming two small columns. The brave Janissaries would not wait for them to come up, but went to meet them. Our grenadiers, receiving them firmly, poured upon them, when close to those muzzles of their pieces, a discharge of musketry, which struck down a great number, and then charged with fixed bayonets. While the first column was attacking the Janissaries in front, the second took them in flank, and completed their dispersion. The two columns united then fell upon El Matarieh, amidst a shower of balls. They rushed with the bayonet on the Turks, who resisted, and, after a great carnage, made themselves masters of the position. The Turks fled into the plain; and, joining those whom the guides, chasseurs, and dragoons, had just before dispersed, ran in disorder towards Cairo, with Nassif-Pasha, the lieutenant of the grand-vizier, at their head.

The village of El Matarieh, full of spoils in the Oriental fashion, presented an ample booty to our soldiers. But they did not stop there; both generals and soldiers were aware how important it was not to be surprised, in the midst of a village, by the mass of the Turkish troops. The army, resuming by degrees the same order as in the morning, advanced into the plain, still formed into several squares, with the cavalry in the middle. It passed the ruins of Heliopolis, and perceived beyond them a cloud of dust rising on the horizon, and rapidly advancing towards us. On the left appeared the village of Seriaquous; on the right, amidst a wood of palms, the village of El Merg, situated on the margin of a small lake, called the Lake of the Pilgrims. A slight elevation of ground ran from one to the other of these villages. All at once, this moving cloud of dust stood still, and was presently dispersed by a breeze, leaving the Turkish army exposed to view; it formed a long, floating line from Seriaquous to El Merg. Placed on the elevation just mentioned, it somewhat overlooked the ground upon which our troops were deployed. Kléber then gave orders to advance. Reynier, with the two squares on the left, marched towards Seriaquous; Friant, with the two squares on the right, moved upon El Merg. The enemy had sprinkled a considerable number of tirailleurs in advance of the palm-trees which surround El Merg. But a fight of tirailleurs could scarcely be successful against such soldiers as ours. Friant sent a few companies of light infantry, which soon obliged these detached Turks to rejoin the confused mass of their army. The grand-vizier was there, in the midst of a group of horsemen, whose bright armour glistened in the sun. Our howitzer fire soon dispersed this group. The enemy brought forward his artillery, with the intention of replying; but his shot, ill-directed, passed over the heads of our soldiers. His pieces were soon dismounted by ours, and put hors de combat. The thousand colours of the Turkish army were then seen waving, and part of its squadrons rushed out of the village of El Merg upon the squares of Friant's division. The deep fissures in the ground, the ordinary effect of a hot sun upon a soil long inundated, fortunately checked the impetuosity of the horses. General Friant, suffering these Turkish horse to advance nearly to the muzzles of the guns, gave orders for a sudden discharge of grape-shot, which swept them down by hundreds. They retired in confusion.

¹ BELLARD, FRIANT, and VERDIER. Three generals of some ability, but not sufficient merit to entitle them to any very high distinction in that era of great men and great events. BELLARD was subsequently severely defeated near Cairo.

This was but the prelude to a general attack. The Turkish army was visibly preparing for it. Our squares waited with firmness, two on the right, two on the left, the cavalry in the centre, facing both before and behind, and covered by two lines of artillery. At a signal given by the grand vizier, the entire mass of the Turkish cavalry set itself in motion, rushed upon our squares, spread itself upon their wings, turned them, and soon surrounded the four fronts of our order of battle. The French infantry, unmoved by the shouts, the bustle, the tumult of the Turkish cavalry, remained calm, with bayonet presented, keeping up a continued and well directed fire. In vain these thousand groups of horse whirled round it: they fell under the grape-shot and the balls, rarely coming up to its bayonets, expired at its feet, or turned about and fled, never to show themselves again.

After a long and frightful confusion, the sky, darkened by smoke and dust, suddenly became clear; the sun burst forth, and our victorious troops beheld before them a mass of men and horses, dead or dying; and, at a distance, as far as the eye could reach, bands of fugitives running away in all directions.

The main body of the Turks was retiring, in fact, towards El Kangah, where they had encamped the preceding night, on the road to Lower Egypt. A few groups only went to rejoin those parties which, under Nassif-Pasha, lieutenant of the grand-vizier, had in the morning directed their steps towards Cairo.

Kléber resolved not to allow the enemy any rest. Our squares, preserving their order of battle, crossed the plain at a rapid pace, and, passing Seriaquous and El Merg, advanced to El Kangah. We arrived there at night. The enemy, finding himself closely pressed, again fled in disorder, leaving to our army the provisions and baggage, of which we stood in great need.

Thus, in that plain of Heliopolis, 10,000 soldiers, by superiority in discipline and quiet courage, dispersed 70,000 or 80,000 foes. But, to obtain a more beneficial result than that of a few thousand killed, wounded, and stretched in the dust, it would be necessary to pursue the Turks, to drive them into the desert, and to cause them to perish there by hunger, thirst, and the sword of the Arabs. The French army was exhausted with fatigue. Kléber allowed it a little rest, and gave orders for the pursuit on the following day.

We had scarcely 200 or 300 wounded or dead, for in this species of combat, troops in a square, which preserve themselves unbroken, sustain but little loss. Kléber, at this moment, hearing cannon towards Cairo, had no doubt that the corps which had turned his left had gone to second the revolt of that city. Nassif-Pasha, the vizier's lieutenant, and Ibrahim Bey, one of the two Mameluke chiefs, had actually entered it with 2000 Mamelukes, 8000 or 10,000 Turkish horse, and some revolted villagers of the environs, in all about 20,000 men. Kléber had left scarcely 2000 in that great capital, distributed in the citadel and the forts. He ordered General Lagrange to set out in the middle of that same night, with four battalions, and go to their relief. He enjoined all the commandants of troops left at Cairo to take strong positions, to keep in communication with one another, but not to attempt any decisive attack before his return. He was apprehensive of some false manœuvre on their part, which might uselessly endanger the lives of the soldiers, every day more and more precious, now that they were absolutely doomed to remain in Egypt.

During the whole time that the battle had lasted, the second Mameluke chief, Murad Bey, who had formerly shared with Ibrahim Bey the rule over Egypt, who was distinguished from his colleague by brilliant valour, chivalrous generosity, and great intelligence, had remained on the wings of the Turkish army, motionless, at the head of 600 superb horse. When the battle was over, he had plunged into the desert and disappeared. It was in consequence of a promise given to Kléber, that he had thus acted. Murad Bey, who had recently arrived at the vizier's head-quarters, had felt the old jealousy which so long divided the Turks and the Mamelukes spring up again within him. He was aware that the Turks were anxious to recover Egypt, not to restore it to the Mamelukes, but to possess it themselves. He, therefore, thought to conciliate the French, under the idea of allying himself with them if they were victorious, or of succeeding them if they were vanquished. Acting, however, with circumspection, he refrained from the manifestation of his sentiments till hostilities were definitively resumed, and had promised Kléber to declare for him after the first battle. That battle was fought; it was glorious for the French, and his sympathy for them could not fail to be greatly augmented by it. There was reason to hope that, in a few days, we should have him for our professed ally.

In the middle of the very night which followed the battle, after allowing the troops a few hours rest, Kléber ordered the drums to beat to arms, and marched for Belbeis, determined not to give any respite to the Turks. He arrived there very early in the day. This was the 21st of March—30th Ventôse. The vizier, in his rapid flight, was already beyond Belbeis. He had left in the fort and town a corps of infantry, and in the plain a thousand horse. On the approach of our troops these horse fled. The Turks were driven out of the town; they were shut up in the fort, where, after exchanging a few cannon-shot, want of water and fear induced them to surrender. So great was the fanaticism of these Turkish troops, that some men chose rather to be slaughtered than to give up their arms. Meanwhile, the cavalry of General Leclerc, scouring the plain, seized a long caravan of camels proceeding towards Cairo, and laden with the baggage of Nassif-Pasha and Ibrahim Bey. This capture revealed more completely to Kléber the real design of the Turks, which consisted in exciting not only the capital but all the large towns in Egypt to rise against the French. Apprized of this design, and finding that the Turkish army made no stand anywhere, he detached General Friant with five battalions for Cairo, to support the four battalions sent in the night from El Kangah, under the orders of General Lagrange.

Next day, March 22d—1st Germinal—he set out for Salahieh. General Reynier preceded him at the head of the left division: he himself followed with the guides and the 7th hussars. Lastly came General Belliard, with his brigade, the rest of Friant's division. During the march, a message was received from the grand-vizier, who desired to negotiate. The only answer returned was a refusal. Not far from Karaim, half-way to Salahieh, a violent cannonade was heard; soon afterwards Reynier's division was seen formed in square and engaged with a multitude of horse. Kléber sent word to Belliard to hasten his march, and he himself, with the cavalry, proceeded with the utmost expedition towards Reynier's square. But at this sight the Turks, who were attacking Reynier's division, liking better to have to do with the French cavalry than with the infantry, fell upon the guides and the 7th hussars, whom Kléber was bringing with him. Their charge was so sudden that the light artillery had not time to place itself in battery. The drivers were slaughtered on their guns. Kléber, with the guides and the hussars, was for a moment in the greatest danger, especially as the inhabitants of Karaim, thinking that it was all over with such a handful of French, had hastened to the spot with pitch-forks and scythes to finish them. But Reynier immediately sent the 14th dragoons, which extricated Kléber in time. Belliard, who had pushed on at a great rate, came up soon afterwards with his infantry, and cut in pieces some hundred men.

Kléber, anxious to reach Salahieh, hastened his march, deferring till his return the punishment of Karaim. The heat of the day was oppressive; the wind blew from the desert, and along with a scorching air was inhaled a fine, penetrating dust. Men and horses were exhausted with fatigue. At length, about nightfall, they arrived at Salahieh. They were now on the very frontier of Egypt, at the entrance of the desert of Syria, and Kléber expected to have on the morrow a final engagement with the grand-vizier. But, on the morning of the next day, March 23d—2d Germinal—the inhabitants of Salahieh came to meet him, and informed him that the vizier was continuing his flight in the greatest disorder. Kléber hastened forward, and with his own eyes beheld this sight, which proved how much he had exaggerated to himself the danger of Turkish armies.

The grand-vizier, taking with him 500 of his best horse, had penetrated with some baggage into the desert. The rest of his army was fleeing in all directions; one part was running towards the Delta; a second begged upon its knees for quarter; a third, seeking an asylum in the desert, was slaughtered by the Arabs. These last, after convoying the Turkish army, had remained on the frontier, knowing that one party or the other must be vanquished, and that, of course, there would be booty to pick up. Their conclusion was correct; for, finding the Turkish army completely demoralized and incapable of defending itself even against them, they murdered the fugitives for the purpose of plundering them. Just at the moment when Kléber arrived, they had borne down upon the deserted camp of the vizier, and pounced upon it like a flock of birds of prey. At the sight of our army, they fled away on their swift horses, leaving abundant spoils to our soldiers. Here, in the intrenched space of a square league, they found an infinite multitude of tents, horses, cannon, and a great quantity of saddles and harness of all sorts, 40,000 horse-shoes, a profusion of provisions and of rich apparel, boxes already broken open by the Arabs, but still full of perfumes of aloes, silk stuffs, in short of all those articles that compose the dazzling and barbarous luxury of oriental armies. Along with twelve litters of wood, carved and gilt, there was a carriage hung on springs after the European fashion, of English manufacture; and pieces of cannon were found with the motto Honi soit qui mal y pense: a certain evidence of the very active intervention of the English in this war.

Our soldiers, who had brought nothing with them, found, in the Turkish camp, provisions, ammunition, a rich booty, and objects the singularity of which made them laugh, as they were always disposed to do after a brief moment of dejection. Strange power of the mind over man! Now, victorious, they had no wish to leave Egypt, and no longer considered themselves doomed to perish in distant exile!

When Kléber had ascertained with his own eyes that the Turkish army had disappeared, he resolved to return and reduce the towns of Lower Egypt, and Cairo in particular, to their duty. He made the following dispositions:—Generals Rampon and Lanusse were ordered to scour the Delta; Rampon was to march to the important town of Damietta, which was in the hands of the Turks, and to retake it. Lanusse was to keep in communication with Rampon, to sweep the Delta from Damietta to Alexandria, and to reduce successively the revolted villages. Belliard had the general commission to support these different operations, and the special commission to second Rampon in his attack on Damietta, and to retake himself the fort of Lesbeh, which commands one of the mouths of the Nile. Kléber, moreover, left Reynier at Salahieh, to prevent the remnants of the Turkish army, which had fled into the deserts of Syria, from coming back. The latter was to remain in observation on the frontier till the Arabs had completed the dispersion of the Turks, and then return to Cairo. Lastly, Kléber himself set out on the next day, March 24th—3d Germinal—with the 88th demi-brigade, two companies of grenadiers, the 7th hussars, and the 3d and 14th dragoons.

He arrived at Cairo on the 27th of March. Important events had occurred there since his departure. The population of that great city, which numbered nearly 300,000 inhabitants, fickle, inflammable, inclined to change, like all multitudes, had followed the suggestions of Turkish emissaries, and fallen upon the French the moment they heard the cannon at Heliopolis. Pouring forth outside the walls during the battle, and seeing Nassif-Pasha and Ibrahim Bey with some thousand horse and Janissaries, they supposed them to be conquerors. Taking good care not to deceive the inhabitants, the Turks affirmed, on the contrary, that the grand-vizier had gained a complete victory, and that the French were exterminated. At these tidings, 50,000 men had risen in Cairo, at Boulaq, and at Gyzeh. Armed with swords, pikes, and old muskets, they purposed to slaughter the French left among them. But 2000 men, entrenched in the citadel and in the forts which commanded the city, supplied with provisions and ammunition, opposed a resistance difficult to overcome. Having almost all of them fallen back in time, they had managed to shut themselves up in the fortified places. Some, however, had been in great danger; it was those who, to the number of 200 only, mounted guard at the head-quarters. This noble edifice, formerly occupied by General Bonaparte, and since by Kléber and the principal administrations, stood at one of the extremities of the city, overlooking on one side the square of Ezbekyeh, the finest in Cairo; on the other, gardens stretching to the Nile. The Turks and the insurgent populace intended to storm this house, and to slaughter the 200 French by whom it was occupied. This would have been the more easy for them, since General Verdier, who guarded the citadel, placed at the other extremity of Cairo, could not come to their assistance. But the brave soldiers who were in the head-quarters managed, sometimes by a well-supported fire, sometimes by daring sorties, to keep the ferocious multitude at bay, and to give General Lagrange time to arrive. He had been detached, as we have seen, the very night after the battle, with four battalions. He arrived at noon the next day, entered by the gardens, and rendered the head-quarters thenceforth impregnable.

The Turks, seeing no means of overcoming the resistance of the French, reeked their revenge on such unfortunate Christians as were in their power. They began by slaughtering part of the inhabitants of the European quarter; they killed several merchants, plundered their houses, and carried off their wives and daughters. They then went in search of those Arabs who were accused of living on good terms with the French, and of drinking wine with them. They put them to death; and murder and plunder went hand in hand, as usual. They impaled an Arab, who had been chief of the Janissaries under the French, and who was charged with the police of Cairo; and they treated in the same manner one who had been secretary to the Divan instituted by General Bonaparte. Thence they proceeded to the quarter of the Copts. These, as every one knows, are descended from the ancient inhabitants of Egypt, and have adhered to Christianity in spite of all the Mussulman dominations that have succeeded one another in their country. They possessed great wealth, arising from the collection of the taxes, which the Mamelukes had delegated to them. The intention was, to punish, in them, friends of the French, and more especially to plunder their houses. Very fortunately for these Copts, their quarters formed the left side of Ezbekyeh square, contiguous to our head-quarters. Their chief was, moreover, rich and brave; he defended himself well, and succeeded in saving them.

Amid these horrors, Nassif-Pasha and Ibrahim Bey were ashamed of themselves for what they did or suffered to be done. They saw that wealth wasted which would belong to them, if they remained in possession of Egypt. But they winked at all that was done by a populace of which they were no longer masters, and thought, besides, by these massacres, to keep up their animosity against the French.

During these transactions arrived General Friant, detached from Belbeis, and lastly Kléber himself. Both entered through the gardens behind our head-quarters. Though conqueror of the grand-vizier's army, Kléber had a serious difficulty to surmount, nothing less than to subdue an immense city, peopled by 300,000 inhabitants, partly in a state of revolt, occupied by 20,000 Turks, and built in the Oriental style, that is to say, having narrow streets, divided into piles of masonry, which were real fortresses. These edifices receiving light from within, and, exhibiting without nothing but lofty walls, had terraces instead of roofs, from which the insurgents poured a downward and destructive fire. Add to this, that the Turks were masters of the whole city, excepting the citadel and the square of Ezbekyeh. As for the latter, they had blockaded it, in a manner, by closing the streets that ran into it with embattled walls.

The French had but two modes of attack; either to keep up a destructive fire of bombs and howitzers from the citadel, till the city was reduced, or to debouch by the square of Ezbekyeh, overthrowing all the barriers erected at the head of the streets, and taking all the quarters by assault, one by one. The first method was liable to cause the destruction of a great city, the capital of the country, which the French needed for the supply of necessities; the second exposed them to the risk of losing ten times as many men as ten battles like that of Heliopolis would have cost them.

In this case, Kléber showed as much prudence as he had just shown energy in the field. He resolved to gain time and to let the insursection wear itself out. He had sent almost the whole of his matériel to Lower Egypt, under the idea that he should very soon embark. He enjoined Reynier, as soon as the army of the vizier had entirely crossed the desert, and as soon as Damietta and Lezbeh were retaken, to ascend the Nile with his whole division, and the stores necessary for Cairo. Meanwhile, he caused all the outlets by which the city could communicate with the surrounding country, to be blockaded. Though the insurgents had procured provisions by plundering the houses of the Egyptians, in general amply supplied with them; though they had cast balls, and even founded cannon, they could not possibly help suffering very soon from dearth. Nor could they fail at length to be undeceived respecting the general state of things in Egypt, and to learn that the French were everywhere victorious, and the vizier's army dispersed; moreover, they were likely to fall out ere long, for their interests were totally opposite. Nassif-Pasha's Turks, Ibrahim Bey's Mamelukes, and the Arab population of Cairo could not agree together long. For all these reasons, Kléber thought it advisable to temporize and to negotiate.

While he was gaining time, he completed his treaty of alliance with Murad Bey, through the agency of the wife of that Mameluke prince, a person universally respected, endowed with beauty, and even with a superior understanding. He granted to him the province of Sald, under the supremacy of France, on condition of paying a tribute equivalent to a considerable part of the imposts of that province. Murad Bey engaged, moreover, to fight for the French; and the French engaged, if they should ever quit the country, to facilitate for him the occupation of Egypt. Murad Bey, as we shall see by and by, faithfully adhered to the treaty which he had just signed, and began by driving from Upper Egypt a Turkish corps which had occupied it.

By means of Murad Bey and the sheiks who were secret friends of France, Kléber then opened negotiations with the Turks who had entered Cairo. Nassif-Pasha and Ibrahim Bey began, in fact, to be afraid of being shut up in the city by the French, and treated after the Turkish fashion. They knew, besides, that the grand-vizier's army was completely dispersed. In consequence, they cheerfully assented to conferences, and agreed to a capitulation, by the terms of which they were to be allowed to retire safe and sound. But, at the moment when this capitulation was about to be concluded, the insurgents of Cairo, finding themselves abandoned to the vengeance of the French, were seized with consternation and rage, caused the conferences to be broken off, threatened to despatch all those who showed any determination to desert them, and even gave money to the Turks to induce them to fight. An attack by main force was, therefore, indispensable for completing the reduction of the city.

Lower Egypt having returned to its duty, Reynier had ascended with his corps and a convoy of military stores. He assisted in investing that part of the outworks of Cairo, which stretch from north to east, that is to say from fort Camin to the citadel: General Friant encamped towards the west, in the gardens behind our head-quarters, between the city and the Nile; Leclerc's cavalry was posted between Reynier's and Friant's divisions, scouring the country; General Verdier occupied the south.

On the 3d and 4th of April—13th and 14th Germinal—a detachment of General Friant's commenced the first attack. Its chief object was to clear Ezbekyeh square, which was our principal débouché. A beginning was made with the Copt quarter, which formed the left of it. The troops penetrated with the greatest intrepidity into the streets which crossed this quarter in all directions; while several detachments blew up the houses all round Ezbekyeh square, for the purpose of opening avenues to the interior of the city. Meanwhile, the citadel threw a few bombs to intimidate the population. These attacks were successful, and made us masters of the heads of the streets terminating in Ezbekyeh square. In the following days, an eminence situated near fort Sulkouskoï, which the Turks had entrenched, and which commanded the Copt quarter, was taken. Every preparation was thus made for a general and simultaneous attack. Before he made this attack, Kléber summoned the insurgents for the last time; they refused to listen to the summons. Still making a particular point of sparing the city, which, it is true, was not implicated in the horrors committed by a few fanatics, he resolved to speak to the eye by means of a terrible example. He gave orders for attacking Boulaq, a detached suburb of Cairo, on the banks of the Nile.

On the 15th of April—25th Germinal—Friant's division surrounded Boulaq, and poured upon that devoted suburb a shower of bombs and howitzers. Favoured by this fire, the soldiers rushed to the assault, but met with an obstinate resistance from the inhabitants and the Turks. Every street, every house, became the theatre of a desperate conflict. Kléber ordered this horrible carnage to be suspended for a moment, to offer pardon to the revoltors: that pardon was rejected. The attack was then resumed: the fire spread from house to house, and Boulaq, in flames, experienced the two-fold horror of a conflagration and an assault. Meanwhile, the chiefs of the population having thrown themselves at the feet of the conqueror, Kléber put a stop to the effusion of blood, and saved the remnant of the hapless suburb. It was the quarter which contained the warehouses of the merchants; in these were found an immense quantity of goods, which were preserved from the flames for the use of the army.

This horrible sight was witnessed by the whole population of Cairo. Taking advantage of the effect which it was likely to produce, Kléber ordered the capital itself to be attacked. A house adjoining to the head-quarters had been undermined; fire was applied to the mine, and Turks and insurgents were blown up together. This was the signal for the attack. Friant's and Belliard's troops debouched by all the outlets from Ezbekyeh square, while General ral Reynier entered at the north and east gates, while Verdier, from the elevated citadel, showed bombs upon the city. The fight was obstinate. Reynier's troops penetrated through the Bab-el-Charyeh gate, situated at the extremity of the great canal, and, driving before them Ibrahim Bey and Nassif-Pasha, who defended it, at length cooped up both of them between the 9th demi-brigade, which, having entered at the opposite point, had driven back all they encountered in their victorious course. The two French corps joined after making a frightful carnage. Night separated the combatants. Several thousand Turks, Mamelukes, and insurgents, had fallen; four hundred houses were in flames.

This was the last effort at resistance. The inhabitants, who had long detained the Turks, now began to conjure them most earnestly to quit Cairo, and thus leave them at liberty to negotiate with the French. Kléber, who was averse to these sanguinary scenes, and who was anxious to spare his soldiers, wished for nothing better than to treat. The envoys of Murad Bey served him for agents. The treaty was soon concluded. Nassif-Pasha and Ibrahim Bey were to retire to Syria, escorted by a detachment of the French army. The only terms granted them were, that their lives should be spared. They set out from Cairo on the 25th of April—5th Floréal—leaving to the mercy of the French the wretches whom they had urged into revolt.

Thus terminated that sanguinary struggle, which had commenced with the battle of Heliopolis on the 20th of March, and which ended on the 25th of April with the departure of the last lieutenants of the vizier, after thirty-five days' fighting, between 20,000 French, on one side, and, on the other, the whole force of the Ottoman empire, seconded by the revolt of the Egyptian towns. Great faults had occasioned this insurrection, and provoked this horrible effusion of blood. If, in fact, the French had not made preparations for departing, the Egyptians would never have dared to rise. The contest would have been limited to a brilliant but by no means dangerous battle between our squares of infantry and the Turkish cavalry. But, a commencement of evacuation, having produced a popular explosion in several towns, it was necessary to retake them by assault, which was more destructive than a battle. Let us forget Kléber's faults in admiration of his glorious and energetic conduct! He had imagined that he could not defend Egypt, when subjugated and peaceful, against the Turks; and he had now conquered it in thirty-five days, in spite of Turks and of the insurgent Egyptians, with equal energy, prudence, and humanity.

In the Delta, all the towns had returned to a state of complete submission. Murad Bey had driven from Upper Egypt the Turkish detachment of Dervish Pasha. The vanquished everywhere trembled before the conqueror, and expected a terrible chastisement. The inhabitants of Cairo, in particular, who had committed revolting cruelties upon the Arabs attached to the French, and upon the Christians of all nations, were filled with consternation.

Kléber, who was humane and wise, took good care not to repay cruelties with cruelties. He knew that conquest, odious to all nations, never becomes tolerable in the estimation of those on whom it falls, but at the price of a good government, and cannot render itself legitimate in the eyes of enlightened nations unless by the accomplishment of great designs. He hastened, therefore, to use his victory with moderation. The Egyptians were persuaded that they should be treated harshly: they conceived that the loss of life and property would atone for the crime of those who had risen in revolt. Kléber called them together, assumed at first a stern look, but afterwards pardoned them, merely imposing a contribution on the insurgent villages.

Cairo paid 10,000,000 francs, a burden far from onerous for so large a city. The inhabitants considered themselves as most lucky to get off so easily. Eight millions more were imposed upon the rebel towns of Lower Egypt.

This sum sufficed for the immediate discharge of the arrears of pay, and furnished funds for procuring the provisions needed by the army, for supplying all the wants of the wounded, and for completing the fortifications that were begun. It was a precious resource, till the system of the impositions should be improved and carried into execution. Another resource, equally unexpected, presented itself at this moment. Seventy Turkish vessels had just entered the Egyptian ports, to carry away the French army. The late hostilities justified our detaining them. They were laden with goods, which were sold for the benefit of the chest of the army. Owing to these various resources, an abundant provision was made for all the services, without any requisition in kind. The army found itself in plenty, and the Egyptians, who had not hoped to be let off so easily, submitted with perfect resignation. The army, proud of its victories, confident in its strength, knowing that General Bonaparte was at the head of the government, ceased to doubt that it would soon receive reinforcements. Kléber had in the plain of Heliopolis made the noblest amends for his momentary faults.

He assembled the administrators of the army, the persons best acquainted with the country, and turned his attention to the organization of the finances of the colony. He restored the collection of the direct contributions to the Copts, to whom it had formerly been intrusted; he imposed some new customs' duties and taxes on articles of consumption. The total of the revenues was to amount to 25,000,000 fcs., and this was sufficient for all the wants of the army, which did not exceed eighteen or twenty millions. He admitted into the ranks of our demi-brigades, Copts, Syrians, and even blacks, bought in Darfur, and whom some of the subalterns, beginning to speak the language of the country, undertook to drill. These new soldiers, placed in the regiments, fought there as stoutly as the French with whom they had the honour to serve. Kléber gave orders for the completion of the forts constructing around Cairo, and set men to work at those of Lesbeh, Damietta, Burlos, and Rosetta, situated on the sea-coast. He pressed forward the works of Alexandria, and imparted fresh activity to the scientific researches of the Institute of Egypt. From the cataracts to the mouths of the Nile, every thing assumed the aspect of a solid and durable establishment. Two months afterwards, the caravans of Lyria, Arabia, and Darfur, began to appear again at Cairo. The hospitable welcome which they received insured their return.

If Kléber had lived, Egypt would have remained in our possession, at least till the time of our great disasters. But a deplorable event snatched away that general, in the midst of his exploits and of his judicious government.

It is always more or less dangerous to give a deep shock to the ruling principles of human nature. All Islamism had been moved by the presence of the French in Egypt. The children of Mahomet had felt somewhat of that enthusiasm which of old inflamed them against the crusaders. Cries of a holy war were raised, as in the twelfth century; and there were fanatic Mussulmans who vowed to achieve the sacred fight, which consists in slaying an infidel. In Egypt, where people saw the French closely, where they appreciated their humanity, where they could compare them with the soldiers of the Porte, especially with the Mamelukes—in Egypt, where they witnessed their respect for the Prophet,—a respect enjoined by General Bonaparte,—less aversion for them was entertained; and, when they afterwards left the country, the fanaticism had considerably abated. Indeed, during the late insurrection, there had even been perceived, in some places, real signs of attachment to our soldiers, to such a degree, that the English agents were surprised at it. But, throughout the rest of the East, the attention of all was engrossed by one subject, and that was the invasion by Infidels of an extensive Mussulman country.

A young man, a native of Aleppo, named Suleiman, who was a prey to extravagant fanaticism, who had performed the pilgrimage to Mecca and Medina, who had studied at the mosque El Azhar, the most celebrated and the wealthiest in Cairo, that where the Koran and the Turkish law are taught, who, finally, purposed to obtain admission into the body of the doctors of the faith, chanced to be wandering in Palestine, when the wrecks of the vizier's army passed through the country. He witnessed the sufferings, the despair, of his co-religionists, which violently affected his morbid imagination. The aga of the Janissaries, who had chanced to see him, inflamed his fanaticism still more by his own suggestions. This young man offered to assassinate "the Sultan of the French," General Kléber. Furnished with a dromedary and a sum of money, he repaired to Gaza, crossed the desert, proceeded to Cairo, and shut himself up for several weeks in the great mosque, into which students and poor travellers were admitted, at the cost of that pious foundation. The rich mosques are in the East what convents formerly were in Europe; there are found prayer, religious instruction, and hospitality. The young fanatic intimated his design to the four principal sheiks of the mosque, who were at the head of the department of instruction. They were alarmed at his resolution, and at the consequences to which it was likely to lead; they told him that it would not succeed, and that it would bring great disasters upon Egypt; but still they refrained from apprizing the French authorities.

When this wretched man was sufficiently confirmed in his resolution, he armed himself with a dagger, followed Kléber for several days, but, finding no opportunity to approach him, he resolved to penetrate into the garden of the head-quarters, and to hide himself there in an abandoned cistern. On the 14th of June he appeared before Kléber, who was walking with Protain, the architect of the army, and showing him what repairs would require to be done in the house, to obliterate the traces of the bombs and balls. Suleiman approached him, as if to beg alms, and, while Kléber was preparing to listen to him, he rushed upon him, and plunged his dagger several times into his breast. Kléber fell, under the violence of this attack. Protain, having a stick in his hand, fell upon the assassin, struck him violently on the head, but was thrown down in his turn by a stab with the dagger. At the cries of the two victims, the soldiers ran to the spot, raised their expiring general, sought and seized the murderer, whom they found skulking behind a heap of rubbish.

A few minutes after this tragic scene Kléber expired. The army shed bitter tears over him. The Arabs themselves, who had admired his clemency after their revolt, united their regrets to those of our soldiers. A military commission assembled immediately to try the assassin, who confessed every thing. He was condemned, according to the laws of the country, and impaled.¹ The four sheiks to whom he had communicated his intention were beheaded. These bloody sacrifices were deemed necessary for the safety of the chiefs of the army. Vain precaution! With Kléber, the army had lost a general, and the colony a founder, for whom none of the officers left in Egypt was qualified to make amends. With Kléber Egypt was lost for France. Menou, who succeeded him by right of seniority, was a warm partisan of the expedition; but, notwithstanding his zeal, he was very far beneath such a task. One man alone could have equalled Kléber, nay, surpassed him, in the government of Egypt; this was he, who, three months before, embarked in the harbour of Alexandria for Italy, and who fell at Marengo, on the same day, nearly at the same moment that Kléber was murdered at Cairo; this was

¹ This seems to have been an act of barbarous atrocity, disgraceful to a civilized European nation. The military commission, who tried this unhappy wretch, was composed of French officers; and that they should have passed a sentence of impalement however sanctioned by the barbarous laws of the east, is equally disgraceful

and astonishing. It must be remembered, however, that at this time France had rejected Christianity, and that the French commander in Egypt, after the death of Kléber, had adopted Mahometanism, and styled himself Abdallah Menou; and this may in some sort account for things, else unaccountable. H. W. H.

Desaix. Both died on the 14th of June, 1800, for the accomplishment of the vast designs of General Bonaparte. How singular the destiny of these two men, constantly placed side by side during life, undivided in death, yet withal so different in every quality whether of mind or body!

Kléber was the handsomest man in the army. His lofty stature, his noble countenance, expressing all the pride of his soul, his valour at once intrepid and cool, his quick and solid intelligence, rendered him a most formidable commander on the field of battle. His mind was brilliant, original, but uncultivated. He read incessantly and exclusively Plutarch and Quintus Curtius; there he sought the food of great souls, the history of the heroes of antiquity. He was capricious, indocile, and a grumbler. It was said of him, that he liked not either to command or to obey; and this was true. He obeyed under General Bonaparte, but not without murmuring; he sometimes commanded, but in the name of another, under General Jourdan, for example, assuming the command by a sort of inspiration amidst the battle, exercising it like a superior captain, and, after the victory, resuming his character of lieutenant, which he preferred to any other. Kléber was licentious in his manners and language, but upright, disinterested, as men were in those days, for the conquest of the world had not yet corrupted their dispositions.

Desaix was the reverse in almost every respect. Simple, bashful, nay, somewhat awkward, his face hid by a profusion of hair, he had not the look of a soldier. But, heroic in action, kind to the soldiers, modest with his comrades, generous to the vanquished, he was adored by the army and by the people conquered by our arms. His solid and eminently cultivated mind, his intelligence in war, his application to his duties, and his disinterestedness, made him an accomplished model of all the military virtues; and, while Kléber, indocile, refractory, could not endure any superior authority, Desaix was obedient, as though he had not known how to command. Under a rough exterior, he concealed a soul ardent and susceptible of enthusiasm. Though trained in the severe school of the army of the Rhine, he was a warm admirer of the campaigns in Italy, and was desirous of inspecting with his own eyes the fields of battle of Castiglione, Arcole, and Rivoli. While visiting those places, the theatres of immortal glory, he accidentally fell in with the commander-in-chief of the army of Italy, who conceived a strong attachment for him. What an honourable homage was the friendship of such a man! General Bonaparte was deeply touched by it. He esteemed Kléber for high military qualities, but considered none as equal to Desaix either in talents or character. Besides, he had an affection for him; surrounded by companions in arms, who had not yet forgiven his elevation, though feigning an obsequious submission to him, he appreciated the more Desaix's pure disinterested devotedness, founded on deep admiration. At the same time, keeping to himself the secret of his preferences, affecting ignorance of Kléber's faults, he treated him and Desaix both alike, and was desirous, as we shall see, to unite in the same honours two men whom Fortune had united in one and the same fate.

For the rest, all continued quiet in Egypt after Kléber's death. General Menou, on assuming the command, lost no time in despatching the ship Osiris from Alexandria, to carry to France tidings of the then flourishing state of the colony, and of the deplorable end of its second founder.

BOOK VI.

ARMISTICE.

Vast Preparations for succouring the Army in Egypt—Arrival of M. de St. Julien at Paris—Impatience of the French Cabinet to treat with him—Notwithstanding the insufficiency of M. de St. Julien's Powers, Talleyrand induces him to sign preliminary Articles of Peace—M. de St. Julien signs and sets out with Duroc for Vienna—State of Prussia and Russia—Clever Expedient of the First Consul in regard to the Emperor Paul—He sends back to him six thousand Prisoners without Ransom, and offers him the Island of Malta—Enthusiasm of Paul I. for General Bonaparte, and Mission of M. de Sprengporten to Paris—New League of the Neutral Powers—The four great Questions of Maritime Law—Reconciliation with the Holy See—The Court of Spain, and its Intimacy with the First Consul—Sketch of the internal State of that Court—General Berthier sent to Madrid—This Representative of the First Consul negotiates a Treaty with Charles IV. by which Tuscany would fall to the House of Parma, and Louisiana to France—Erection of the Kingdom of Etruria—France reinstates herself in the Favour of the European Powers—Arrival of M. de St. Julien at Vienna—Astonishment of his Court when apprized of the Preliminary Articles signed without Powers—Embarrassment of the Cabinet of Vienna, which had engaged not to treat without England—Disavowal of M. de St. Julien—Attempt at a joint Negotiation, comprehending England and Austria—For the Admission of England into the Negotiation, the First Consul requires a Naval Armistice, which would enable him to succour Egypt—England refuses, not to treat, but to grant the proposed Armistice—The First Consul then insists on a direct and immediate Negotiation with Austria, or the Resumption of Hostilities—Manner in which he has profited by the Suspension of Arms to put the French Armies on a formidable Footing—Alarm of the Austrians, and cession of the Fortresses of Philipshurg, Ulm, and Ingolstadt, to obtain a Prolongation of the Continental Armistice—Convention of Hohenlinden, granting a fresh Suspension of Arms for forty-five Days—Appointment of M. de Cobentzel as Envoy to the Congress of Lunéville—Festival of the lot of Vendémiaire—Removal of Turenne's remains to the Invalides—The First Consul devotes the Leisure left him by the Interruption of Hostilities in attending to the internal Administration—Success of his Financial Measures—Prosperity of the Bank of France—Payment of the Stockholders in Cash—Repair of the Roads—Return of the Priests—Difficulties respecting the Celebration of Sunday and Decadi—New Measures in regard to the Emigrants—Posture of Parties—Their Dispositions towards the First Consul—The Revolutionists and the Royalists—Policy of the Government towards them—Conflicting Influences about the First Consul—Parts acted by Messrs. Fouché, de Talleyrand, and Cambacérès—The Bonaparte Family—Letters of Louis XVIII. to the First Consul, and Answer to that Prince—Plot of Ceracchi and Arena—Public Sensation created by the Discovery of this Plot—Imprudent Friends of the First Consul wish to make a Handle of it to raise him too soon to the supreme Power—Pamphlet written in that Spirit by M. de Fontanes—Necessity for disavowing that Pamphlet—Lucien Bonaparte removed from the Ministry of the Interior and sent to Spain.

WHILE the Osiris was conveying to Europe the tidings of what had happened on the banks of the Nile, orders totally contrary to those before given were despatched from the ports of England. The observations of Sir Sidney Smith had been well received in London. The government had been fearful of disavowing an English officer, who had come forward as invested with its powers; it had above all discovered the falsehood of the intercepted despatches, and formed a more correct estimate of the difficulty of wresting Egypt from the French army. It had, therefore, ratified the convention of El Arisch, and instructed Lord Keith to cause it to be executed. But it was too late, as we have seen: the convention was at that moment torn, sword in hand; and the French, having recovered possession of Egypt, were no longer disposed to abandon the country. The English ministers were destined to experience bitter regret for the levity of their conduct, and violent attacks in parliament.

The First Consul, on his part, was rejoiced by the intelligence of the consolidation of his conquest. Unfortunately, the news of Kléber's death reached him almost at the same moment as the news of his exploits. His grief was intense and sincere. He rarely dissembled, and only when obliged to do so by a duty or by an important interest, but always with effort, because the vivacity of his temper rendered dissimulation difficult. But in the narrow circle of his family and his counsellors, he used no disguise; he manifested his affections, his antipathies, with extreme vehemence. It was among these intimates that he betrayed the profound sorrow which he felt for the death of Kléber. In him, he regretted not a friend, as in Desaix; he regretted a great general, an able chief, more capable than any other to insure the establishment of the French in Egypt—an establishment which he regarded as his most glorious work, but which definitive success alone could convert from a brilliant attempt into a great and solid enterprise.

Time, that like a river sweeps along with it all that falls into its rapid current, Time has engulfed the odious falsehoods then invented by the hatred of parties. There is one of them, however, which it may be instructive to mention here, though long since consigned to profound oblivion. The royalist agents reported, and English newspapers repeated, that Desaix and Kléber, having given umbrage to the First Consul, were assassinated by his orders, the one at Marengo, the other at Cairo. There were miserable and silly fools enough to believe it, and now people are almost ashamed to recollect such imputations. Those who fabricate these infamous calumnies ought sometimes to place themselves in presence of posterity. They would blush at the refutation which time has in store for them.

The First Consul had already given pressing orders to the fleets at Brest and Rochefort, to prepare to set sail for the Mediterranean. Though our finances were in a much better state, still, being obliged to make great efforts on land, the First Consul could not accomplish all that our navy required. He neglected nothing, however, to put the great Brest fleet in a condition to put to sea. He solicited the court of Spain to send the necessary orders to Admirals Gravina¹ and Mazzaredo, commanding the Spanish division, to concur in the movements of the French division. The squadrons of the two nations, blocked up in Brest for a year past, when united, would form a force of forty ships of the line. The First Consul proposed that, taking advantage of the sailing of this immense naval force, the French ships disposable at L'Orient, Rochefort, and Toulon, and the Spanish ships disposable at Ferrol, Cadiz, and Carthage, should join the combined fleet, to increase its strength. These different movements were to be directed in such a manner as to deceive the English, to throw them into great perplexity, and meanwhile, Admiral Ganteaume, taking with him the quickest sailers, was to slip away and to carry to Egypt 6000 picked troops, numerous workmen, and an immense matériel.

¹ GRAVINA commanded the Spanish squadron in the disastrous battle of Trafalgar, in which he had his flag in the Prince of Asturias 100 guns. After the victory was decided, he escaped with a few sail of the line and frigates into Cadiz.—Brenton's Naval History.

Spain willingly assented to this combination, which would at least have the advantage of bringing back into the Mediterranean, and consequently into her ports, the squadron of Admiral Gravina, uselessly shut up in the harbour of Brest. She saw no other objection to this plan but the bad condition of her fleets and their wretched equipment. The First Consul did his best to remove this objection, and the ships of the two nations were soon provided with the more necessary stores. In the mean time, he was anxious that the army in Egypt should receive intelligence from him every five or six days. He gave orders that, from all the ports of the Mediterranean, Spain and Italy included, there should sail brigs, avisoes, mere merchantmen, carrying balls, bombs, lead, powder, muskets, swords, wood for cartwrights' work, medicines, Jesuits' bark, corn, wine, in short all that the army in Egypt was likely to need. He ordered, moreover, that each of these small vessels should take out a number of workmen, masons or smiths, some gunners, and some picked cavalry-soldiers. He directed them to charter vessels at Carthage, Barcelona, Port Vendre, Marseilles, Toulon, Antibes, Savona, Genoa, Bastia, St. Florent, &c. He even bargained with merchants of Algiers to send to Egypt cargoes of wine, of which the army was destitute. By his command, a company of actors was formed, the requisites for a theatre were provided, and the whole was to be sent to Alexandria. The best Paris newspapers were subscribed for, in order to be forwarded to the principal officers of the army, that they might be made acquainted with what was passing in Europe. In short, nothing was neglected that could serve to keep up the courage of the exiled soldiers, and to place them in constant communication with the mother country.¹

Of course several of these vessels were liable to be taken, but the greater number had a chance of arriving, and did actually arrive, for the extensive coast of the Delta could not be strictly guarded. The same success did not attend the attempts made to reinvade Malta, which the English kept closely blockaded. They made an especial point of reducing this second Gibraltar; they knew that the blockade must in the long run produce here a certain effect; for Malta is a rock, which cannot be supplied but by sea, whereas Egypt is a vast kingdom, which feeds both itself and its neighbours. They steadfastly persevered, therefore, in investing the place and in inflicting upon it the horrors of famine. The brave General Vaubois, having at his disposal a garrison of 4000 men, was not afraid of their attacks; but he saw the provisions destined for the subsistence of his soldiers hourly diminishing, and unfortunately did not receive from the ports of Corsica sufficient resources to supply the place of those that were every day consumed.

The First Consul also turned his earnest attention to the selection of a chief capable of commanding the army in Egypt. The loss of Kléber was distressing, especially in consideration of those who might be called to succeed him. Had Desaix remained in Egypt, the misfortune would have been easily repaired. But Desaix had returned; Desaix was dead. Those who were left were not competent for such a command. Reynier was a good officer, brought up in the school of the army of the Rhine, skilful, experienced, but cold, irresolute, without ascendancy over the troops. Menou was well informed, personally brave, an enthusiast in favour of the expedition, but incapable of directing an army, and covered with ridicule because he had married a Turkish woman and turned Mahometan himself. He took the name of Abdallah Menou, which was a subject of mirth for the soldiers, and greatly abated the respect with which a commander-in-chief needs to be surrounded. General Lanusse, brave, intelligent, full of an ardour, which he understood the art of communicating to others, appeared to the First Consul to deserve the preference, though he was deficient in prudence. But General Menou had assumed the command by right of seniority. It was difficult to insure the arrival of an order in Egypt; the English might intercept that order; and, without communicating it literally, they might excite a suspicion of its purport, in such a manner as to render the command uncertain, to produce dissension among the generals, and to distract the colony. He therefore left things in the same state, and confirmed Menou in the charge, not conceiving him to be so utterly incapable as he really was.

We must now return to Europe, to see what was passing on this theatre of the great events of the world. The letter addressed from Marengo itself to the Emperor of Germany reached him along with the news of the lost battle. The court of Vienna was then aware of the faults which it had committed, in rejecting the offers of the First Consul at the beginning of winter, in persisting to consider France as exhausted and incapable of continuing the war, in refusing to believe the existence of the army of reserve, and in blindly pushing M. de Melas into the gorges of the Apennines. The credit of M. de Thugut was considerably diminished, for to him alone were imputed all the errors of want of conduct and foresight. However, to these faults, already so serious, was added another not less important, that of forming a closer alliance than ever with the English, under the impression of the disaster of Marengo. Till now, the cabinet of Vienna had declined their subsidies, but it thought it right to procure immediately the means of repairing the losses of this campaign, either to place itself in a condition to treat more advantageously with France, or to be able to engage in a fresh struggle with her, if her pretensions were too exorbitant. It accepted, therefore, two millions and a half sterling (62,000,000 francs). In return for this subsidy, it engaged not to make peace with France before the month of February following, unless the peace were common to England and Austria. This treaty was signed on the 20th of June, the very day on which the news of the events in Italy reached Vienna. Austria, therefore, bound herself to the fortunes of England for seven months longer; but she hoped to pass the summer in negotiations, and to get on till winter before hostilities could be recommenced. For the rest, the Imperial cabinet had made up its mind to peace; it merely wished to negotiate jointly with England, and especially not to make too great sacrifices in Italy. On this condition, it desired nothing better than to conclude peace.

¹ All these particulars are extracted from the voluminous correspondence of the First Consul with the department of war and of the marine.

The emperor sent as bearer of his answer to the letter of the First Consul, the same officer who had brought that letter, namely, M. de St. Julien, in whom he reposed great confidence. The answer on this occasion was direct and personally addressed to General Bonaparte. It contained the ratification of the double armistice, signed in Germany and in Italy, and an invitation to explain himself confidentially and with perfect frankness respecting the bases of the future negotiation. M. de St. Julien was specially charged to sound the First Consul on the conditions of peace, and on his part to say sufficient concerning the intentions of the emperor to induce the French cabinet to disclose its own. The letter of which M. de St. Julien was the bearer, full of flattering and pacific protestations, contained a passage in which the object of his mission was clearly specified. "I am writing to my generals," said his imperial majesty, "to confirm the two armistices, and to settle the details of them. I have, moreover, sent to you the Count de St. Julien, major-general in my army: he is charged with my instructions, and to point out to you how essential it is not to enter into public negotiations, likely to excite prematurely in so many nations hopes perhaps illusory, till it is ascertained, at least in a general manner, if the bases that you mean to propose for peace are such as to afford a prospect of obtaining that desirable end.

Vienna, July 5th, 1800."

The emperor hinted, towards the conclusion of this letter, at the engagements which bound him to England, and which made him desirous of a peace common to all the belligerent powers.

M. de St. Julien arrived in Paris on the 21st or July—2d Thermidor, year VIII.—and was cordially received. He was the first envoy from the emperor who had been seen for a long time in France. He was welcomed as the representative of a great sovereign and a messenger of peace. We have already shown how earnestly the First Consul desired to put an end to the war. Nobody contested with him the glory of battles; he now aspired to one of a different kind, less brilliant but more novel, and at this time more profitable to his authority, that of giving peace to France and Europe. In his ardent soul desires were passions. He then sought peace as we have since seen him seek war. M. de Talleyrand desired it as much; for he was already fond of assuming the part of moderator about the First Consul. It was an excellent part to play, especially at a later period; but to urge the First Consul to peace at this time was adding one impatience to another, and endangering the result by too great precipitation.

On the very day after his arrival, the 22d of July—3d Thermidor—M. de St. Julien was invited to a conference with the minister for foreign affairs. They conversed on the subject of their reciprocal desire to terminate the war, and the best way of accomplishing it. M. de St. Julien listened to all that was said to him concerning the conditions on which peace might be concluded, and hinted on his part at all that the emperor wished. M. de Talleyrand concluded too hastily that M. de St. Julien had secret and sufficient instruction for treating, and proposed that they should not confine themselves to a mere conversation, but draw up jointly preliminary articles of peace. M. de St. Julien, who was not authorized to take such an important step, for the engagements of Austria towards England were in absolute opposition to it—M. de St. Julien objected that he had no power to conclude a treaty. M. de Talleyrand replied, that the emperor's letter completely authorized him, and that, if he would agree to some preliminary articles and sign them with a proviso of their ulterior ratification, the French cabinet, on the mere letter of the emperor, would consider him as sufficiently accredited. M. de St. Julien, a soldier by profession, and devoid of experience in diplomatic usages, had the simplicity to avow to M. de Talleyrand his embarrassment and his ignorance of forms, and to ask him what he would do in his place. "I would sign," answered M. de Talleyrand. "Well then, be it so," rejoined M. de St. Julien, "I will sign the preliminary articles, which shall not be held valid till they have received the ratification of my sovereign." "Most assuredly," replied M. de Talleyrand, "no engagements between nations are valid but such as have been ratified."

This singular manner of communicating their powers to each other is specified at length in the minutes still existing of that negotiation. They are dated the 23d, 24th, 27th, and 28th of July,—4th, 5th, 8th, and 9th Thermidor, year VIII. All the important points to be arranged between the two nations were discussed. The treaty of Campo Formio was adopted as the basis, with the exception of some modifications. Thus the emperor abandoned to the Republic the boundary of the Rhine, from the point where that river leaves the Swiss territory to that where it enters the Bavarian territory. In regard to that article, M. de St. Julien demanded and obtained a change in the wording. He wished the expression, "The Emperor assents to the line of the Rhine," to be altered as follows: "The Emperor does not oppose the retaining of the boundary of the Rhine by the French Republic." This mode of expression was adopted in answer to the reproaches of the Germanic body, which had accused the emperor of giving up to France the territory of the confederation. It was agreed that France should not retain any of the fortified positions which operated upon the right bank, (Kehl, Cassel, Ehrenbreitstein,) that their works should be razed, but that, in return, Germany should not throw up any entrenchment, either of earth or masonry, within three leagues of the river.

So much for the boundary between France and Germany. The limits between Austria and Italy yet remained to be settled. The fifth secret article of Campo Formio had stipulated that Austria should receive in Germany an indemnity for certain lordships which she had given up on the left bank of the Rhine, independently of the Netherlands, which she had long before sacrificed to France. The bishopric of Salzburg was to compose that indemnity. The emperor would have liked better to be indemnified in Italy; for the acquisitions which he made in Germany, especially in the ecclesiastical principalities, were scarcely new acquisitions, the court of Vienna already possessing in those principalities an influence and privileges nearly equivalent to a direct sovereignty. On the contrary, the acquisitions which he obtained in Italy had the advantage of giving him territory, which he did not yet possess in any degree, and especially of extending his frontier and his influence in a country which had been the constant object of the ambition of his family. From these same motives it was natural that France should be better pleased to see Austria aggrandize herself in Germany than in Italy. This latter point, however, was conceded. The treaty of Campo Formio threw Austria back upon the Adige, and ascribed to the Cisalpine Republic the Mincio and the celebrated fortress of Mantua. The ambition of Austria this time was to obtain the Mincio, Mantua, and the Legations into the bargain, which was exorbitant. The First Consul went so far as to grant her the Mincio and Mantua, but he would not cede the Legations at any rate. The utmost he would consent to was to give them to the Grand-duke of Tuscany, on condition that, in return, Tuscany should be transferred to the Grand-duke of Parma, and the duchy of Parma to the Cisalpine. The Grand-duke of Parma would have gained considerably by this exchange, which was a satisfaction granted to Spain, with what views we shall show by-and-by.

M. de St. Julien replied that, on this latter point, his sovereign was not prepared to adopt a definitive resolution; that these removals of sovereign houses from one country to another were by no means conformable with his policy; that of course this was a point which must be afterwards adjusted. To evade the difficulty, the negotiators merely said, in the preliminary articles, that Austria should receive in Italy the territorial indemnities previously granted to her in Germany.

The Austrian officer, thus metamorphosed into plenipotentiary, expressed, in the name of his sovereign, a warm interest for the independence of Switzerland, but scarcely any for that of Piedmont, and appeared to insinuate that France might pay herself in Piedmont for what she ceded to the house of Austria in Lombardy.

The parties, therefore, stopped short at very general conditions; the boundary of the Rhine for France, with the demolition of Kehl, Cassel, and Ehrenbreitstein; particular indemnities for Austria, taken from Italy instead of Germany; which signified that Austria would not be confined within the limit of the Adige. But, it must be confessed, not only was it in vain to treat with a plenipotentiary without powers, but something still more vain was it to consider as articles of peace, articles, the only contestable point in which, the only one for which the emperor went to war, the boundary of Austria and Italy, was not even resolved in a general manner: for, as to the boundary of the Rhine, no one had seriously thought of disputing that with us, for a long time past.

To the preceding articles were added some accessory arrangements: it was agreed, for example, that a congress should be held immediately; that, during this congress, hostilities should be suspended, the levies en masse making in Tuscany disbanded, and the English landings, with which Italy was threatened, deferred.

M. de St. Julien, urged beyond all reasonable bounds by the desire to play an important part, had from time to time scruples respecting the strange and bold step which he had ventured to take. To make him easy upon the matter, M. de Talleyrand promised, on his word of honour, that these preliminary articles should remain secret, and that they should not be considered as having any value whatever till after their ratification by the emperor. On the 28th of July, 1800—9th Thermidor, year VIII.—these famous preliminaries were signed at the hôtel of foreign affairs, to the great joy of M. de Talleyrand, who, finding M. de St. Julien so prepared upon every question, seriously believed that he had secret instructions to treat. This, however, was not the case, and, if M. de St. Julien was so well informed, it was only because they wished at Vienna to enable him to provoke and to receive the confidential communications of the First Consul relative to the conditions of the future peace. The French minister had not been able to penetrate that circumstance; and from the desire to sign an act resembling a treaty he had committed a serious error.

The First Consul, paying no attention to the forms observed by the two negotiators, and trusting on that point entirely to M. de Talleyrand, thought for his part of nothing but making Austria explain her views, in order to ascertain whether she wished for peace, and to force it from her by a new campaign, if she appeared not to desire it. But, for this purpose, it would have been better to have summoned her to explain herself within a given time than to enter into an illusory and puerile negotiation, in consequence of which the dignity of the two nations was likely to be compromised, and their reconciliation to be rendered more difficult.

M. de St. Julien thought it best not to wait in Paris for the emperor's answer, as he was solicited to do; he wished himself to carry the preliminaries to Vienna, no doubt with a view to explain to his master the motives of his extraordinary conduct. He left Paris on the 30th of July—11th Thermidor—accompanied by Duroc, whom the First Consul sent to Austria, as he had previously sent him to Prussia, to observe the court there closely, and to give it an advantageous opinion of the moderation and policy of the new government. Duroc, as we have elsewhere remarked, was well suited for missions of this kind, from his sound sense and elegant manners. The First Consul had, moreover, given him written instructions, in which he had provided with minute attention for every contingency. In the first place, when any circumstance led to a presumption of the intentions of Austria in regard to the preliminaries, Duroc was instantly to send off a courier to Paris. It was recommended to him until the ratification to keep an absolute silence, and to appear totally ignorant of the intentions of the First Consul. If the ratification was granted, he was authorized to declare, in a positive manner, that peace might be signed in twenty-four hours, if there was a sincere desire for it. He was to let it be understood, in one way or another, that, provided Austria would be content with the Mincio, the Fossa Maestra, and the Po, which was the line marked out by the convention of Alexandria; and provided, moreover, that she agreed to the removal of the Duke of Parma to Tuscany, and of the Duke of Tuscany to the Legations, there was no obstacle to an immediate conclusion. These instructions even contained rules respecting the language to be held on all the subjects that might arise in conversation. Duroc was forbidden to join in any sneers against Russia and Prussia, which were then disliked at Vienna, because they had withdrawn from the coalition. He was enjoined to maintain a great reserve respecting the Emperor Paul, whose character was a theme for raillery in every court: he was to speak highly of the King of Prussia, to visit the Grand-duke of Tuscany, to show none of those passions which the revolution had excited, either in one way or in another. Royalists and Jacobins were all to be spoken of as though they were not less ancient in France than the Guelfs and the Ghibellines in Italy. He was particularly enjoined not to manifest any antipathy towards emigrants, excepting those, indeed, who had borne arms against the Republic. He was ordered to assert on all occasions that, of all the countries of Europe, France was most attached to its government, because of all countries it was that which had afforded the government occasion to do the most good. Lastly, he was to represent the First Consul as having no prejudices, neither those of other times nor those of the present day, and as being indifferent to the attacks of the English press, for he did not understand English.

Duroc set out with M. de St. Julien, and though the secret of the preliminaries was kept, still the numerous conferences of the emperor's envoy with M. de Talleyrand had been remarked by everybody, and people said aloud that he was the bearer of conditions of peace.

Our prodigious successes in Italy and Germany had naturally exercised a considerable influence, not upon Austria alone, but upon all the courts of Europe, whether friendly or hostile.

On the news of the battle of Marengo, Prussia, still neutral upon system, but kindly disposed toward us according to events, Prussia had expressed warm admiration to the First Consul, and from that moment had not said a single word which could give rise to a doubt respecting the transfer to France of the entire line of the Rhine. The only point now to be studied, according to her, was to be just in the partition of the indemnities due to all those who lost territories on the left bank of the Rhine, and discreet in settling the general limits of the great States. She even added that it was right to be firm towards Austria, and to curb her insatiable ambition. Such was the language which she held every day to our ambassador in Berlin.

M. d'Haugwitz, and King Frederick William in particular, whose kindness was sincere, informed General Beurnonville from day to day of the rapid progress which the First Consul was making in the esteem of Paul I. As we have already seen, that fickle and enthusiastic prince had for some months been passing from a chivalrous animosity against the French Revolution to an unbounded admiration of the man who was now the representative of that Revolution. He had conceived an absolute hatred for Austria and England. Though from this change a first result of great importance had been obtained, namely, the motionless attitude of the Russians on the Vistula, still the First Consul aspired to something more. He wished to enter into direct communication with the emperor Paul, and suspected Prussia of prolonging that equivocal state, that she might be the sole agent in our relations with the most powerful of the courts of the North.

He devised a method, which was crowned with complete success. There were still in France six or seven thousand Russians taken last year, and who could not be exchanged, because Russia had no prisoners to release in return. The First Consul had proposed to England and to Austria, which held in their hands a certain number of our soldiers and seamen, to exchange these Russians for a like number of French. Both of them assuredly owed Russia such a courtesy, for these Russians had incurred captivity solely by serving the purposes of English and Austrian policy. The proposal was nevertheless rejected. The First Consul immediately conceived the happy idea of restoring unconditionally to Paul I. the prisoners in our hands. This was an act of dexterous generosity, and not very burden some to France, which could do nothing with these prisoners, since they could not procure her Frenchmen in exchange. The First Consul accompanied this act with the attentions most likely to touch the susceptible heart of the Emperor Paul. He caused these Russians to be armed and clothed in the uniform of their sovereign: he even gave up their officers, their colours, and their arms. He then wrote a letter to Count de Panin, minister of foreign affairs at St. Petersburg, informing him that, Austria and England having refused to procure their liberty for the soldiers of the Czar, who had become prisoners while serving the cause of those powers, the First Consul would not detain those brave men indefinitely, and that he sent them back to the emperor unconditionally; that this was on his part a testimony of consideration for the Russian army, an army which the French had learned to know and to esteem on fields of battle.

This letter was sent by way of Hamburg. It was transmitted by M. de Bourgoing, our minister in Denmark, to M. de Muraviev, minister of Russia at Hamburg. But such was the fear excited by Paul I. in his agents, that M. de Muraviev refused to receive this letter, not daring to disobey the anterior orders of his cabinet, which forbade him all communication with the representatives of France. M. de Muraviev merely reported to his court what had passed, and made it acquainted with the existence and contents of the latter, of which he had refused to take charge. Upon this, the First Consul made another, and still more efficacious advance towards the Russian monarch. Seeing that Malta could not hold out long, and that this island, strictly blockaded, would be obliged, by want of provisions, to surrender to the English, he conceived the idea of giving it to Paul. It is well known that this prince, an enthusiast on the subject of the ancient orders of chivalry, and that of Malta in particular, had caused himself to be elected grand-master of St. John of Jerusalem, and he was resolved to re-establish that religious and chivalric institution, and that he frequently held at St. Petersburg chapters of the Order, for the purpose of conferring its decoration on the princes and great personages of Europe. It was impossible to take a more direct course to his heart than by offering him the island that was the seat of the Order, of which he had made himself the head. The thing was ably conceived in all its bearings. Either the English, who were on the point of taking it, would consent to restore it, and then it would be out of their hands; or they would refuse, and Paul I. was capable of declaring war against them on that account. This time, M. de Sergijeff, a Russian officer, and one of the prisoners detained in France, was directed to proceed to Petersburg, as the bearer of the two letters relative to the prisoners and the island of Malta.

When these different communications reached St. Petersburg, they produced their inevitable effect. Paul was deeply touched, and thenceforth indulged, without reserve, in the highest admiration of the First Consul. He immediately selected an old Finland officer, M. de Sprengporten, formerly a Swedish subject, a most respectable man, very well disposed towards France, and in high favour at the court of Russia. He appointed him governor of the island of Malta, ordered him to put himself at the head of the 6000 Russian prisoners in France, and to go with this force perfectly organized, and to take possession of the island of Malta, which would be delivered up to him by the French. He ordered him to proceed to Paris, and to thank the First Consul publicly. To this demonstration Paul added a much more effective step; he enjoined M. de Krudener, his minister in Berlin, who had been charged, some months before, to renew the connection between Russia and Prussia, to enter into direct communication with General Beurnonville, our ambassador, and furnished him with the necessary powers for negotiating a treaty of peace with France.

M. d'Haugwitz, who thought, perhaps, that the reconciliation was proceeding too rapidly, for Prussia would lose her character of mediating agent, the moment the cabinets of Paris and St. Petersburg were in direct communication—M. d'Haugwitz contrived to be the ostensible agent of this reconciliation. Hitherto M. de Krudener and M. de Beurnonville had met in Berlin, in the houses of the ministers of the different courts, without speaking. One day, M. d'Haugwitz invited them both to dinner; after dinner, he brought them face to face, then left them tête-à-tête in his own garden, to give them opportunity for complete explanation. M. de Krudener expressed his regret to M. de Beurnonville, that it had not been in his power before to seek the society of the French legation; he excused the refusal given at Hamburg to receive the First Consul's letter, by the existence of anterior orders; and, lastly, he entered into a very long explanation respecting the new dispositions of his sovereign. He informed him of the mission of M. de Sprengporten to Paris, and avowed the especial satisfaction which Paul I. had felt at the restitution of the prisoners, and the offer to restore Malta to the Order of St. John of Jerusalem. At length, from all these subjects he passed to the most serious, namely, the conditions of peace. Russia and France had nothing to quarrel about. They had not gone to war for any interest of territory or commerce, but for a dissimilarity in the form of their government. As far as concerned themselves directly, they had, therefore, but to write one article, to the effect that peace was re-established between the two powers. This circumstance alone showed how unreasonable the war had been. But the war had brought with it alliances, and Paul, who prided himself on strict fidelity to his engagements, desired only one thing, that his allies should be treated indulgently. They were four in number:—Bavaria, Wurtemberg, Piedmont, and Naples. He demanded, on behalf of the four, the integrity of their dominions. Nothing could be more easy, if an explanatory clause were merely introduced to the effect, that this condition should be considered as fulfilled, if those princes obtained an indemnity for the provinces which the French Republic should take from them. The point was thus understood and admitted.

M. de Krudener. In fact, the secularization of the ecclesiastical States of Germany, and their proportionate partition among the lay princes who had lost the whole or part of their dominions, in consequence of the cession of the left bank of the Rhine to France, was a thing long agreed upon by everybody. It had even been admitted at the congress of Rastadt, under the Directory. An arrangement was equally easy for the Italian princes, allies of Paul I. Piedmont was to lose Nice and Savoy; it might be indemnified in Italy, if Austrian ambition were curbed in that country, and not suffered to extend itself too far there. On this point, Paul I., greatly irritated against the cabinet of Vienna, said, like Prussia, that Austria must be kept down, and nothing granted her but what could not be refused. As for the kingdom of Naples, France had nothing to take from it, but she had odious proceedings to punish, outrages to avenge. Still the First Consul was willing to pardon, on one condition, of a nature to be particularly pleasing to Paul I., who was not less hostile to the English than to the Austrians, namely, that the cabinet of Naples should atone for its faults by a formal rupture with Great Britain. On all these points the parties were nearly agreed. They could not fail to become still more so every day, from the natural course of events, and from the impetuous character of Paul I., who, from a state of dissatisfaction with his former allies, was about to pass, without transition, to a state of open war.

The reconciliation of France with Russia was, therefore, nearly accomplished, and even public; for the departure of M. de Sprengporten for Paris had just been officially announced. Paul I., the furious enemy of France, thus became her friend, her ally, against all the powers of the old coalition. The glory and the profound address of the First Consul had wrought this extraordinary change. A fortuitous and important circumstance was about to render it still more complete; this was the quarrel of the neutral powers, exasperated by the violences of England upon the seas. It seems as if every thing concurred to favour the designs of the First Consul, and one is tempted to admire, at this moment, his good fortune as much as his genius.

On viewing the course of events in this lower world, one would almost say, that fortune loves to smile on youth, for she seconds, in a wonderful manner, the early years of great men. Let us not, however, like the ancient poets, make her blind and capricious; if she so often favours the youth of great men, as she did that of Hannibal, of Cæsar, or Napoleon, it is because they have not yet abused her favours. General Bonaparte was fortunate, then, because he had deserved to be so; because he was in the right against all the world; at home, against party strife; abroad, against the powers of Europe. At home, he aimed only at order and justice; abroad, at peace, but an advantageous and glorious peace, such as he has a right to desire who has not been the aggressor, but who has been victorious through his superior ability. Thus Europe sought anxiously to be reconciled to France, represented by a great man, so just and so powerful. And if this great man had met with auspicious circumstances, there was not one which he has not brought about himself, or by which he had not skilfully profited. It was but yesterday that one of his lieutenants, anticipating his orders, had hastened, at the report of the cannon, to gain for him the victory of Marengo; but what had he not done to pave the way to that victory! Now, a prince, struck with insanity on one of the first thrones in the world, afforded an easy prey to his diplomatic ability; but with what masterly condescension had he not contrived to flatter that monarch! England, by her conduct on the seas, was soon going to reconcile all the maritime powers with France; but we shall see what art he had employed to soothe them, and to leave to England the part of violence. Fortune, that capricious mistress of great men, is not, then, so capricious as people are pleased to represent her. All is not caprice when she smiles upon them, caprice when she abandons them, and, in her alleged infidelities, the fault is, in general, not on her side. But let us speak a language more true, more worthy of so grave a subject: fortune, that pagan name given to the power which governs all things here below, is Providence, befriending genius when walking in the path of rectitude, that is, in the ways marked out by infinite wisdom.

The fortunate circumstance which was destined definitively to rally the powers of the north around the politics of the First Consul, and to procure for him auxiliaries upon the element on which he had most need of them, that is, on the seas, was this:—The English had just committed new violences against neutrals. They could not suffer the Russians, the Danes, the Swedes, the Americans, to frequent quietly all the ports of the world, and to lend their flags to the commerce of France and Spain. They had already violated the independence of the neutral flags, especially in regard to America, and it was because the Americans had not sufficiently defended it that the Directory showed its anger, by subjecting them to treatment almost as rigorous as that which they experienced from the English. General Bonaparte had repaired this fault by annulling the harshest of the regulations enforced by the Directory; by instituting the tribunal of prizes, charged to administer better justice to captured vessels; by paying homage, in the person of Washington, to all America; lastly, by inviting negotiators to Paris, for the purpose of renewing relations of amity and commerce with her. It was precisely at this moment that England, as if irritated by the ill success of her policy, seemed to become more oppressive towards neutrals. Odious acts had already been committed by her upon the seas;

* The whole of this defence of the French system is singular, false, partial, and unjust toward the United States, which latter country, it is now universally conceded, leaned entirely to France at that time. It is of course natural that France, when she could not keep a ship either of commerce or war on the ocean, should wish to be furnished by foreign flags with all the articles of which she stood in need. To expose the fallacy of this reasoning, it is enough to call the attention to the fact, that were the pretensions here contended for admitted, naval warfare would be utterly useless, and blockades of no avail.

but the last exceeded all the bounds, not only of justice, but of the most ordinary prudence.

This is not the place for entering into all the details of that important dispute; suffice it to specify its principal points. The neutrals alleged that the war, which certain great nations thought fit to wage with one another, ought not, in any way, to cramp their own trade, nay, that they had a right to pick up that commerce of which the belligerent powers voluntarily deprived themselves. In consequence, they claimed the right of frequenting freely all the ports of the world, of navigating even between the ports of the belligerent nations; of going, for instance, from France and Spain to England, from England to Spain and France, and, what was more disputable, of going from the colonies to the mother-countries, of going from Mexico to Spain, for the purpose of carrying thither the precious metals, which, but for their intervention, could never have reached Europe. They maintained that "the flag covers the merchandise," which means, that the flag of a power, not implicated in the war, covered from every kind of search the merchandise transported in their vessels; that, on board them, French merchandise could not be seized by the English, nor English merchandise by the French; as a Frenchman, for instance, would have been inviolable on the quays of Copenhagen and St. Petersburg for the British power: in short, that the vessel of a neutral nation was as sacred as the very quays of its capital.

The neutrals consented to only one exception. They admitted that they ought not to carry goods specially used in war, for it was contrary to the very idea of neutrality that they should supply one of the belligerent nations with arms against the other. But they sought to limit this interdiction solely to articles fabricated for war, such as muskets, cannon, powder, projectiles, materials for accoutrements of every kind, &c.; and as for provisions, they would not consider any provisions interdicted but such as were prepared for the use of armies, such as biscuit, for example.

If they admitted one exception as to the nature of transportable merchandise, they admitted another as to the places to be entered, but on condition that it should be accurately defined. This second exception was relative to the ports bonâ fide blockaded, and guarded by a naval force capable of laying siege to them, or of reducing them by famine, by means of blockade. In such a case they admitted that to run into a blockaded port was thwarting one of the two nations in the use of its right, by preventing it from taking the places of its enemy by attack or by famine; that it was consequently affording succour to one of the two against the other. But they insisted that the blockade should be preceded by formal declarations, that the blockade should be bonâ fide, executed by such a force that there would be imminent danger in violating it; and they did not admit that, by a mere declaration of blockade, either party could interdict at pleasure, by means of a pure fiction, the entry into such or such a port, nay, frequently the entire extent of certain coasts.

Lastly, as it was necessary to ascertain whether a vessel really belonged to the nation whose flag she hoisted, whether or not she carried merchandise called contraband of war, the neutrals consented to be searched, but required that this search should be made with certain courtesies to be agreed upon and punctually observed. Above all, they considered it as an essential rule that search should not take place if merchant-vessels were convoyed by a ship of war. The military or royal flag, according to them, ought to enjoy the privilege of being believed on its word, when it affirmed, upon the honour of its nation, that the vessels under convoy were, in the first place, of its nation, and, in the next, that they had on board no interdicted articles. If it were otherwise, said they, a mere brig, when cruising, might stop a convoy, and with that convoy a fleet of war, perhaps an admiral. Who knows even? a privateer might stop either M. de Suffren or Lord Nelson.

Thus the doctrines maintained by the neutrals may be reduced to four principal points.

The flag covers the merchandise, that is to say, no search shall be made after an enemy's goods on board a neutral vessel, foreign to the belligerent nations.

No merchandise is interdicted but contraband of war. This contraband is confined solely to articles made for the use of the armies. Corn, for instance, and naval stores, are not included.

Access cannot be interdicted to any port, unless it is bonâ fide blockaded.

Lastly, no vessel under convoy can be searched.

Such were the principles maintained by France, Prussia, Denmark, Sweden, Russia, and America, that is to say, by an immense majority of nations: principles, founded on respect for the rights of others, but pertinaciously contested by England.

She insisted, in fact, that, on these conditions, the commerce of her enemies would be carried on without obstacle by means of the neutrals, (which, be it observed by the way, was not correct, for that commerce could not be continued by means of neutrals, without relinquishing to them the greater part of the profits, and causing the nation obliged to have recourse to them to sustain an enormous loss;) she insisted then on seizing French and Spanish merchandise on board whatever vessel it might be. She maintained that certain commodities, without being fabricated, such as corn and naval stores, were real succours carried to a nation in time of war. She alleged that a declaration of blockade was sufficient, without the presence of a naval force, to interdict the entry of certain ports or coasts; and lastly, that neutrals, upon pretext of being under convoy, could not escape the search of the belligerent powers.

If the reader wishes to know what was at the bottom of the important interest concealed under these sophistries of the public writers of England, here it is. England was bent on preventing the precious metals of Mexico, the principal source of the opulence of Spain, from being brought to the Spaniards; and the French sugar and coffee, which they cannot dispense with; to both the timber, hemp, and iron of the North, necessary for their navy. She would fain have it in her power to starve them, in case of a deficient harvest, as she had done in 1793, for instance; she sought a pretext for closing the ports of entire countries, without having recourse to a bonâ fide blockade; lastly, she purposed, by dint of searches, annoyances, and obstacles of every kind, to ruin the commerce of all nations, so that war, which, for commercial nations is a state of distress, should become for her merchants, what it actually was, a time of monopoly and of extraordinary prosperity. With regard to the Americans, she had an intention still more unjust, namely, to rob them of their seamen upon pretext that they were English, a confusion easy to make, owing to the similarity of the languages.

In 1780, during the American war, Catherine the Great had formed the league of the neutrals to resist these pretensions. The First Consul, taking advantage of the nascent friendship of Paul, of the increasing irritation of the neutrals, and of the unparalleled violences of the English, made the utmost efforts to form a similar one in 1800.

At this moment, the dispute presented itself under one form only, that of the right of search. The Danes and the Swedes, to escape the vexations of the English cruisers, had devised the expedient of sailing in numerous convoys, escorted by frigates bearing the royal flag. It must be added that they never tarnished the honour of their flag, and took good care not to escort false Danes or false Swedes, or to cover contraband of war, as it was called. They studied only how to escape vexations which had become intolerable. But the English, viewing this as a mere subterfuge to elude a difficulty and continue the commerce of neutrals, persisted in exercising the right of search, even in regard to vessels under convoy.

In the preceding year, two Swedish frigates, the Troya and the Halla Persen, escorting Swedish merchantmen, had been stopped by the English squadrons and obliged to submit to the search of the convoy under their care. The king of Sweden had sent the captains of the two frigates before a court-martial for not defending them. This example had for a moment checked the English, who were apprehensive lest they should provoke a rupture with the northern powers. They had in consequence shown a little more lenience to Swedish vessels. But two recent instances had revived the difficulty, and driven Sweden and Denmark to the last degree of exasperation.

In the winter of 1799—1800, the Danish frigate the Haufersen, Captain Vandockum, who was conveying a fleet of merchantmen in the Mediterranean, was stopped by the squadron of Admiral Keith; she attempted to resist, was fired upon, and carried into Gibraltar. A most violent dispute ensued on this subject between the English cabinet and the Danish cabinet, and it was still going on, when, in the month of July, the Danish frigate, the Freya, escorting a convoy of her nation, was met in the Channel by an English squadron. The latter insisted on exercising the right of search; Captain Krabe, commander of the Freya, nobly resisted the summons of the English admiral, and refused to suffer the convoy to be searched. Force was employed with uncalled for violence; Captain Krabe defended himself; his ship was riddled, and he was obliged to surrender to the superior force of the enemy, for he had but a single frigate to oppose to six men-of-war. The Freya was carried into the Downs.

This occurrence was soon followed by another, of a different nature, but more odious and more serious. Two Spanish frigates were lying at anchor at the entrance of the road of Barcelona. The English formed a plan for taking them. Here was no question about the right of neutrals, but the perpetration of a piece of downright knavery, for the purpose of entering an enemy's port with impunity, without being recognised. They perceived in these roads a Swedish galliot, the Hoffnung, and resolved to make use of her for accomplishing the piratical act which they meditated. They manned their boats, boarded the galliot, clapped a pistol to the breast of the Swedish captain, and obliged him to sail quietly towards the Spanish frigates, which, having no mistrust of the Swedish flag, since it was neutral, suffered her to come alongside. The English immediately rushed on board, surprised the two frigates, which had few hands on board, took possession of them and left the harbour of Barcelona with their unworthily acquired prey.

This event produced an extraordinary sensation in Europe, and incensed all the maritime nations, whose rights the English were no longer satisfied with violating, but whose flag they outraged, by making it, unknown to itself, subservient to acts of the most infamous piracy. Spain was already at war with Great Britain; she could do nothing more; but she had recourse to Sweden, whose flag had been usurped, to denounce this odious fact, more offensive to Sweden than even to Spain. Nothing more was requisite to embitter the quarrel between England and the neutrals. At this moment especially, the moderation which the First Consul had manifested towards them was of such a nature as to render British violence more glaring. Sweden demanded reparations: Denmark had already demanded them. Behind these two courts was Russia, which, ever since the league of 1780, regarded herself as a copartner with the powers of the Baltic in all questions that interested their maritime rights.

On the part of Denmark, M. de Bernstorff kept up a brisk controversy with the cabinet of London, by means of notes which France published, and which do equal honour to the minister who wrote them, and to the nation which gave them its signature, and which had soon to support them with its arms. "A mere gun-boat," said the English, "carrying the flag of a neutral, is to have a right then to convoy the trade of the world, and to withdraw from our vigilance the commerce of our enemies, which may be carried on as easily in time of war as in time of peace!" "A whole squadron," replied M. de Bernstorff, "would be obliged then to obey the summons of the most paltry cruiser, to stop at her requisition, to suffer the convoy which it is escorting to be examined before its face! The word of an admiral, making a declaration upon the honour of his nation, is not to weigh against the doubt of the captain of a privateer, who is to have a right to verify the declaration by a search! One of these hypotheses is more inadmissible than the other."

To support its doctrines by means of terror, the English cabinet, which had just sent Lord Whitworth to Copenhagen, despatched after him a squadron of sixteen sail, which was cruising at this moment at the entrance of the Sound. The presence of this squadron produced a strong sensation among all the powers of the Baltic: it alarmed not only Denmark, against which it was directed, but also Sweden, Russia, and Prussia herself, whose commerce was likewise interested in the free navigation of the seas. The four powers which signed the old armed neutrality of 1780 commenced a negotiation with the avowed purpose of forming a new league against the maritime tyranny of the English. The cabinet of London, which was, nevertheless, afraid of such an event, insisted warmly at Copenhagen on settling the dispute; but, so far from offering indemnities, it had the singular presumption to demand them. It purposed, by frightening Denmark, to withdraw her from the league before it was formed. Unfortunately, Denmark had been taken by surprise; the Sound was not in a state of defence; Copenhagen was not secured from a bombardment. In this state of things, she was obliged to give way for the moment, with a view to gain the winter season, during which ice would defend the Baltic, and give all the neutrals time to make their preparations for resistance. On the 29th of August—11th Fructidor, year VIII.—Denmark was obliged to sign a convention, in which the question of the law of nations was adjourned, and the last misunderstanding only, which had arisen on the subject of the Freya, was adjusted. The Freya was to be repaired in the English dockyards and restored; but, for the moment at least, the Danish government ceased to furnish convoys for merchantmen.

This convention had settled nothing. The storm, so far from being dispersed, soon gathered again, for the four northern courts were extremely incensed. The king of Sweden, whose honour was not yet satisfied, prepared for a journey to St. Petersburg, to renew the ancient league of neutrality; and Paul I., who was not fond of middle terms, took at the outset a most energetic step. Being informed of the dispute with Denmark, and of the presence of a British fleet at the entrance of the Sound, he sequestered all property belonging to the English, as a security for the injury that might be done to Russian commerce. This measure was to be continued till the intentions of the British government were completely elucidated.

In the northern courts, therefore, every thing tended to favour the designs of the First Consul. Events served him according to his wish. Things went on equally well in the south of Europe, that is, in Spain. Here one of the first monarchies of the globe was seen sinking into dissolution, to the great detriment of the balance of Europe, and to the great grief of a generous nation, indignant at the part which it was made to act in the world. The First Consul, whose indefatigable mind embraced all objects at once, had already directed the efforts of his policy towards Spain, and sought to derive as much advantage for the common cause as he could from that degenerate court.

We should not draw the melancholy picture that follows, if it were not true, in the first place, and if it were not necessary, in the next, for understanding the great events of the period.

The king, the queen of Spain, and the Prince of Peace, had engaged for many years the attention of Europe, and exhibited a spectacle extremely dangerous for royalty, at that time already so much lowered in the estimation of nations. One would have said that the illustrious house of Bourbon was destined at the close of this century to lose their crowns in France, in Naples, and in Spain: for, in these three kingdoms, three sovereigns of imbecile weakness exposed their sceptres to the derision and the contempt of the world, by leaving them in the hands of three queens, either giddy, violent, or dissolute.

The Bourbons of France, whether by their own fault, whether through misfortune, were swallowed up by the French Revolution; by dint of foolishly provoking it, those of Naples had been driven a first time from their capital; those of Spain, before they let their sceptre drop into the hands of the crowned soldier whom that Revolution had produced, deemed it expedient to pay their court to him. They had already allied themselves with France in the time of the Convention; they could not but connect themselves with her much more cheerfully now that the Revolution, instead of a sanguinary anarchy, exhibited to them a great man, disposed to protect them if they followed his advice. Happy had it been for these princes, if they had followed at that time the good advice of this great man! Happy for himself had he done no more than give it them!

The king of Spain was an honest man, not harsh and blunt like Louis XVI., more agreeable in person, but less informed, and surpassing him in weakness. He rose very early, not to attend to his royal duties, but to hear masses, and then go down to his workshops, where, surrounded by turners, smiths, and armourers, and stript of his clothes like them, he wrought in their company at all sorts of work. Though very fond of the chase, he liked still better to manufacture arms. From his shops he went to his stables, to assist in dressing his horses, and indulged in the most incredible familiarities with his grooms. After spending the first half of the day in this manner, he took a solitary repast, to which neither the queen nor even his children were admitted, and devoted the rest of the day to the chase. Several hundred horses and servants were not in motion for this daily pleasure, which was his predominant passion. After riding like a young man, he would return to his palace, give a quarter of an hour to his children, half an hour to the signature of the papers submitted to him by the queen and his ministers, sit down to play with some of the nobles of his court, sometimes take a nap with them, till the hour for his last meal, which was followed immediately by his retirement to bed, always at one and the same fixed time. Such was his life, without a single variation throughout the year, unless during Passion Week, which was devoted entirely to religious exercises. In other respects, an honest man, faithful to his word, mild, humane, religious, of exemplary chastity though not cohabiting with his wife, ever since his physicians had, by her direction, ordered him to abstain from it; he had no other share in the scandals of his court, in the faults of his government, than in suffering them to be committed, without perceiving them, without believing them, during the course of a long reign.

By his side, the queen, sister of the duke of Parma, a pupil of Condillac's,¹ who wrote for her and her brother some excellent works of instruction, led a totally different life, and would do very little honour to the celebrated philosophic tutor of her youth, if philosophers could in general answer for their disciples. She was nearly fifty years old, and had still certain vestiges of beauty, which she strove to perpetuate with infinite pains. Going to mass every day, like the king, she employed in corresponding with a great number of persons, and particularly with the Prince of Peace,² those hours which Charles IV. spent in his workshops and his stables. In this correspondence she communicated to the Prince of Peace the affairs of court and State, and received from him a report of all the puerilities and scandal of Madrid. She finished her morning by giving one hour to her children, and one to the duties of government. Not a paper, not an appointment, not a pardon, went for the royal signature, before it was submitted to her. The minister who should have ventured upon such an infraction of the conditions of her favour would have been instantly dismissed. She dined alone, like the king, in the middle of the day; the rest of the afternoon was devoted to receptions, in which she acquitted herself very gracefully, and to the Prince of Peace, on whom she bestowed several hours of her time every day.

The reader is aware that the Prince of Peace was no longer minister at the period of which we are treating. M. d'Urquijo, whom we shall presently introduce, had succeeded him; but that prince was nevertheless the first authority in the kingdom. This singular personage, ignorant, fickle, of no capacity, but of handsome exterior, as it is necessary to be in order to succeed in a corrupt court, the arrogant ruler of queen Louisa, had reigned for twenty years over her vacant and frivolous soul. Weary of his high favour, he shared it cheerfully with obscure favourites, indulged in a thousand debaucheries, which he recounted to his crowned slave, whom he delighted to mortify by his stories, nay, even maltreated her, it is said, in the grossest manner: and yet he retained an absolute empire over that princess, who was incapable of resisting him, who could not be happy unless she saw him every day. She had long since committed the government to him, with the official title of first minister, and although he no longer retained the title, he did the power; for nothing was done in Spain but according to his pleasure. He disposed of all the resources of the state; and he had at home enormous sums in cash, while the treasury, reduced to the greatest straits, made shift with a discredited paper-money, depressed to half its nominal value. The nation was almost habituated to this spectacle: it manifested indignation only when some new and extraordinary scandal made the blood mount into the faces of the brave Spaniards, whose heroic resistance soon afterwards proved that they were worthy of a different government. At the moment when Europe rang with the great events occurring on the Po and the Danube, the court of Spain was the theatre of an unheard-of scandal, which had well-nigh exhausted the patience of the nation. The Prince of Peace, proceeding from one excess to another, had finished by marrying a relation of the royal family. A child was born from this union. The king and queen, resolving themselves to stand sponsors for the new-born infant, had the ceremony performed with all the etiquette customary at the baptism of Infants of Spain. The highest nobles of the court were obliged to perform the same duty that would have been required of them if the child had been the offspring of royalty. On this infant in long-clothes had been conferred the great orders of the crown and magnificent presents. The grand-inquisitor had officiated at the religious ceremony. This time, it is true, indignation had risen to the highest pitch, and every Spaniard had considered himself as personally insulted by this odious proceeding. Things had come to such a pass that the Spanish ministers opened their minds upon the subject to the foreign ambassadors, and particularly to the ambassador of France, to whom they usually had recourse in most of their embarrassments, and who received from their own lips the shocking particulars which we are here relating.

Amidst these scandalous proceedings, the king alone, kept under continual espionage by his wife, neither knew nor suspected what was passing. Neither the outcry of his subjects, nor the occasional revolt of some of the grantees of Spain, indignant at the degradation that was required of them, nor the inexplicable assiduities of the Prince of Peace,

¹ CONDILLAC, STEPHEN BONNET DE. Among the French, the founder of the sensual system. Born in 1715, at Grenoble, lived like his brother, the Abbé Mably, from his youth devoted to study.

His complete works amounted to 35 volumes.—Encyclopædia Americana.

² URQUIJO, DON MANUEL DE. Duke of Alcudia, Prince of Peace, favourite of Charles IV. of Spain. Born 1764, at Badajoz. He was a poor noble, who sang and played well on the guitar, by means of which accomplishments he gained the favour of the queen; and between 1780 and 1797 he passed through all grades from the lowest to the highest, by means of the affection of the infamous queen.—Encyclopædia Americana.

could open his eyes. This poor good-natured king even used sometimes to make this singular remark, which embarrassed all present who were doomed to hear it: "My brother of Naples is a blockhead, who suffers himself to be ruled by his wife." It should be added that the Prince of the Austrias, since Ferdinand VII., brought up at a distance from the court and with incredible harshness, detested the favourite, whose criminal influence he was aware of, and that his just hatred for the favourite was at last converted into an involuntary hatred for his father and mother.

What a spectacle, at the conclusion of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth century, when the throne of France had recently sunk with a crash, and when a young warrior, simple, austere, indefatigable, full of genius, had just raised himself upon its ruins! How long could the Spanish monarchy withstand the dangerous effect of this contrast!

Amidst these disorders, the house of Spain was at times overtaken by confused presentiments, and began to feel some apprehensions of a revolution. The ancient attachment of the Spaniards to royalty and to religion served, it is true, to cheer it; but it was afraid that revolution would come by the way of the Pyrenees, and therefore sought to dispel the danger by implicit deference towards the French Republic. The incredible violence of the English cabinet, the passionate outbursts of Paul I. against that house, on the formation of the second coalition, had thrown it completely into our arms. It regarded this as advantageous, nay, honourable, since General Bonaparte had ennobled, by his presence in the seat of power, all the relations of the cabinets with the government of the Republic.

The good King Charles IV. had conceived, though at a distance, a sort of friendship for the First Consul. This feeling became stronger every day, and it is painful to think how this singular attachment was destined to terminate, without treachery on the part of France, but by an inconceivable concatenation of circumstances. "What a great man is General Bonaparte!" Charles IV. was incessantly saying. The queen said so too, but more coldly, because the Prince of Peace, disposed sometimes to censure what the court of Spain did since he was no longer minister, seemed to blame the partiality that was shown to the government of France. Meanwhile the First Consul, informed by M. Alquier, our ambassador, a man of superior understanding and sagacity, that he must absolutely secure at Madrid the good-will of the Prince of Peace, the First Consul had sent to that favourite some magnificent arms, made at the manufactory of Versailles. This attention on the part of the greatest personage in Europe had touched the vanity of the Prince of Peace. Some attentions of our ambassador had completely won him, and thenceforward the whole court of Spain seemed to give itself up to us without reserve.

From d'Urquijo, the minister, alone was a slight resistance experienced. He was a man of eccentric character, naturally an enemy to the Prince of Peace, whom he had succeeded, and liking General Bonaparte not much better. M. d'Urquijo, of plebeian extraction, and endowed with some energy, having drawn upon himself the enmity of the clergy and of the court through some insignificant reforms which he had attempted, inclined, in an astonishing manner for a Spaniard of that time, towards revolutionary ideas. He was connected with many French demagogues, and participated to a certain point in their aversion for the First Consul. He had the merit of desiring to reform the most crying abuses, of striving, for instance, to diminish the revenues of the clergy and the jurisdiction of the agents of the court of Rome. To these measures he was striving to obtain his Holiness's assent; and in making this attempt he had exposed himself to serious dangers. Having, in fact, the Prince of Peace against him, he must be undone, if the Romish influence were to unite with the domestic influence in the palace to overthrow him. Touched with some attentions paid him by M. Alquier, witnessing, moreover, the partiality of the king and queen, M. d'Urquijo at length began, in his turn, to admire General Bonaparte, whom it was not only natural, but at that time quite the fashion, to admire.

The partiality of the king soon became unbounded. Having seen the arms sent to the Prince of Peace, he conceived and expressed a wish to have some of the same sort. Some magnificent specimens were manufactured forthwith, and he received them with real joy. The queen also wished for dresses, and Madame Bonaparte, who was celebrated for her taste, sent all the most exquisite and elegant productions of that kind in Paris. Charles IV., generous as a Castilian, unwilling to be behindhand, took care to make a right royal return. Knowing that horses would be acceptable to the First Consul, he stripped the studs of Aranjuez, Medina Coeli, and Altamira, of their handsomest inmates, to find first six, then twelve, then sixteen horses, the finest in the Peninsula. One cannot tell where he would have stopped, had he not been checked in his ardour. He took two months to select them himself, and nobody could have performed the task better, for he was a consummate judge. He appointed, moreover, a numerous train to accompany them to France, chose his best grooms for this mission, clothed them in magnificent liveries, and imposed but one condition on all this parade, namely, that, while travelling in France, his grooms should attend mass every Sunday. A promise was given that his desire should be complied with, and his joy at making a handsome present to the First Consul was then unalloyed. Though fond of France, this excellent prince had a notion that it was impossible for a man to live in that country many days without wholly forsaking the religion of his forefathers.

The défilé of these demonstrations suited well the views of the First Consul. It gratified him, he thought it useful to show to Europe, and even to France, the successors of Charles V., the descendants of Louis XIV., taking honour to themselves from their personal relations with him. But he sought more solid advantages in his diplomatic relations, and aimed at a more important object.

The king and queen of Spain were passionately fond of one of their children, the Infanta Maria Louisa, wife of the hereditary Prince of Parma. The queen, sister, as we have said, of the reigning Duke of Parma, had united her daughter to her nephew, and concentrated upon this couple her fondest affections; for she was most ardently attached to the house from which she sprang. She meditated an aggrandizement for that house in Italy, and, as Italy was at the disposal of the conqueror of Marengo, it was on him that she rested all her hopes of obtaining the accomplishment of her wishes. The First Consul, apprized of those wishes, took care not to neglect this way of arriving at his ends; and he despatched to Madrid his faithful Berthier, in order to profit by the circumstance that presented itself. This was the first subject of his attention on his return from Marengo. If he had sent one of his aides-camp to Berlin and to Vienna, he resolved to do more for the court of Spain; he resolved to send thither the man who had the largest share in his glory; for Berthier was then the Parmenio of the modern Alexander.

It was at the very moment when the First Consul was negotiating the preliminaries of peace with M. de St. Julien, when he was seducing the inflammable heart of Paul I., and fomenting in the north the quarrel of the neutral powers; it was at this moment that he despatched General Berthier in all haste to Madrid. He set out towards the end of August—beginning of Fructidor—without official title, but with the certainty of producing a great effect by his mere presence, and with secret powers for treating on the most important subjects.

His journey embraced several objects; the first was, to visit the principal sea-ports of the Peninsula, to ascertain their state and their resources, and, money in hand, to urge expeditions for Malta and for Egypt. Berthier quickly performed this task, and then hastened to Madrid to fulfil the more important mission with which he was charged. The First Consul was quite willing to grant an increase of territory to the house of Parma; he was even disposed to add to this aggrandizement a new title, that of king, which would have crowned the wishes of the queen; but he required to be paid for these concessions in two ways: first, by the restitution of Louisiana to France; secondly, by a threatening injunction to the court of Portugal, for the purpose of forcing it to make peace with the Republic and to break with England.

The motives of the First Consul for requiring such conditions were these:—Since Kléber's death, he began to be uneasy about the preservation of Egypt, and he shared with all his contemporaries the ambition of distant possessions. The rivalry between France and England, which, for a century past, had fought solely for the East and West Indies, had inflamed to the highest degree the passion for possessing colonies. In the event of Egypt being wrested from us the First Consul wished to achieve something for the colonial greatness of France. He cast his eye over the map of the world, and beheld a magnificent province, situated between Mexico and the United States, formerly belonging to France, ceded, in a time of abasement, by Louis XV. to Charles III., seriously threatened by the English and the Americans, so long as it should be in the impotent hands of the Spaniards, of little value to the latter, who possessed half the American continent, but of great value to the French, who had no possession in that part of America, and capable of being made productive, when the activity of the latter should be specially concentrated on its territory; this province was Louisiana. If Egypt, lost to us, could no longer furnish us with a compensation for St. Domingo, the First Consul hoped to find it in Louisiana.

He demanded it formally, therefore, of Spain, as the price of an acquisition in Italy. He required, in addition, that part of the Spanish fleet blocked up in the roads of Brest should be given to him. As for Portugal, he wished to take advantage of the geographical position of Spain in regard to that country, and of the ties of consanguinity which united the two reigning houses of the Peninsula, to detach it from the alliance with England. The Prince of Brazil, regent of Portugal, was, in fact, son-in-law of the king and queen of Spain. The Court of Madrid, therefore, possessed not only the power of neighbourhood, but also family influence. And it was a fit occasion for employing this two-fold medium for driving the English from this part of the Continent. The English, once excluded from Portugal, when the coasts of Prussia, Denmark, Russia, and Sweden were about to be closed against them, when Naples, doomed to submit to the will of France, was going to receive orders to forbid them her ports—the English would soon be excluded from the whole of the Continent.

Such were the proposals which Berthier was ordered to carry to Madrid. He was cordially received by the king, the queen, the Prince of Peace, and by all the grandees of Spain, curious to see the man, whose name always figured beside that of General Bonaparte in the military bulletins of these times. The conditions of France appeared hard, yet no serious resistance could be made to them. D'Urquijo, the minister, alone, fearing the effect which this cession might produce upon the Spaniards, showed rather more opposition than the court. Reasons incontestably good were adduced to make him easy. He was told that it would take a large extent of territory on the yet uninhabited banks of the Mississippi to form an equivalent for the smallest possessions in Italy; that the Spaniards needed, in the Gulf of Mexico, allies such as the French against the English and the Americans; that, if Louisiana was of great value to France, stripped of all her colonial possessions, it was of scarcely any to Spain, already so rich in the New World; that an increase of influence in Italy would be worth more to Spain than a distant territory, situated in a region where she had more land than she could work and defend; that it was an ancient French possession, wrung from the weakness of Louis XV., and which Charles III. himself, with that upright spirit which was known to all the world, had for a moment refused, so convinced was he that it was not his due. These reasons were excellent, and assuredly, under these circumstances, Spain was not asked to give more than she received. But what decided M. d'Urquijo more than all the best arguments, was the fear of offending France, and thwarting a combination to which his court was attached with a sort of passion.

An eventual treaty was agreed upon. By this treaty, the First Consul promised to obtain for the Duke of Parma an increase of dominions in Italy of about 1,200,000 souls; to ensure to him, moreover, the title of king, and the acknowledgment of this new rank by all the sovereigns of Europe, at the general peace. As soon as part of these conditions were fulfilled, Spain, in return, was to cede back to France Louisiana, with the same extent of territory which that province had when it was ceded by Louis XV. to Charles III., and to give, moreover, six ships of the line, rigged, armed, ready to receive their crews. This treaty, signed by Berthier at Madrid, filled the queen with joy, and raised the infatuation of the court of Spain for the First Consul to the highest pitch.

The last condition, which had for its object to force Portugal to break with England, was easy, for it was as accordant with the interests of Spain as with those of France. Spain, in fact, was equally interested with France in weakening the power of England, and above all in excluding her from the Continent. In this the First Consul did no more than rouse her from her unpardonable apathy, and urge her to make use of an influence which she ought long since to have employed. He went still further in his plans relative to this point: he proposed to Charles IV., if the court of Lisbon should not comply immediately with the injunction given it, to pass the frontiers of Portugal with an army, to seize one or two provinces, and to keep them as pledges, for the purpose of afterwards obliging England to restore the Spanish colonies which she had taken, in order to save the dominions of her ally. For his part, if Charles IV. did not conceive himself strong enough to undertake this enterprise, he offered him the assistance of a French army. That kind-hearted king did not ask for so much. The Prince of Brazil was his son-in-law; he had no wish, therefore, to take provinces from him, even though they were only to serve as pledges for the restitution of Spanish provinces. But he addressed to him the most pressing exhortations, and even added threats of war, if his advice was not attended to. The court of Lisbon promised to send a negotiator immediately to Madrid, to confer with the ambassador of France.

Berthier returned to Paris loaded with the favours of the court of Spain, and could assure the First Consul that he had friends entirely devoted to him in Madrid. The magnificent horses sent by Charles VI. arrived nearly about the same time, and were presented to the First Consul in the Place du Carrousel, at one of those great reviews, in which he delighted to show to the Parisians and to foreigners the soldiers who had conquered Europe. An immense concourse of curious persons came to see those beautiful animals and those grooms in splendid liveries, which reminded the spectator of the pageantries of ancient monarchy, and bore evidence to the respect, the extraordinary attentions, of the 'dest courts of Europe for the new head of the French Republic.

At this moment, three American negotiators, Messrs. Oliver Ellsworth,¹ Richardson Davis,² and Van-Murray,³ sent to reconcile France and the United States, arrived in Paris. That republic, swayed by interest much more than gratitude, above all, governed at that time by the policy of the federalist party, had drawn closer to Great Britain during the late war, and had been wanting not only to France but likewise to herself in deserting the principles of the maritime neutrality.⁴ Forgetful of the treaty of alliance of 1778, to which she owed her existence, a treaty which bound her not to grant to others commercial advantages which were not at the same time extended to the French, she had conceded extraordinary and ¹ OLIVER ELLSWORTH, an American Judge and statesman, born at Windsor, Connecticut, in 1745. His father was a farmer. At 17 he entered Yale College, which he subsequently left for Nassau Hall, at Princeton. He was admitted to the bar in 1771, at Hartford, Connecticut. In the revolutionary war he served on the patriot side, and also was a member of the general council of his own state. In 1777 he was chosen a delegate to Congress. In 1780 he was member of the council of his own state, and in 1781 Judge of the Superior Court. In 1789 he was sent from Connecticut as a delegate for the formation of the federal constitution, and it is said that the organization of the Senate of the United States is attributable to him. In 1789 he was Senator of the United States; and in 1796 was appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, on the resignation of Mr. Jay. In 1799 he was sent as an envoy to France. In 1802 he died, in his 63d year, and has left behind him a character as one of the most distinguished patriots, statesmen, and lawyers, to whom the American revolution gave birth.—Encyclopedia Americana. H.

² WILLIAM RICHARDSON DAVIS, was born in England, in 1756. At six years old he was brought to America, and received the rudiments of his education in North Carolina. In 1776 he graduated at Nassau Hall, in Princeton, New Jersey. He commenced the study of the law, until the outbreak of the war, when he obtained a company in Pulaski's legion, and served with distinction until the close of hostilities. In 1787 he was sent from South Carolina as a deputy for the formation of the federal constitution. In 1799 he was governor of North Carolina, and in the same year was sent envoy to France. He died at Camden, South Carolina, in 1830.—Encyclopedia Americana. H.

³ WILLIAM VAN-MURRAY, was born in Maryland, about the year 1762. He went to London after the peace of 1763, and resided there three years as a student in the Temple. In 1785 he returned to Maryland, and adopted the practice of law. From 1790 to 1793, he sat as a distinguished and eloquent member in the House of Representatives. In 1797 he declined re-election, and was shortly afterward sent by General Washington as envoy to the Batavian republic; in the course of which appointment the duties alluded to in the text became a part of those of his office. He died in 1803. He was one of the most accomplished and gifted of American gentlemen.—Encyclopedia Americana. H.

⁴ This is an untrue as it is unjust and ill-told. America never did give up one tittle of her pretensions as to the rights of neutrality. The aggressions of the Secretary and the Empire were both prior, in point of time, and greater and more vexatious in effect than those of Great Britain; and it was only a sense of gratitude, which most persons now consider overstrained—inasmuch as the aid extended to her by France, in the revolutionary struggle, was not in the least degree disinterested—that hindered her from declaring war on France, as she subsequently did for less cause on England.

The truth is, that it is very rare that national gratitude exists at all, and there is perhaps no instance of its lasting as long, or being as clearly shown, as in the case of the United States to France. H. F. H.

exclusive advantages to Great Britain. Giving up the principle that "the flag covers the goods," she had admitted that an enemy's property may be searched for on board a neutral bottom, and seized if its origin were ascertainable. This conduct was alike impolitic and dishonourable. The Directory naturally much irritated, had had recourse to the system of reprisals, declaring that France would treat neutrals as they suffered England to treat them. Proceeding from one harsh step to another, it had come to a state of almost declared war with America, but without actual hostilities.

Such was the state of things which the First Consul had it much at heart to put an end to. We have seen what honours he paid to Washington, with the two-fold intention of producing an effect both at home and abroad: he appointed three plenipotentiaries, his brother Joseph Bonaparte, and the two councillors of state, Fleurieu and Rœderer, to arrange matters with the American plenipotentiaries, and earnestly pressed the conclusion of the negotiation, in order to give England very soon a new adversary, by placing another power on the list of those who would engage to cause the true principles of maritime neutrality to be observed. The first obstacle to a reconciliation was the article by which the United States promised to France a share in the commercial advantages granted by her to all nations. This obligation not to concede anything to others without conceding as much to us, occasioned the Americans great embarrassment. Their negotiators manifested no disposition to yield on this point, but appeared ready to acknowledge and to defend the rights of neutrals, and to re-establish, in their stipulations with France, the principles which they had abandoned in treating with England. The First Consul, who was much more tenacious of the principles of the maritime neutrality than of the commercial advantages of the treaty of 1778, which had become illusory in practice—the First Consul directed his brother to waive the point, and to conclude an arrangement with the American envoys, provided there could be obtained from them a complete and formal recognition of the principles of the law of nations which it was important to enforce. This difficulty removed, the parties soon agreed about all the rest, and at this moment a treaty of reconciliation was preparing to be signed with the United States.

Another reconciliation, of much greater importance still, that of the Republic with the Holy See, began to produce its fruit. The new Pope, elected in the vague hope of an accommodation with France, had beheld this hope, to which he owed his elevation, realized. General Bonaparte, as we have related, returning from Marengo, had transmitted some overtures to Pius VII. through Cardinal Martiniana, bishop of Vercelli, assuring him that he had no intention to re-establish the Roman and Parthenopean Republics, instituted by the Directory. He had certainly enough to do in Italy, with the Cisalpine Republic to constitute, to direct, and to defend against the policy and the interests of all Europe. General Bonaparte required in return that the new pontiff should lend the aid of his spiritual authority in re-establishing peace and concord in France. The Pope joyfully received Count Alciati, nephew of Cardinal Martiniana, who was charged to carry the overtures of the First Consul; he sent him back immediately to Vercelli, to declare, in his name, that, though disposed to co-operate with the First Consul in effecting an object so important and so dear to the church, still he wished first to be made acquainted in a somewhat more precise manner with the views of the French cabinet. The cardinal, in consequence, wrote from Vercelli to Paris, to communicate the dispositions and the wishes of the new Pope. The First Consul, in reply, asked for a negotiator, with whom he could enter into direct explanation, and the Pope immediately appointed Monsignor Spina, Bishop of Corinth, Nuncio of the Holy See at Florence. This envoy, having first repaired to Vercelli, resolved to set out for France, at the urgent solicitation of the First Consul, who, by bringing this negotiation under his own eye, thought to make the more sure of its success. On the part of the First Consul, it was a ticklish step to bring to Paris a representative of the Holy See, especially in the state of the public mind, which was not yet prepared for a sight of this kind. It was agreed that Monsignor Spina should not have any official title, and that he should profess himself to be Bishop of Corinth, charged to treat with the French government on the affairs of the Roman government.

During these negotiations, so actively and so ably conducted with all the powers, M. de St. Julien, who had signed and was the bearer of the preliminaries of peace, had proceeded for Vienna, accompanied by Duroc.¹ Aware of the imprudence of his conduct, he had not concealed from M. de Talleyrand that he was not sure he should be able to take Duroc on to Vienna. The illusion of the minister would not allow him to give heed to this difficulty; and it was agreed that M. de St. Julien and Duroc should take the head-quarters of M. de Kray, established at Alt-œttingen, near the Inn, in their way, to obtain from that general passports permitting Duroc to enter Austria. They reached the head-quarters on the 4th of August, 1800—16th Thermidor, year VIII.—but Duroc was detained, and not suffered to pass the limit fixed by the armistice. This was a first and by no means favourable sign of the reception which the preliminaries were likely to meet with. M. de St. Julien then set off alone for Vienna, telling Duroc that he would apply for passports for him and send them to the head-quarters if he obtained them. M. de St. Julien then sought audience of the emperor, and delivered to him the articles which he had signed in Paris, on condition of ratification and secrecy. The emperor was greatly surprised and dissatisfied at the extraordinary latitude which M. de St. Julien had given to his instructions. It was not precisely the conditions contained in the preliminary articles which displeased him: it was the fear of being compromised with England, which had just assisted him with her money, and was extremely suspicious. He was prepared, it is true, to go so far as to communicate part of his intentions, for the purpose of discovering those of the First Consul; but he would not at any price have signed any document whatever, for that would infer a negotiation opened without the participation of the British cabinet. Therefore, in spite of the danger of provoking a storm on the part of France, the imperial cabinet resolved to disavow M. de St. Julien. That officer was publicly very ill treated, and sent into a sort of exile in one of the remote provinces of the empire. The preliminaries were considered as null, having been signed, though provisionally, by an agent without character and without powers. Duroc received no passports, and, after waiting till the 13th of August—25th Thermidor—he was obliged to return to Paris.

¹ DUROC, MICHAEL, Duke of Friuli. Born of an ancient family at Pont à Mousson. He entered the army as lieutenant of artillery in 1793. He served in the republican armies, and distinguished himself at the siege of Mantua and the battle of Sismone in 1796. He was ad-de-camp, in the first Italian campaign, to Leoben and afterward to Bonaparte. He distinguished himself at Grimolano, and at the passage of the Isongo, in Friuli, whence afterward his title. He followed Bonaparte to Egypt, and was made chief of battalion in the year VI. At Jaffa, St. Jean d'Acre, and Aboukir, he gained fresh honours. Returned to France with Bonaparte, and shared the struggle of the 18th Brumaire.—Encyclopædia Americana.

All this, independently of the delay in the conclusion of peace which it created, was very disagreeable to say to the First Consul; and Austria had reason to fear the effect of such a communication on his irritable character. It was very possible that he might leave Paris immediately, put himself at the head of the armies of the Republic, and march upon Vienna. The court of Austria resolved therefore, while disavowing the preliminaries, not to make a rupture of that disavowal, and to propose to the French government the immediate opening of a congress. Lord Minto, representative of the British cabinet at Vienna, consented to suffer Austria to negotiate, but on condition that England should be a party to the negotiation. It was agreed with him to propose diplomatic conferences in which England and Austria should alike take part. In consequence, M. de Thugut wrote to M. de Talleyrand, under date of the 11th of August—23d Thermidor—that, though disavowing the imprudent conduct of M. de St. Julien, the emperor was nevertheless earnestly desirous of peace; that he, therefore, proposed the immediate opening of a congress, in France itself, at Schelestadt, or Luneville, which ever the French government pleased; that Great Britain was ready to send a plenipotentiary; and that, if the First Consul assented to this, a general peace might soon be restored to the world. The whole was clothed in the language most likely to soothe the impetuous disposition of him who then governed France.

When the First Consul received these tidings, he was highly irritated. He was offended, in the first place, at the disavowal of the officer who had treated with him, and in the next, he saw with mortification that peace was deferred. He perceived, above all, in the presence of England at the negotiation, a cause of interminable delays; for there was much more difficulty in concluding a maritime than a continental peace. On the spur of the moment, and under the influence of a first impression, he was for raising an outcry, denouncing Austria as having violated her faith, and commencing hostilities forthwith. M. de Talleyrand, sensible that he had himself done wrong in treating with a plenipotentiary without powers, endeavoured to pacify the First Consul. The matter was submitted to the Council of State. This great body, which is now nothing more than an administrative tribunal, was then a real council of government. The minister laid before it a detailed report. "The First Consul," said he in his report, "has thought fit to convocate an extraordinary meeting of the Council of State, and, trusting to its discretion as well as to its wisdom, he has charged me to communicate to it the most minute details of the negotiation which has taken place with the court of Vienna." Having unfolded that negotiation, as one might have done before a council of ministers, M. de Talleyrand acknowledged that the Austrian plenipotentiary had no powers; that, in negotiating with him, the possibility of a disavowal ought to have been foreseen; that, in consequence, there was no establishing a polemique d'apparat on this subject; and that a violent outbreak ought to be avoided. But, referring to the example of the negotiations for the peace of Westphalia, which had long preceded the signature of the treaty of Munster, and during which the parties continued to negotiate and fight, he proposed that the opening of a congress should be agreed to, and at the same time that hostilities should be recommenced.

This was, in fact, the wisest course that could be pursued. It was expedient to treat, since the hostile powers had made France an offer to do so, but also to profit by the state of our armies, quite ready to take the field afresh, and that of the Austrian armies not yet recovered from their defeats, to force Austria to negotiate in earnest, and to separate herself from Great Britain.

There was, however, one thing which might be tried that had also its advantages; and the First Consul discovered it with his usual sagacity. England proposed a joint negotiation. In admitting her to a congress, there was the danger of introducing a contracting party in no hurry to conclude, and the danger, more especially, of clogging the continental peace with all the difficulties of the maritime peace: time would, therefore, elapse in negotiations either insincere or rendered more difficult; the season for fighting would be suffered to pass away, and thus the Austrian armies would gain a respite which they greatly needed. These were serious inconveniences. But a compensation might be found for them all; it was this: since England desired to be admitted to the negotiation, to admit her, but on one condition, that of concluding a naval armistice also. If England assented to this, the benefits of the naval armistice would far surpass the inconveniences of the continental armistice; for our fleets navigating wherever they pleased, would be enabled to provision Malta and to carry soldiers and matériel to Egypt. For such an advantage, the First Consul would gladly have run the risk of an extra campaign on the Continent. A naval armistice was no doubt something quite new, quite unusual, in the law of nations; but it was fair that the Anglo-Austrian alliance should pay in some manner for the sacrifice which we made on our part in suspending the march of our legions for Vienna.

We had residing in London a discreet and skilful negotiator, M. Otto, who was there for the purpose of treating of matters relative to the prisoners of war. He had even been chosen by our cabinet, with a view to make use of him on the first occasion, either to make or to listen to overtures. He was instructed specially to address himself to the British cabinet, and plumply propose the question of a naval armistice. In this mode of proceeding the First Consul found the advantage of getting on faster, and of negotiating his business directly, which he always liked to do better than to employ agents. On the 21st of August—6th Fructidor, year VIII.—instructions conformable with this new plan of negotiation were sent to M. Otto. On the same day, the communications from Vienna were answered in a very harsh tone. In this answer, the refusal to admit the preliminaries was attributed to the subsidiary treaty signed on the 20th of June last; the French government disdainfully deplored the dependence in which the emperor was placed in regard to England; it assented to a congress at Luneville, but added, that they must nevertheless fight while negotiating, because, in proposing a joint negotiation, Austria had not taken the precaution to provide, as a natural condition, for a suspension of arms by land and sea. This was one way of inducing Austrian diplomacy itself to make an effort in London for obtaining a naval armistice.

Negotiations were opened in London between M. Otto and Captain George, the head of the Transport Office. They lasted during the whole month of September. M. Otto, proposed, on the part of France, that hostilities should be suspended by land and sea; that all the vessels both of commerce and war of the belligerent nations should be allowed to sail freely; that the ports belonging to France, or occupied by her armies, such as Malta and Alexandria, should be assimilated to the fortresses of Philippsburg, Ulm, and Ingolstadt, in Germany, which, though blockaded by our armies, were nevertheless to receive provisions and supplies. M. Otto, treating frankly, admitted that France would derive great advantages from this arrangement; but he added, that she ought to have very great advantages, to compensate her for the concession which she made, in suffering the summer to pass away without completing the destruction of the Austrian forces.

The sacrifice required of England in this demand was one which nothing was capable of wringing from her. It would, in fact, be permitting the revictualling of Malta and Egypt, and thus perhaps ensuring for ever those two possessions to France; it would also be permitting the grand combined French and Spanish fleet to leave Brest, to sail into the Mediterranean, and to take a position there, which would render it afresh master of that sea for a longer or a shorter time. England, therefore, could not assent to such a proposal. Still the danger of Austria touched her deeply; she had an important interest in not suffering her to be crushed; for, if Austria were crushed, General Bonaparte, having the full command of his means, would be able to attempt some formidable enterprise against the British islands. In consequence, she deemed it expedient to make sacrifices to an interest of this kind; and, while crying out against the strangeness of a naval armistice, she presented a counter-project, dated the 7th of September, 1800—20th Fructidor, year VIII. To begin with, she assented to Luneville as the place of the congress, and appointed Mr. Thomas Grenville, brother of the minister for foreign affairs, to treat for the general peace. She next proposed the following system respecting the naval armistice. All hostilities were to be suspended by land and sea; the suspension of arms was to extend not only to the three belligerent parties, Austria, England, and France, but to their allies. This arrangement was designed to deliver Portugal from the threatening remonstrances of Spain. The maritime places which were blockaded, such as Malta and Alexandria, were to be assimilated to the places in Germany, and to be provisioned every fortnight in proportion to the consumption which had taken place during the interval of time elapsed. The ships of the line lying at Brest and other ports were not to be at liberty to change their station during the armistice.

This counter-project was, on the part of England, rather a testimony of good-will towards Austria than an actual concession on the important point of the negotiation. Malta might, no doubt, gain something by being provisioned for a few months; but Egypt needed no provisions. It was soldiers, muskets, cannon, that it wanted, and not corn, which it had to spare to all the world.

France, however, by yielding on some points, might still find in the naval armistice advantages sufficiently great to induce its acceptance, even with modifications.

On the 21st of September—the fourth complementary day of the year VIII.—the First Consul made a proposal, which was the last. He consented that ships of the line should not be allowed to change their station, which condemned the combined squadron of Spain and France to remain blocked up in Brest; he required that Malta should be revictualled every fifteen days, at the rate of 10,000 rations per day; he consented that Egypt should continue blockaded; but he required that six frigates should have liberty to leave Toulon, to sail to Alexandria, and to return without being searched by the British cruisers.

His intention here was clear enough, and he was right not to disguise an interest, which every one would have guessed at first sight. He meant to arm these six frigates en sûr, to load them with men and munitions of war, and to send them to Egypt. He hoped that they might be made to carry 4000 soldiers, a great quantity of muskets, swords, bombs, balls, &c. He had, therefore, sacrificed every thing, to confine himself to his main object, the re-activating of Malta and the recruiting of the army in Egypt.

But the difficulty, what effort soever might be made on both sides to diminish it, remained at bottom the same. The object was to preserve Malta and Egypt for France, two points upon which England would not give way. Thus there were no means of coming to an understanding. The negotiation was relinquished, on the refusal in London to admit the last plan for a naval armistice.

Before these parleys were definitively broken off, the First Consul, by way of courtesy, made a final proposal to England. He offered to renounce all armistice, and, nevertheless, to treat with her, but in a separate negotiation from that which was about to commence with Austria.

It was now September, 1800. Several months had been spent in sterile negotiations since the victories of Marengo and Hochstett, and the First Consul would not waste any more time without acting.

Austria, when threatened, had replied that she could not force England to sign a naval armistice; that she offered, for her own part, to negotiate immediately; that she had appointed M. de Lherbach to repair to Luneville; that he was about to proceed thither forthwith; that Mr. Thomas Grenville was waiting, on his part, for passports; that they could, therefore, negotiate without delay; but that it was not necessary to resume hostilities during the negotiations, and to spill more torrents of human blood. The First Consul, who perceived the secret intention of protracting till winter should arrive, determined, at length, on resuming hostilities, and had issued his orders accordingly. He had employed to good purpose the two months which had elapsed, and put a finishing hand to the organization of the armies. His new arrangements in respect to them were as follows:—

Moreau, as we have said, had been obliged to send General St. Suzanne upon the Rhine with some detachments, for the purpose of uniting the garrisons of Mayence and Strasburg, and making head against the partisans raised by Baron d'Albini in the heart of Germany. The army of Moreau was in consequence weakened, and, at the same time, the force so collected was insufficient to cover his rear. The First Consul, to ward off all danger in that quarter, had hastened to complete the Batavian army, placed under the command of Angereau. He had formed it of 8000 Dutch and 12,000 French, drawn from the troops which guarded Holland and the departments of the North. These troops, the most worn down by the preceding campaigns, reinvigorated since by rest, reinforced by recruits, now constituted excellent corps. Angereau had marched to Frankfort, where he was by his presence the Mayence levies of Baron d'Albini and the Austrian detachments left in the environs. This precaution taken, the corps of St. Suzanne reorganized, nearly 18,000 strong, had returned to the Danube, and again formed the left wing of Moreau. His return raised the active army of the Rhine to more than 100,000 men.

When the army of reserve had thrown itself into Italy, it had been obliged to leave behind part of the corps destined to compose it, and for the complete formation of which there had not been time to wait. Instead of an effective force of 60,000 men, as was intended, it had numbered only forty and some odd thousand. The First Consul had formed with these corps left behind a second army of reserve, 15,000 strong, given the command of it to Macdonald,¹ and posted it in the Grisons, facing the Tyrol, which had permitted Moreau to draw him to his right wing, commanded, as the reader is aware, by Lecourbe, and to unite, in case of need, under his hand, the entire mass of his army, if he should have to force the barrier of the Inn.

The army of Italy, on its part, established on the banks of the Mincio by the convention of Alexandria, relieved also by the presence of Macdonald from all concern about Switzerland and the Tyrol, had been enabled to draw its wings closer to its main body, and to concentrate itself in such a manner that it could enter into action at any moment. Composed of the troops which had crossed the St. Bernard, of those which had been drawn from Germany by the St. Gothard, lastly, of the troops of Liguria, which had defended Genoa and the Var, rested and recruited, it presented a total mass of about 120,000 men, 80,000 of whom were assembled on the Mincio. Masséna had at first been appointed commander-in-chief, and he was, in fact, the only one capable of commanding it well. Unfortunately, mischievous dissensions had arisen between the commissariat of the army and the Italian governments. The army, though stationed amidst fertile Italy, and in possession of the rich magazines left by the Austrians, had nevertheless not enjoyed all the plenty to which it was entitled by its long privations. It was alleged that the commissariat officers had sold part of these magazines. The governments of Piedmont and the Cisalpine, moreover, complained that they were drained by war contributions, and refused to pay them. Amidst this confusion, heavy charges were preferred against the French administration; and in these complaints General Masséna himself was included. The clamour soon became so vehement, that the First Consul thought himself obliged to recall Masséna, and to appoint General Brune² in his stead. Brune, with abundance of intelligence and courage, was

¹ MACDONALD, ETIENNE JACQUES JOSEPH ALEXANDER. Born at Sancerre in 1765. Son of a Highlander who fought at Culloden for Charles Edward. He entered the service of France in 1781. He embraced the principles of the Revolution. Was a brigadier-general in 1793. In 1794 distinguished himself under Pichegru in Holland. In 1795 commanded at Cologne, there joined the army of the Rhine, and afterward that of Italy under Napoleon.

He was left in command at Rome after the peace of Campo Formio, but was obliged to retreat before Mack; but after several battles again recovered it. He distinguished himself against Suwaroff, though defeated. Returned to Paris, and contributed to Bonaparte's success on the 18th Brumaire. In 1800 conducted the corps of reserve across the Splügen.—Encyclopædia Am. n but an indifferent general, and a still more indifferent politician. He was one of the most zealous leaders of the demagogue party, which, however, did not prevent him from being devotedly attached to the First Consul, who was thereby much gratified. Not having had it in his power to assign him an active command during the spring campaign, the First Consul determined to give him one during the autumn campaign. His victory in Holland caused him to rank high in public estimation; but the recall of Masséna was a misfortune for the army, and for the First Consul himself. Masséna, soured, was about to become, in spite of himself, a subject of hope for a multitude of intriguers, who at this moment were again stirring. The First Consul was aware of this, but he would not suffer irregularities anywhere, and one cannot blame him for it.

² BRUNE, WILLIAM MARIA ANNE. Son of a lawyer.

To these four armies the First Consul had added a fifth assemblage of troops around Amiens. He had detached from the demi-brigades left in the interior the skeletons of the companies of grenadiers, recruited them with fine men, and formed out of them a superb corps of nine thousand or ten thousand picked soldiers, whom he intended to despatch in haste to the coast, if the English should effect a landing on any part of it, or into Italy, to perform the duty which Augereau was performing in Germany, that of covering the wings and the rear of the principal army. Murat was appointed its commander-in-chief.

All this had been accomplished, as far as related to the recruiting, by means of the levy ordered by the legislative body, and with reference to the expense, by means of the financial resources recently created. These different corps were now in want of nothing; they were well fed, well armed; they had horses, and a complete matériel.

The First Consul was naturally impatient to avail himself of such means to wring peace from Austria before winter. He, therefore, ordered Moreau and Brune to repair to their head-quarters, and to make preparations for recommencing hostilities. He directed Moreau to give the Austrian general the notice stipulated by the armistice, and not to allow any prolongation of the suspension of arms, unless on one condition, that the emperor should relinquish to the French the three fortresses actually blockaded, Philipsburg, Ulm, and Ingolstadt. On this condition he consented to grant a further respite of five or six weeks. These fortresses, in fact, were worth the sacrifice. Once in possession of them, the French would obtain an excellent base of operation on the Danube; they would be reinforced by the corps which were blockading them; they would, moreover, have time left to push one wing of the army of Italy upon Tuscany and the kingdom of Naples, countries in which levies en masse were being raised at the instigation of Austria, and with the money of England. Such were the orders despatched to the head-quarters of Moreau.

The Emperor of Germany, on his part, making good use of the time, had employed with the greatest activity the subsidies furnished by England. He hastened the new levies ordered in Bohemia, Moravia, Hungary, Styria, and Carinthia. Wickham, the English minister, had established a sort of offices in several towns of Germany, for bribing soldiers to fight for the coalition. By means of a fresh subsidy, the Bavarian and Wurtemberg corps had been considerably augmented. Independently of the sums paid to Austria, English recruiting officers had taken into the direct pay of their government two regiments, composed of boatmen plying on the rivers of Germany, and destined to facilitate the passage of them. Ten thousand peasants, hired for the purpose, threw up, under the direction of Austrian engineers, formidable entrenchments along the whole line of the Inn, from the Tyrol to the junction of that river with the Danube. All was bustle from Vienna to Munich. The staff of the Austrian army had been totally changed. M. de Kray, notwithstanding his experience and his vigour on the field of battle, had shared the disgrace of M. de Melas. The Archduke Ferdinand himself, who served under him, had been removed. The Archduke John, a young prince of highly cultivated mind and very brave, but without experience in war, his head full of theories, his imagination struck by the manoeuvres of General Bonaparte, and anxious to imitate him at any rate, had been called to the supreme command of the Imperial armies. This was one of those novelties, which people are fond of trying in desperate circumstances. The emperor had repaired in person to the army, to review it, and to excite the spirit of the soldiers by his presence.

He passed several days with the army, accompanied by M. de Lherbach, the negotiator appointed to proceed to Lunéville, and by the young Archduke John. Having seen every thing, examined every thing, in company with his advisers, he ascertained that nothing was ready, that the army was not yet sufficiently recruited, either in point of matériel or courage, for the immediate recommencement of hostilities. M. de Lherbach was, therefore, commissioned to repair to Moreau's head-quarters, to learn whether a prolongation of the armistice for a few days could not be obtained from the French government. M. de Lherbach was informed by Moreau of the conditions fixed by the First Consul for a new suspension of arms. He consented reluctantly to these conditions, and on the 20th of September—the 3d complementary day of the year VIII.—he concluded a new prolongation of the armistice with General Lahorie, in the village of Hohenlinden, which was destined so soon to become celebrated. The fortresses of Philipsburg, Ulm, and Ingolstadt were to be delivered up to the Bievie—born in 1763. He was a printer in Paris at the outbreak of the Revolution, and an active member of the club of the Cordeliers. Till 1792 he edited a newspaper; in that year he went as a commissary to Belgium. In 1793 he entered the Revolutionary army. In 1796 he distinguished himself in Italy, at Verona, and Arcola

In 1798 commanded an army in Switzerland, and in 1799 defeated the English at Bergen in Holland and compelled the Duke of York to the convention of Alcmær. He was murdered at Avignon, by a mob, in consequence of a suspicion that he was the murderer of the Princess Lamballe.—Encyclopædia Americana. M.

French army, to be disposed of as he should think fit. In return, the armistice was prolonged for forty-five days, reckoning from the 21st of September, including fifteen days' notice of the resumption of hostilities, if they were once more to recommence.

The emperor returned to Vienna, dissatisfied with the visit which he had been induced to pay to the army, for that visit had been productive of no other result than the surrender to the French of the three strongest fortresses in the empire. That prince was overwhelmed with chagrin. His subjects shared his sentiments, and accused M. de Thugut of being a complete tool of England. Queen Caroline of Naples had just arrived with Admiral Nelson and Lady Hamilton,¹ to support the war party in Vienna; but the public clamour was vehement. M. Thugut was reproached for egregious faults, such as the refusal, at the commencement of winter, to listen to the pacific proposals of the First Consul, the vicious direction of the military operations, his obstinacy in not admitting the existence of the army of reserve, even when it was crossing the St. Bernard, the concentration of the principal forces of the empire in Liguria, with a view to please the English, who flattered themselves that they should gain possession of Toulon; lastly, the engagement entered into with the British government not to treat without it; an engagement signed on the 20th of June, at a moment when he ought, on the contrary, to have preserved his freedom of action. These reproaches were, in great part, well founded; but, whether founded or not, they had the sanction of events; for nothing had succeeded with M. de Thugut, and nations judge only from results. M. de Thugut was, therefore, obliged to yield to circumstances, and retired, still retaining, however, considerable influence over the Austrian cabinet. M. de Lherbach was appointed to succeed him, and, as envoy to the congress of Lunéville, instead of M. de Lherbach was selected a well-known diplomatist, M. Louis Cobentzel, who was personally acceptable to General Bonaparte, and who had negotiated with him the treaty of Campo Formio. Hopes were entertained that M. de Cobentzel² would prove a fitter person than any other for establishing amicable relations with the French government, and that, placed at Lunéville, at some distance from Paris, he would occasionally visit that capital, to have direct communication with the First Consul.

The delivery to the French army of the three fortresses of Ulm, Ingolstadt, and Philippsburg, took place most seasonably for the celebration of the fête of the 1st Vendémiaire. It could not fail to revive the hopes of peace, by furnishing evidence of the extremity to which Austria was reduced. This fête, one of the two which the Constitution had retained, was destined to celebrate the anniversary of the foundation of the Republic. The First Consul determined that it should not be less pompous than that of the 4th of July, so opportunely heightened by the presentation to the Invalides of the colours taken in the last campaign; he resolved that it should be distinguished by a character as patriotic, but more serious than those which had been given during the course of the Revolution, and, above all, that it should be exempt from the ridicule attached to the imitation of ancient customs in modern times.

Religion, it must be confessed, leaves a great void in the solemnities of nations, when it is excluded from them. Public games, theatrical representations, and fires, illuminating the night with their brightness, may occupy, during several hours, the multitude assembled to rejoice at any joyful occurrence, but cannot fill up an entire day. In all ages, nations have been disposed to celebrate their victories at the foot of their altars, and they have converted their public ceremonies into an act of thanksgiving to the Deity. But altars France then had none. Those which had been erected to the Goddess of Reason, during the reign of Terror, those which the Theophilanthropists innocently strewed with flowers, during the licentious system of the Directory, were covered with a ridicule never to be effaced; for, in regard to altars, none are respectable but those which are ancient. Now, the old Catholic altar of France had not yet been restored. Nothing, consequently, was left but academic ceremonies, beneath the dome of the Invalides; elegant discourses, such as M. de Fontanes³ could deliver; or patriotic airs, such as a Mehl⁴ or a Leseur⁵ could compose. The First Consul, sensible of all this, sought, therefore, to supply the place of the religious feature by a profoundly moral feature.

The homage to Washington, the presenta-

¹ LADY HAMILTON. A woman of obscure birth and tainted character, but of rare beauty and extreme fascination. Wife of Sir William Hamilton, the English minister at Naples, a man of some literary and antiquarian celebrity, but of no force of character. The fatal influence of this vicious woman on Nelson is too well known, and has been too generally deplored, to make any more particular allusion to it necessary. H. W. H.

² COBENZEL, LOUIS, Count of. Born at Brussels, in 1753. He first entered the military service of Austria, but was sent minister to Copenhagen in 1771, and to the court of Frederick the Great in 1775 to 1778. In 1779, he was sent to Russia, on an embassy to Catherine II. He was one of the signers of the treaty of Campo Formio in 1797, and in the following year was sent to the congress of Rastadt. In 1801 he was sent, as above, to treat with France at Lunéville.—Encyclopædia Americana.

³ FONTANES, LOUIS MARQUIS DE. Born at Nîort, in 1757. Early in the Revolution he edited a paper called the Moderateur. Escaped to England, being proscribed by the Convention in 1797. Returned after the 18th of Brumaire, and with Ronald and La Harpe, assumed the conduct of the Mercur. He soon after became president of the Corps Législatif.—Encyclopædia Americana.

⁴ MEHL, STEPHEN HENRY. A celebrated musical composer, member of the French Institute. Born at Givre, in 1763. Received his first lessons from a blind organist. At the age of twelve was appointed joint organist of the abbey of Valledieu. He afterwards studied under Edelmann and Gluck.—Encyclopædia Americana.

⁵ LESEUR, JEAN BAPTISTE, a musical composer, descended from the great painter, Leseur. Born in 1763 and placed in the musical schools at Amlens. In 1780, he received the office of director of music in the cathedrals of Paris, where he gave general satisfaction. His finest work was "The Harps," which gained him the highest honours from Napoleon.—Encyclopædia Americana.

tion of the colours taken at Marengo, had already supplied materials for the two fêtes celebrated during his consulship; he contrived to find, in a great reparative act, the subject-matter of the fête of the 1st of Vendémaire, y-ar IX.—23d September, 1800.

At the time of the violation of the tombs at St. Denis, the body of Turenne had been found in perfect preservation. Amidst the excesses of the populace, an involuntary feeling of respect had saved these remains from the general profanation. Deposited at first in the Jardin des Plantes, they had afterwards been consigned to the care of M. Alexandre Lenoir, a man, whose pious zeal, worthy of being recorded in history, had preserved for us a multitude of ancient monuments, which he had collected in the museum of the Petits Augustins. There lay these remains of Turenne, exposed to the curiosity, rather than to the respect, of visitors. The First Consul conceived the idea of depositing the relics of this great man beneath the dome of the Invalides, and under the guard of our country's veterans. To glorify an illustrious general and a servant of the ancient monarchy, was reconciling the glories of Louis XIV. with those of the Republic; it was re-establishing respect for the past, without offending the present; it was, in short, the whole policy of the First Consul, under the noblest and the most touching form. This removal was to take place on the last complimentary day of the year VIII.—22d of September—and on the following day, the first stone of the monument to Kléber and Desaix was to be laid. Thus, at the moment, when our earth, in obedience to the laws which govern its motions, was completing one great century, and giving birth to another, (no less famous in its turn, if it prove one day worthy of its commencement,) at this moment, the First Consul resolved to pay a joint homage to the hero of past times and to the twin heroes of the present time. To render these two ceremonies the more striking, he imitated in some points what had been practised at the Federation of 1790, and desired all the departments to send to him representatives, who by their presence, should give to these fêtes not merely a Parisian, but a national character. The departments cordially responded to this appeal, and chose distinguished citizens, whom curiosity, a desire to see, with their own eyes, disorder succeeded by tranquillity, the miseries of anarchy by prosperity, and the desire especially to approach and to converse with a great man, drew in great numbers to Paris.

On the fifth complementary day, in the year VIII.—September 22d—the public authorities repaired to the Museum of the Petits Augustins, to fetch the car on which was laid the body of Turenne. On this car, drawn by four white horses, was placed the sword of the hero of the monarchy, preserved in the family of Bouillon,¹ and lent to the government for that noble ceremony. Four old generals, mutilated in the service of the Republic, held the slips of the car; it was preceded by a pie-balled horse, like one which Turenne frequently rode, harnessed as horses were in his time, led by a Black, and offering an accurate representation of some scenes from the age to which this homage was paid. Around the car marched the invalids, followed by some of those fine troops which had just returned from the banks of the Po and of the Danube. This extraordinary and noble procession passed through Paris, amidst an immense concourse, and proceeded to the Invalides, where the First Consul awaited it, surrounded by the envoys of the departments, both those of the old France of Louis XIV., and those of new France; these latter representing Belgium and Luxemburg, the Rhenish provinces, Savoy, and the county of Nice. The precious relique borne by this train was placed under the dome. Carnot, minister of war, delivered a simple and suitable address, and, while music of a solemn kind, pealed through the vaulted edifice, the body of Turenne was deposited beneath the monument where it now reposes, and where it was soon to be rejoined by his companion in glory, the illustrious and virtuous Vauban where he was destined to be joined one day by the author of the great things which we are here relating; where he will certainly remain, surrounded by this august company, throughout the ages which Heaven may reserve for France.

If, in times like ours, when faith is quenched, anything can supply its place, and equal, perhaps, the pomp of religion, it is such spectacles.

On the evening of that day, a gratuitous representation of the *Tartuffe*² and the *Cid*³ was given to the people of the capital, with a view to afford them an amusement less coarse than usual. The First Consul attended the performance. His presence, his intention, instinctively guessed by that impressible and intelligent populace, all concurred to maintain, in that tumultuous assemblage, perfect decorum, a very unusual thing at gratuitous representations. The silence was interrupted only by cries, a thousand times repeated, of "Vive la République! Vive le Général Bonaparte!"

On the following day, the First Consul, accompanied, as on the preceding, by the public authorities and the envoys of the departments, repaired to the Place des Victoires. There was to be raised a monument in the Egyptian style, destined to receive the mortal remains of Kléber and Desaix, who, according to the intention of the First Consul, were to rest side by side. He laid the first stone, and then proceeded on horseback to the Invalides. There the minister of the interior, who was his brother Lucien, delivered a speech on the state of the Republic, which made a strong impression. Certain passages were highly applauded

¹ BOUILLON. This noble family is too familiarly known to require much mention. It was at its height of glory and greatness in the reign of Louis XIV.

H. W. H.

² TARTUFFE. An excellent comedy by Molière.

H. W. H.

³ THE CID. A tragedy, generally esteemed the master-piece of Corneille.

H. W. H.

ed; among others, the following, relative to the present age and the age of Louis XIV.: "One might say, that at this moment those two great ages have met to express mutual admiration over that august tomb." The speaker, while pronouncing these words, pointed to the tomb of Turenne. He was answered by unanimous applause, proving that all hearts, without derogating from the present, were willing to take again from the past what deserved reviving. And, that the spectacle might be complete, that the ordinary illusions of human nature might have their share in these scenes, otherwise so noble, the orator further exclaimed: "Happy the generation which sees a revolution begun under monarchy terminate in a republic!"

During this ceremony, the First Consul had received a telegraphic despatch, announcing the armistice of Hohenlinden and the cession of the three fortresses of Philipsburg, Ulm, and Ingolstadt. He sent his brother Lucien a note, which was read to those present, and greeted with greater applause than the academic harangue of the minister of the interior. Notwithstanding the respect due to the place, shouts of "Vive Bonaparte! Vive la République!" shook the vaults of the noble edifice. An immediate publication of the news in Paris produced a more profound satisfaction than all the rejoicings destined for the amusement of the multitude. People were not afraid of war; they were full of confidence in the genius of the First Consul and in the courage of the French armies, if it must be continued: but, after so many battles, after so many troubles, they wished to enjoy in peace the glory acquired and the prosperity that was beginning to dawn.

That prosperity was, indeed, making rapid advances. If the mere presence of General Bonaparte had sufficed, on the 18th of Brumaire, to soothe, to cheer men's minds, to revive their hopes, the case must be very different now, when the successes of our armies, the eager advances made by Europe towards us, the prospect of a speedy and a glorious peace, and lastly, tranquillity everywhere restored, had realized the hopes conceived in a first moment of confidence.

These hopes had, in fact, become realities, and it may be said that, in the ten months past, from November, 1799, to September, 1800, the face of France was changed. The public funds, the vulgar but true index to the state of public opinion, had risen from twelve francs (the real price at which five per cent. stock was sold the day before the 18th of Brumaire) to forty francs. They promised to reach fifty.

The stockholders had just received a half-year's dividend in cash, a thing which had not occurred since the commencement of our Revolution. This financial phenomenon had produced a great effect, and it appeared to be not one of the least of the victories of the First Consul. How had he been able to accomplish this prodigy? This was an enigma which the mass of the public explained by that extraordinary power, which he was already said to possess, of doing whatever he pleased.

But there is no miracle in this world: there is no other cause for real successes but sound sense seconded by a strong will. Such too was the sole cause of the happy results obtained by the administration of the First Consul. He had, in the first place, applied a remedy to the real evil, which consisted in the delays in the collection of the taxes: he had, with this view, instituted a special agency for the preparation of the assessments, formerly left too complaisantly to the communes. This special agency, stimulated by the prefects, another creation of the consular government, had made out the assessments in arrear of the year VII. and the year VIII., and finished those for the year IX., the year just entered upon—September, 1800, to September, 1801. Thus, for the first time since the Revolution, the assessments of the current year were about to be put into a train of collection, from the very first day of that year. The receivers-general, having the revenue paid to them punctually, were thus enabled to discharge punctually the monthly bills which they had accepted, and had, in fact, always paid them at the end of every month. We have already said that, to guaranty the solidity of these bills, the Treasury had required of the receivers a security in cash, which security, deposited in the Sinking Fund, was to serve to retire such bills as might be protested. Out of the 20,000,000 composing the total amount of the securities, not more than 1,000,000 had been required for the payment of dishonoured bills. Hence they had obtained immediately a character equal to that of the best commercial paper. At first, they could not be discounted below three-fourths per cent. per month, that is, nine per cent. per annum; now, persons were willing to discount them at eight, and even at seven. This was a very moderate rate, especially in comparison with that which the government had hitherto been obliged to pay. Now, as the direct contributions in a total budget of 500,000,000 amounted to about 300,000,000, the Treasury had, from the first day of that year's account, had in its hands the 300,000,000 in assets easy to be realized. Instead of receiving nothing, or nearly nothing, as formerly, and receiving but tardily the little that was paid in, it had, from the very 1st of Vendémiaire, the greater part of the public revenue at its disposal. Such had been the result of the preparation of the assessments in proper time, and of that system of bills of exchange drawn, by the name of obligations, on the chests of the receivers-general: by depriving the latter of the pretext of delay in their receipts, the government had been enabled to impose upon them the condition of paying on a fixed day.

The year VIII., which had just closed,—September, 1799, to September, 1800,—had not been so easily provided for as the year IX. promised to be. It had been necessary to withdraw all the papers previously issued, bons d'arrérage, bons de réquisition, délégations, &c. These papers had been withdrawn either by the discharge of anterior contributions, or by means of certain arrangements entered into with the holders. The revenue of the year VIII. had consequently been diminished by so much, and there had resulted a deficit on the year's account. But, the victories of our armies having carried them into the enemy's country, the Treasury was immediately relieved from the burden of their subsistence; and, with some national domains, which began to fetch advantageous prices, the deficit of that year might afterwards be covered. No more bons d'arrérage had been issued, for the stockholders were in future to be paid in cash; no more bons de réquisition, for the armies were supported either by the French treasury, or by some foreign treasury: lastly, no more délégations, for, as we have elsewhere related, the First Consul had adopted an invariable system in regard to persons having claims upon the state: he either gave them nothing or cash; and in cash he already gave them more than the preceding governments. Every week he held a council of finances: at this council he required a statement of the resources, and another of the wants, of each ministerial department, to be laid before him, selecting the most urgent of those wants, and dividing among them the resources which were sure to come in, but nothing more. With this regularity, this firmness of conduct, there was no further necessity for issuing paper; and, throwing no fictitious stock into circulation, the government had ceased to have any to redeem. The receipts of the Treasury, during the year IX., were therefore sure to be in specie.

The public dividends had been paid by the Bank of France. This Bank had existed for only six months, and it was already able to issue notes to a considerable amount, which were taken by the public as readily as cash. The wants of trade and the conduct of the government towards the new establishment, had occasioned this rapid success. The way in which the thing was done was this. Out of the securities in cash, a million, at most, had been sufficient to support the credit of the obligations. The rest had been left unemployed; and, strong as was the temptation to employ the 18,000,000 or 19,000,000 remaining to satisfy wants, all of which were urgent, the government had not hesitated to impose upon itself the severest privations, in order to devote 5,000,000 to the purchase of Bank shares, the amount of which it had paid immediately. It had not stopped there, but had deposited with it in account current the surplus of the disposable funds. An account current is composed of sums which are paid in on condition that they can be drawn out at pleasure, according to the wants of each day. Having all at once such resources at its disposal, the Bank had lost no time in discounting, in issuing notes, which, always paid in money, if the holders so desired, had acquired in a few months the value of cash. All this may now appear ordinary enough; for we see this phenomenon in every small town operating in the easiest manner, and a great number of banks prospering from the very day of their foundation. But, at that time, after so many bankruptcies, after the aversion which the assignats had excited for paper, it was a sort of commercial prodigy, wrought by a government which, of all sentiments, particularly inspired that of confidence.

The Treasury then resolved to intrust the bank with various services advantageous for itself and for the state, especially that of paying the rentes. It did this by means of a perfectly simple process. The acceptances of the receivers-general were as good as bills of exchange. The Treasury, therefore, offered the bank these bills to the amount of about 20,000,000 for discount; an operation highly advantageous to it, for discount was at six or seven per cent., and an operation perfectly safe, as these acceptances had acquired an unexceptionable character. The bank then undertook the payment of six months dividend to the stockholders, who received from it either cash or notes, at their option.

Thus, in a few months, the government had, by submitting to privations, already raised itself a powerful instrument, which, for an aid of 10,000,000 or 12,000,000 that it had received for the moment, could now render it services to the amount of hundreds of millions.

Financial prosperity, therefore, revived on all sides. The only sensible depression amidst the general well-being was the depression of landed property. In the height of our troubles, the proprietors of land or of houses had enjoyed the advantage of paying no taxes, owing to the delay in making out the assessments, or in paying next to nothing, thanks to the assignats. It was now otherwise. They were now obliged to pay, first the arrears, next the current assessments, and the whole in cash. For small proprietors, the burden was heavy. Allowance had at first been made for 5,000,000 of non-available assets in the budget, with the intention of exempting the tax-payers who were too hardly pressed; it was found necessary to devote to the same object a much larger sum. It was a kind of profit and loss account opened with the tax-payers, by the operation of which the past was forgiven them, in order that punctual payment of the present might be obtained. Landed property alone cannot support in a state all the public burdens. These must partly be met by excise, and other duties on articles of consumption. The Revolution, by abolishing the taxes on liquors, on salt, and on other articles, had closed one of the two necessary sources of the public wealth. Time had not yet opened it again. This was one of the glories destined at a later period for the restorer of order and of society in France. But he had first a great many prejudices to overcome. By establishing octrois at the gates of towns to provide for the wants of the hospitals, he had made a first useful experiment, and which accustomed people to the resumption of a measure, sooner or later indispensable.

Though landed property was for a moment heavily burdened, a general feeling of ease was, nevertheless, diffused among all classes. In all parts people felt themselves regenerated, and they found within them courage for speculation and exertion.

But there was much more to be done in that convulsed society, to restore every thing, not to a perfect state, such as one might aspire to in time, but merely to a state that was endurable. We have just seen what required to be done for the finances: there was another service quite as important and quite as much disorganized as that of the finances, namely, that of the roads. They had become almost impassable. As everybody knows, not a few years' but a few months' neglect is sufficient to change into a quagmire the artificial strata which men make upon the earth, for the transport of heavy loads. Now, it was nearly ten years since the roads in France were left almost without repairs. Under the old government, their repair was provided for by corvées, and since the Revolution by means of a sum which figured in the general budget, but had not been paid more punctually than the sums destined for other services. The Directory, seeing how things stood, had been led to the idea of a special resource, which could not be misapplied, and which could never run short: and, to attain this end, it had established a toll for keeping up the roads and erected gates for collecting it. This toll had been farmed to the contractors for the roads themselves, who, negligently superintended, defrauded both in the collection of the toll and in the application of the produce of it. Besides, it was insufficient. It yielded at most 13,000,000 or 14,000,000 per annum, and 30,000,000 would have been required. In the three years VI., VII., and VIII., no more than 32,000,000 had been expended on the roads, and it would have required at least 100,000,000 to remedy the ravages which time had made, and to provide for their annual repair.

The First Consul, adjourning the adoption of a complete system, had recourse to the simplest expedient, that of applying the general funds of the state to the succour of this important service. He continued the toll, the mode of levying it, and its application, confining himself to a stricter superintendence, and gave immediately 12,000,000 upon the year IX., a considerable sum for that time. This sum was to serve for the repair of the principal high roads running from the centre to the extremities of the republic; from Paris to Lille, from Paris to Strasburg, from Paris to Marseilles, from Paris to Bordeaux, and from Paris to Brest. He proposed to lay out afterwards on other roads a similar amount to what he had thus devoted to them, to augment this grant in proportion to the improved circumstances of the treasury, at the same time continuing the toll, till the roads of France were restored to the state in which those of every civilized country ought to be.

The canals of St. Quentin and the Oureq, commenced towards the end of the old government, exhibited everywhere the appearance of ditches half filled up, of hills half cut through, of ruins, in short, rather than works of art. He immediately sent engineers to survey them, went thither himself, and ordered definitive plans, with the intention of signaling by works of great public utility the first moments of the speedily expected peace.

It was not merely the wretched state of the roads which rendered them unfit for travelling, but also the robbers by whom they were infested in a great number of provinces. The Chouans and the Vendéens, unemployed ever since the termination of the civil war, and having contracted habits of life incompatible with peace, pursued the trade of plunder on the high roads of Bretagne, Normandy, and the environs of Paris. Refractory persons running away from the conscription, and some soldiers of the army of Liguria, impelled by privations to desert, were committing the like depredations on the roads of the centre and of the south. Georges Cadoudal,¹ who had returned from England with plenty of money, and was now concealed in the Morbihan, secretly directed this new chouannerie. Numerous movable columns, accompanied by military commissions, were requisite to suppress this disorder. The First Consul had already formed some of these columns, but he had not sufficient troops. While the Directory had kept too many troops at home, he had kept too few. But he said to himself, most justly, that, when he had beaten the enemies abroad, he should soon put down those at home. "Have patience," he replied to those who spoke to him in alarm about this kind of disorder; "give me a month or two; by that time I shall have conquered peace, and then I will do speedy and complete justice upon those highwaymen." Thus, in every point of view, peace was then the indispensable condition of well-being. Meanwhile, however, he applied himself to remedy the most urgent disorders.

We have already related that he had consented to substitute, for the oath formerly required of priests, a mere promise of obedience to the laws, which could not offend their consciences in any way. They had immediately availed themselves of this, in great numbers, and the clerical functions were at once disputed by the constitutional priests, who had taken the oath to the civil constitution of the clergy, the nonjuring priests, who had given only a promise of obedience to the laws, and, lastly, those who had neither taken the oath nor given the promise. The priests belonging to the first two classes, were competitors with one another for obtaining the churches, which were granted to them with more or less facility, according to the extremely variable humour of the local authorities. Those who had refused any sort of declaration performed the ceremonies of religion clandestinely in private houses, and were held by many stanch Catholics to be its only true ministers. Lastly, to add to the confusion, there were the Theophilanthropists, who also made use of the Catholic churches, and on certain days deposited flowers on those altars at which the priests had been saying mass. These ridiculous sectaries held festivals in honour of all the virtues, of courage, temperance, charity, &c. On All Saints' day, for example, they celebrated a festival in honour of ancestors. In the eye of strict Catholics this was a profanation of the religious edifices; and sound sense and the respect due to the dominant creeds commanded that it should be done away with.

For putting an end to this chaos, an agreement with the Holy See was requisite; an agreement by means of which those who had taken the oath, those who had given the promise, and those who had refused both, might be reconciled together. But Monsignor Spina, envoy of the Holy See, had but just arrived at Paris, and, surprised to find himself there, kept out of everybody's sight. The subject to be discussed was as delicate for him as for the government. The First Consul, discerning with extraordinary tact the characters of men and the employment for which they were fitted, had opposed to this wily Italian the person most capable of coping with him, namely, the Abbé Bernier, who, after having long directed La Vendée, had at length reconciled it with the government. He had brought him to Paris, attached him to himself by the most honourable of all ties, the desire to contribute to the public welfare, and to share the honour of doing so. To the Abbé Bernier to re-establish a good understanding between France and the Romish Church, was like continuing and completing the pacification of La Vendée. The interviews with Monsignor Spina had but just begun, and the government could not promise itself an immediate result.

¹ GEORGES CADOUHAL. The great Chouan leader. See note to p. 20.

It was of importance to come to as speedy an arrangement of religious affairs as possible; for peace with the Holy See was not less desirable for the quiet of people's minds than peace with the great powers of Europe. But, meanwhile, there was a multitude of irregularities, either mischievous or singular, against which the First Consul strove to provide in the best possible manner by consular ordinances. He had already, by his ordinance of the 7th Nivose, year VIII.—28th of December, 1799— forbidden the local authorities, frequently favourable to the priests, to thwart them in the exercise of their religion. Having charge of the religious edifices, as we have elsewhere observed, they would frequently not allow the priests the use of them on Sundays, but only on Decadis, alleging that the Decadi was the only holiday recognised by the laws of the republic. The ordinance referred to above had provided for this difficulty, by enjoining the local authorities to give up the edifices for public worship to the priests on the days indicated by each persuasion. But this ordinance had not smoothed all the difficulties relative to Sundays and Decadis. On this point the laws and manners were at variance, a variance which it is necessary to explain, in order to convey an idea of the state of French society at that period.

The Revolution, in its passionate fondness for uniformity and symmetry, had not confined itself to the introduction of uniformity into all measures of length, superficies, and weight, and to the reduction of them to natural and immutable unities, such as a fraction of the meridian, or the specific gravity of distilled water; it had aimed at introducing the same regularity into the measure of time. It had therefore divided the year into twelve equal months, of thirty days each, completing it by the ingenious invention of five complementary days. It had divided the months into three decades, or weeks of ten days each, reduced in this manner the days of rest to three per month, and substituted for the four Sundays of the Gregorian calendar the three decadis of the republican calendar. Most assuredly, in all mathematical points of view, this latter calendar was far better than the old one; but it offended religious ideas: it was not that of the generality of mankind, that of history; it could not overcome inveterate habits. The metrical system, after forty years' efforts and legislative restrictions, and notwithstanding its incontestible commercial advantages, has scarcely yet been definitively adopted: how then could there be any hope of supporting the republican calendar against a custom of twenty centuries, against universal usage, against the power of religion? When we reform, we must be content to reform for the purpose of applying a remedy to real sufferings, of re-establishing justice where it is wanting; but to reform for the pleasure of the eye or of the mind, for the purpose of putting a straight line where there is none, is requiring too much of human nature. You may form at pleasure the habits of a child; you cannot remould those of a grown man. It is the same with nations: you cannot alter the habits of a people after an existence of fifteen centuries.

Accordingly, Sunday was again observed in all quarters. In certain towns, the shops were closed on Sundays, in others on Decadis; frequently in the same town, in the same street, the contrast existed, and exhibited the spectacle of a mischievous conflict of ideas and manners. For the rest, Sunday would have prevailed everywhere, but for the intervention of certain authorities. The First Consul, by a new ordinance of the 7th Thermidor, year VIII.—July 26th, 1800—decided that every one should be at liberty to keep holiday when he pleased, to adopt for a day of rest the day most conformable with his tastes or his religious opinions; and that the public officers, bound to adhere to the legal calendar, should alone be obliged to choose the Decadi for the suspension of their labours. This was insuring the triumph of Sunday.

The First Consul acted judiciously in encouraging the return to an ancient and general habit—most judiciously, if he designed re-establishing the Catholic religion, as he really did design, and with good reason, to do.

The emigrants again engaged his attention. We have already adverted to their eagerness to return ever since the very first days of the Consulate: this eagerness had kept increasing, on observing what repose France enjoyed, in what security all the inhabitants of its territory lived. But, desirous as the government was to put an end to the proscription launched against them, it was yet necessary, while putting down one disorder, and proscription is one, to avoid falling into another, for a precipitate reaction is a disorder too, and of the most serious nature. These returned emigrants found on their estates either old denouncers, who had contributed to persecute them, or purchasers who had obtained possession of their property with paper: to both these classes they were disquieting enemies, or at least troublesome neighbours; and they were not discreet enough not to abuse the clemency shown to them by the government.

They availed themselves with tacitry of the law passed a few months before, which declared that the list of the emigrants was closed. Those who had been omitted in this list lost no time in profiting by the clause respecting them. As they could no longer be inscribed but by the authority of the ordinary tribunals, which constituted but an inconsiderable danger for them, they lived in quiet, and had almost all returned. Those who had been entered in the list, and whom the law referred to the administrative authorities to claim their erasure, took advantage of the spirit of the times to get their names erased. They applied, in the first instance, for surveillances, that is, as we have already explained, the faculty of returning for a time under the superintendence of the political police; they then obtained, from friends, or from complaisant persons, false certificates, attesting that they had not quitted France during the reign of Terror; that they had only kept concealed to save themselves from the scaffold; and in this manner they obtained their erasure with incredible facility. The list drawn up formerly by the local authorities, with the recklessness of persecution, comprehended 145,000 persons, and formed nine volumes. Now, names were erased with as much recklessness as they had before been inscribed, and the emigrants were reinstated by thousands in all their rights. Some, whose properties had not yet been sold, applied to the members of the government to get the sequestration taken off; they solicited, according to custom, the men whom they abused the day before, whom they would again abuse on the morrow, and frequently Madame Bonaparte herself, who had formerly been connected with the French noblesse, in consequence of the rank which she held in society. If the emigrants, whose estates were not sold, recovered them at the price of abject solicitations followed by ingratitude, there was no great mischief in that; but those whose property had been alienated went into the provinces, addressed themselves to the new proprietors, and often, by dint of threats, importunities, or religious suggestions at the pillow of the dying, recovered their family possessions at a low price, by means not much more creditable than those by which they had been despoiled of them.

The tumult was at this moment so general as to attract the attention of the First Consul. He wished to redress the wrongs done by the Revolution, but above all he wished to avoid alarming any of the interests which it had created, and which had become legitimate with time. In consequence, he thought it right to adopt a measure, which was only part of what he did at a later period, but which introduced some order into that chaos of claims, of precipitate returns, and of dangerous attempts. After mature deliberation in the Council of State, the following ordinance was issued on the 20th of October, 1800—28th Vendémiaire, year IX.

In the first place, all those previously erased, no matter by what authority, or with what negligence the proceedings in regard to them had been conducted, were validly withdrawn from the list of emigrants. Certain collective inscriptions, under the designation of children or heirs of emigrants, were considered as not having taken place. Women, under the authority of husbands when they quitted France, minors under the age of sixteen years, priests who left the country in obedience to the laws of banishment, persons comprehended under the head of day-labourers, workmen, artisans, or domestic servants; the absent, whose absence was anterior to the Revolution, the Knights of Malta, residing in Malta during our troubles, were all definitively erased. The names of the victims who had perished on the scaffold were also withdrawn from the list: this was a reparation due to their families as to humanity. These modifications made, those were kept upon the list without exception who had borne arms against France, those who held offices in the civil or military household of the exiled princes, those who had received rank or title from foreign governments, without the authorization of the French government. The minister of justice was to appoint nine commissioners, the minister of police a like number; to these eighteen commissioners the First Consul was to add nine councillors of State; these twenty-seven persons collectively were charged to make out the new list of emigrants upon the bases indicated. The emigrants definitively erased were obliged to make a promise of fidelity to the Constitution, if they wished to remain in the country, or to obtain the removal of the sequestration from their unsold property. They were condemned to remain under the surveillance of the political police till a year after the conclusion of a general peace. This precaution was designed for the protection of the purchasers of national domains. As for the emigrants definitively kept upon the list, nothing could for the present be enacted relative to them: what concerned them was deferred to a later period.

Under existing circumstances, this ordinance comprehended all that could most reasonably be done; it retrenched from the proscription list the great mass of the inscribed; it reduced that list to a small number of the declared enemies of the Revolution, and postponed the decision of the fate of all such to a future period. Thus, when the Republic should be definitively victorious over Europe, universally recognised, solidly established, when the firm determination of the First Consul to protect the purchasers of national domains should have sufficiently dispelled their fears, the government would probably be able to complete that act of clemency, and at length recall all the proscribed, even those who had been traitors to France. For the moment it went no further than to cut several embarrassing questions, and to put an end to many intrigues.

We see what difficulties of all kinds that government had to surmount, to restore order in a subverted society, to be clement and just towards the one, without alarming or being unjust towards others. But toilsome as were its labours, they found their reward in the plaudits, it may be said, of the entire country. In the first days which succeeded the 18th Brumaire, people had thrown themselves into the arms of General Bonaparte, because they sought force, whatever it might be; and he cause, from the acts of the young general in Italy, they hoped that this force would be enlisted into the service of sound sense and justice. A single doubt was then felt, and somewhat diminished the eagerness to give themselves up to him. Will he keep his place longer than the governments which preceded him? Will he understand how to govern so well as he did how to fight? Will he put an end to the troubles, the persecutions? Will he be of such or such a party? The eleven or twelve past months had effectually dispelled these doubts. His power was gaining strength from hour to hour; since Marengo, especially, France and Europe bowed under his ascendancy. As for his political talents, there was but one voice on that subject among those who approached him; he was, at least, as great a statesman as he was a commander. As for the tendency of his government, that was as evident as his genius. He was of that moderate party which deprecated persecution of every kind, which, disposed to annul some of the things which the Revolution had done, was not for annulling all, but, on the contrary, was determined to uphold its principal results. These doubts removed, people rallied around him with the eagerness of joy and gratitude.

In all parties there are two sets of persons; the one numerous and honest, whom a man may bring over to himself by realizing the wishes of the country; the other, small in number, stubborn and factious, which, far from contenting, you deeply mortify by realizing those wishes, because you deprive it of its grievances. With the exception of this latter class, all the parties were satisfied, and lent freely their support to the First Consul, or resigned themselves, at least, to his government, if their cause was irreconcilable with his, as the royalists, for example. The patriots of '89,—and ten years before these comprised nearly all France,—the patriots of '89, at first hurried on by enthusiasm towards the Revolution, soon borne back at the sight of the bloody scaffold, now disposed to think that they had been mistaken on almost every thing, conceived that they had at length found, under the consular government, all that was possible to be realized in their wishes. The abolition of the feudal system, civil equality, a certain intervention of the country in its affairs, no great deal of liberty, but much order, the triumphant position of France in Europe—all this, very different, it is true, from what they had at first wished for, but now sufficient in their estimation, all this seemed insured to them. M. de la Fayette, who, in many respects, resembled those men, excepting that he was less convinced—M. de la Fayette, released from the dungeons of Olmütz, through an act of the First Consul's, proved, by his perfectly disinterested assiduities towards him, the esteem which he felt for his government and the adhesion of those who entertained sentiments like his own. As for the more ardent revolutionists, who, without being attached to the Revolution from participation in its condemnable excesses, adhered to it from conviction from sentiment—these were pleased with the First Consul for being the reverse of the Bourbons and insuring their definitive exclusion. The purchasers of national domains, though looking black at times, on account of his indulgence towards the emigrants, had no doubt of his resolution to uphold the inviolability of the new properties, and clung to him as to an invincible sword, that secured them from the only real danger with which they were threatened, the triumph of the Bourbons and the emigrants by means of the arms of Europe.

As for that timid and well-disposed portion of the royalist party, which sought, above all, to be relieved from all further dread of the scaffold, exile, or confiscation, which, for the first time for ten years past, began not to have them before its eyes, it was almost happy, for, with it, to have nothing to fear was almost happiness. All that the First Consul did not yet grant, it finally anticipated from him, if I may so express myself. To see the people in their workshops, the tradesmen at their counters, the nobility in the government, the priests at the altar, the Bourbons in the Tuileries, and General Bonaparte at their side, in the highest station imaginable for a subject, would have been to these royalists perfection. Of these things there were three or four, which already they clearly discerned in the acts and plans of the First Consul. As for the last, that of seeing the Bourbons again in the Tuileries, they were disposed, in their good-natured credulity, to expect it of him, as one of the miracles of his astounding genius; and, if the difficulty of believing that a man would thus give up to others a crown which he held in his hand staggered those possessed of some perspicacity, their resolution was soon taken. "Let him make himself king," said they, "but, let him save us, for monarchy alone can save us!" A great man in default of a legitimate prince, seemed acceptable to them; but a king they must have at any rate.

Thus by insuring to the patriots of '89 civil equality; to the purchasers of the national domains, to the staunchest patriots, the exclusion of the Bourbons; to the moderate royalists personal safety, the re-establishment of religion; to all, order, justice, national greatness, he had won the honest and disinterested mass of all the parties.

There was still, what there always is, the implacable portion of these parties, that which Time never changes but by consigning it to the grave. Those who compose it are, in general, the most conscientious, or the most guilty of men, and these are always last upon the breach.

The men who, in the course of the Revolution, had imbrued their hands in blood, or signalized themselves by excesses which it was impossible to forget; others who, though they had nothing wherewith to reproach themselves, had been hurried into demagogue turbulence by the violence of their character or the turn of their mind; the furious Mountainers, the few survivors of the famous Commune, the old Jacobins and Cordeliers, were irritated in proportion to the success of the new government. They called the First

Consul a tyrant, who meant to effect a complete counter-revolution in France, to abolish liberty, to bring back the emigrants, the priests, and even the Bourbons, to make himself their base servant. Others, less blinded by anger, said that he designed to make himself tyrant for his own aggrandizement, to stifle liberty for his own advantage. He was a Cæsar who ought to fall under the dagger of a Brutus. They talked of daggers, but did nothing but talk of them; for the energy of these men, greatly exhausted by ten years' excesses, began to turn into violence of language. We shall soon see, in fact, that it was not in their ranks that resolute assassins were likely to be found. The police was incessantly at their heels, penetrating into their clandestine meetings, watching them with incessant attention. There were some who wanted nothing but bread; the First Consul, by the advice of Fouché, the minister, cheerfully supplied them with it, or, if they were fit for any thing, he did better, he gave them employment. They then became, according to the account of the others, nothing but wretches sold to the tyrant. If even there were any, who, from sheer fatigue, became a little more calm, as was at this time the case with some notorious personages, such as Santerre, and several others, they were immediately branded with the appellation of hirelings. According to the custom of parties, these incorrigible demagogues sought, among the real or supposed discontented men of the day, the imaginary hero who was to realize their dreams. It is not known from what indications Moreau had appeared to them to be jealous of the First Consul; it was, probably, because he had acquired sufficient glory to be the second personage in the State. They had instantly extolled him to the skies. But Moreau had just arrived in Paris; the First Consul had given him a most flattering reception, made him a present of a pair of pistols, enriched with precious stones, and inscribed with the names of his victories: he was now nothing but a lackey. Brune, the demagogue, at first dear to their hearts, had, by his intelligence, attracted the attention of the First Consul, obtained his confidence, and been appointed to the command of the army of Italy; he, too, was a lackey. Masséna, on the contrary, deprived rather abruptly of the command of that army, was dissatisfied, and could scarcely contain himself; he was immediately declared the future saviour of the Republic, and ought to put himself at the head of the real patriots.

1 CARNOT, LANNES, SIEYÈS. Notes ante.

2 MADAME BONAPARTE. Marie Joséphine Rose, daughter of Joseph Gaspard Tascher de la Pagerie, by Rose Claire des Vergers de Saintis, was born in the island of Martinique on the 23d of June, 1763. She went to Paris in her fifteenth year, was married in 1779 to Alexander Viçcount Beauharnais, and presented at the court of Marie Antoinette, where she gained a certain character for levity and a habit of imprudence, from neither of which she ever recovered fully. Her marriage was not a happy one. The Revolution ensued. The Viçcount de Beauharnais was imprisoned and put to death, she displaying the greatest courage and devotion to him to the last. She was imprisoned for a long time, and expected hourly to share her husband's fate, but in six days the death of the fiend Robespierre produced her liberation. While in prison she became intimate with Theresa Cabanis, afterward Madame Tallien, with whom she soon became conspicuous by their adoption of Such was the case with Carnot, whom they called a royalist of the 18th of Fructidor, whose proscription they then demanded and obtained, and who, being now deprived of the portfolio of war, again became, in their estimation, a great citizen; such was the case with Lannes, who, it is true, was attached to the First Consul, but was a decided republican, and at times used extremely violent language relative to the return of the priests and of the emigrants; such was the case with M. Sieyès himself—with M. Sieyès, odious at first to the republicans for having been the principal accomplice of the 18th of Brumaire, then the butt of their railery, on account of the disappointment with which the First Consul had repaid his services, and by this time almost a favourite with them, because, dissatisfied with being a cipher, he showed what he had shown to all the governments—a cold and disapproving mien. Carnot, Lannes, Sieyès,¹ were to join Masséna to set up the Republic again on the first occasion. Lastly, what will strikingly illustrate the silly credulity of the expiring parties, the minister Fouché, one of the two principal advisers of the First Consul, and who had no object to gain—the minister Fouché, because he was well acquainted with these patriots, not afraid of them, and occasionally afforded them relief, knowing that it was rather tongues which need silencing, than hands disarming—the minister Fouché was to join Masséna, Carnot, Lannes, and Sieyès, to overthrow the tyrant, and save the liberties which were menaced.

The royalist faction had, like the revolutionary faction, its implacable sectaries, equally credulous reasoners, but more formidable conspirators. These were the great nobles of Versailles, who had returned, or were about to return, intriguers charged with the sorry affairs of the Bourbons, going to and fro between France and foreign countries, to frame childish plots, or to earn a little money; lastly desperadoes, devoted soldiers of Georges, ready for any crimes.

The first, great nobles, accustomed to talk much, attacked by words only the First Consul, his family, and his government. They lived in Paris nearly like foreigners to the country, scarcely designing to notice what was passing there, sometimes soliciting their erasure from the list of emigrants, or the removal of the sequestration from their unsold property. For this purpose they frequented Madame Bonaparte's,² at least such of them as had been acquainted with her when she was the Grecian costume, and their influence with the Directory now exercised on the side of mercy. About this time Barras became strongly interested in her, and procured the restitution of her husband's property. In 1795, she became acquainted with Napoleon Bonaparte, and on the 6th of March, 1796, they were married.

She followed him through the first campaign of Italy, was present at the siege of Verona, and afterward held a species of court in Genoa. In December, 1797, in order to counteract her influence over him, several of his brothers, and afterward Junot, endeavoured and perhaps partially succeeded in making him doubt her fidelity—most unjustly! It is curious to observe, as regards Junot's agency in this matter, that every line of the book written by his wife, the Duchesse d'Abrantes, teems with spiteful and bitter remarks concerning Josephine. On his return from Egypt, in 1799, there was a considerable misunderstanding between them, but it was speedily accommodated, and none such ever arose again.

the wife of M. de Beauharnais. They went in the morning, never in the evening, were received in the entresol of the Tuileries, which she had fitted up for her private apartments, warm solicitors while there, excusing themselves as soon as they had left for having gone thither, and attributing that step to a strong desire to oblige unfortunate friends. Madame Bonaparte foolishly found pleasure in the society of these equivocal visitors; and her husband, though frequently annoyed by them, nevertheless endured them out of complaisance to his wife, perhaps, too, from a desire to know every thing, and to have communications with all parties. There were few of these solicitors who were not under obligations to the government, either on their own account, or on account of relations; but the freedom of their language was not for this reason at all diminished. All that was done for them was, in their estimation, no more than their due: they had been robbed of their possessions, and, if they were restored to them, this was but a duty, an act of repentance, for which they owed no gratitude to any one. They jeered at every thing and at everybody, even at the embarrassment of Madame Bonaparte, who, if she was proud to be the wife of the first man of the age, seemed almost ashamed of being the wife of the chief of the government, and who was at once too kind and too weak to crush them with the legitimate pride which she ought to have felt. They jeered, we said, at everybody, excepting, however, the First Consul, whom they thought a great general, but a middling politician, without consistency in his ideas, favouring the Jacobins one day, the royalists the next, having no will but in war, because war was his profession, and there, too, inferior to Moreau, in more than one respect. It is true, he had obtained splendid success; that those gentlemen admitted; thus far every thing had prospered with him, but how long would that last? Europe, indeed, was now incapable of resisting him; but, though conqueror abroad, would he overcome all the difficulties with which he was surrounded at home? The finances seemed to improve, but paper, which had been the ephemeral expedient of all the revolutionary governments, was also the expedient of his. Nothing was to be seen but bills of the receivers-general, notes of the Bank of France, &c. Would not this new paper end as paper had always ended? The government at this time did make some sort of shift, because the armies were maintained by the conquered countries; but at the peace, when they should return to their own territory, how were they to be provided for? Landed property was grievously burdened, and before long those subject to the taxes neither could nor would pay them. People talked, it was true, of the satisfaction of certain classes, of priests and emigrants, who were well treated by the present government; but that government recalled the emigrants without restoring their property to them. They were enemies whom it brought from abroad into the country, and who were in consequence the more dangerous. It recalled the priests, but without giving them back their altars. To concede every thing by halves in this way, was to confer an obligation one day on people who would not thank you for it the next. Bonaparte, as these royalists called him, for they never deigned to give him his proper title, Bonaparte knew not how to do any thing but in an incomplete manner. He had permitted Sunday to be kept, but he had not dared to abolish the Decadi, and France, left to herself, had returned universally to Sunday. This was not the only ancient custom to which she would return, as soon as an example was set or liberty given. Bonaparte, by re-establishing, now this, then that, was himself commencing a counter-revolution, which would soon hurry him further than he meant to go. Since he was about reviving so much of the past, would he go the length of restoring the monarchy, and even of restoring it for himself, by making himself king or emperor?—if so, he would only render the counter-revolution more certain, by undertaking to effect it with his own hands. On this restored throne there would very soon be wanted those princes who alone were worthy to fill it; and, in re-establishing the institution, he would have re-established it for the Bourbons.¹

It frequently happens that hatred guesses right, because it takes delight in imputing faults, than which nothing is more predicable of human conduct. Only, in its restless impatience, it outstrips time. These shallow tattlers knew not how near they came to the truth; neither did they know that, before their predictions were accomplished, it was decreed that the world should be convulsed for fifteen years; it was decreed that the man of whom they thus spoke should have achieved sublime things, committed prodigious faults; and that, ere the catastrophe arrived, they should have time to belie themselves, to abjure their cause, to forsake the only legitimate princes in their estimation, to serve this ephemeral master, to serve and to adore him; they knew not that, if France should one day return to the feet of the Bourbons, she would approach them as if thrown by the tempest to the foot of a time-honoured tree, but thrown thither only for a moment.

In a lower sphere conspired otherwise than by words the intriguers in the service of the

It is a singular thing that from the moment of his repudiating this sweet, amiable, and interesting woman, the fortunes of Napoleon changed, and his fates verged as rapidly and continually downward, as previously they had mounted gloriously. Perhaps the very measures he took to consolidate and perpetuate his power, in his wedding the cold and selfish Arch-duchess, who calmly abandoned him to St. Helena, in the evil day, was the predominating cause which led to the downfall of all his greatness.

H. W. H.

¹ This picture of the emigrants of those days is not drawn from imagination. The language which I attribute to them is literally extracted from the voluminous correspondence addressed to Louis XVIII., and brought by that prince to France. Left, during the Hundred Days, at the Tuileries, and subsequently deposited in the archives of the Foreign Office, it furnishes singular evidence of the illusions and of the passions of that time. Some of these letters are very witty, and all very curious.

Bourbons, and lower still, but more dangerously, the agents of Georges, with their hands full of money supplied by England. Georges, ever since his return from London, was in the Morbihan, concealing himself from observation, acting the part of a man who retires in resignation to some rural retreat, but implacable in reality, having sworn in his heart, having sworn to the Bourbons, to perish or to destroy the First Consul. To attack in open fight the grenadiers of the consular guard would be hopeless; still there were among the Chouans arms quite ready to have recourse to the last expedient of vanquished parties, that is, to assassination. Among them might be found a band ready for any thing, for the blackest crimes as well as the rashest attempts. Georges, still undecided as to the moment and the place which ought to be chosen, kept them to their purpose, communicating with them through trusty persons, giving up to them the high roads for their subsistence, or part of the money received in profusion from the British cabinet.

The First Consul, satisfied with the homage of France, with the unanimous adhesion of the sincere and disinterested men of every party, gave himself little concern about the language of the one class, or the plots of the other. Wholly engrossed by business, he thought little of the empty talk of the idle, though he was far from being insensible to it; but, for the time being, he was too much absorbed by his task to pay much attention to such language. He thought very little more of the plots directed against his person; he considered them as one of those dangers, which he braved every day on the field of battle with the indifference of fatalism. For the rest, he deceived himself respecting the nature of his danger. Having, on the 18th of Brumaire, wrested the supreme power from the revolutionary party, and having it at the moment for his principal enemy, he threw the blame of all that happened on this party, and seemed to be irritated against it alone. The royalists, at least at that time, were in his eyes but a persecuted party, which it was right to screen from oppression. He was well aware that there were villains among them; but he had contracted the habit, from living with moderate men, of anticipating violence from the revolutionists alone. One of his advisers, however, strove to correct this error of his judgment: it was M. Fouché, the minister of the police.

In this government, conducted almost by one man, all the ministers had been cast into the shade, with the exception of two, Messrs. Fouché and de Talleyrand. They alone were, at times, faintly discernible through the halo of glory which encircled General Bonaparte, and the dazzling effulgence of which threw all around him into comparative obscurity. General Berthier had just succeeded Carnot in the department of war, because he was more supple, more resigned to the modest part of comprehending and rendering the ideas of his chief, which he did with a clearness and a precision truly admirable. It was no slight merit to be the worthy chief of the staff to the greatest captain of the age, and perhaps of all ages. But Berthier, beside the First Consul, could not have any importance as director of the military operations. The navy, at the moment, attracted very little attention. The finances required only the firm and persevering, but unobtrusive application of certain principles of order, laid down once for all. The police, on the contrary, was of great importance, on account of the vast authority with which the government was armed; and, as well as the police, the foreign affairs, on account of the relations to be re-established with the whole world. As for the police, the First Consul needed a man who was acquainted with the parties and with the individuals of whom the parties were composed: this was the cause of the influence acquired by Fouché, the minister. In regard to the foreign affairs, though no person better qualified than the First Consul could be presented to Europe, there needed every moment an agent more mild, more patient than he: and this was the cause of the influence acquired by M. de Talleyrand. Messrs. Fouché and de Talleyrand shared, therefore, the only portion of political credit which the ministers then enjoyed.

The police was not at that period what fortunately it has since become, a mere surveillance, without power, charged solely with warning and giving information to justice. It was an immense arbitrary authority deposited in the hands of a single man. The minister of the police could exile these as revolutionists, could recall those as emigrants, fix for all the place of their residence, continue or remove the sequestration from the property of returned emigrants, restore or take away his church from a priest, suppress or reprimand a journal which had displeased him; lastly, point out any person to the mistrust or the favour of a government, which then had an extraordinary number of places to give away, and which soon had the wealth of Europe to distribute among its creatures. The minister of the police, on whom the institutions of the time conferred such attributions, though placed under the supreme and vigilant authority of the First Consul, yet possessed a formidable power over the whole nation.

M. Fouché, charged to exercise this power, formerly an Oratorian and a Conventionalist, was an intelligent and a crafty personage, neither good nor wicked, well acquainted with men, especially the bad, and despising them; employing the funds of the police in supporting the agents of troubles as much as in watching them; always ready to procure bread or a place for every person weary of political agitations; thus making friends for the government, and more especially for himself; creating for himself obliged dependents, far superior to credulous and deceitful spies, who never failed to inform him of every thing that it was his interest to know; having persons under obligations to him in all the parties, even among the royalists, whom he knew how to manage, and to repress at the right time always forewarned, never overrating danger nor exaggerating it to his master; clearly distinguishing an imprudent man from one really to be feared, knowing when to caution the case, to proceed against the other; in short, managing the police better than it ever was managed, for it consists in disarming animosities as much as in repressing them; a superior minister, if he had had elevated intentions, if his indulgence had sprung from any other principle than an indifference to good and evil, if his activity had proceeded from any other motive than a passion for interfering in every thing, which rendered him irksome and suspicious to the First Consul, and frequently gave him the appearance of a vulgar intriguer. For the rest, his intelligent but ignoble countenance, was a faithful mirror of the qualities and vices of his soul.

The First Consul, chary of his confidence, never granted it freely, especially to men for whom he had no esteem. He made use of M. Fouché, and at the same time distrusted him. Hence he sometimes sought to dispense with or to control him, by giving money to De Bourrienne,¹ his secretary, to Murat, the commandant of Paris, but especially to Savary, his aid-de-camp, in order to compose in this way several contradictory policies. But M. Fouché always contrived to convict these bastard policies of awkwardness and puerility, proved himself alone to be well informed, and, while frequently crossing the First Consul, nevertheless made his peace with him by that manner of treating men in which was mingled neither love nor hate, but an incessant application to wean them, one by one, from an agitated and factious existence.

M. Fouché, half faithful to the revolutionary party, took pleasure in showing indulgence to his old friends, and dared, in reference to them, to contradict the First Consul. Well knowing their moral situation, appreciating, more especially, the villains of royalism, he was incessantly repeating that the danger, if there were any, was from the royalists much more than from the revolutionists, and that they should soon have occasion to perceive this. He had even the merit, but not for a long time, of insisting that it would be well not to forsake the Revolution and its ideas quite so much. Hearing already the flatterers of the day assert, that it was necessary to proceed more rapidly in reaction, to disregard the prejudices of the Revolution, and to return to something that should resemble monarchy, minus the Bourbons, he dared to censure, if not the aim, at least the imprudence with which certain persons pursued that track. While admitting the justice of his opinions, given with good sense, but without frankness and without dignity, the First Consul was struck, but not pleased, with them. He acknowledged the services of this personage, but had no esteem for him.

M. de Talleyrand performed a totally contrary part; he had neither affection for M. Fouché nor resemblance to him. They had both been formerly priests, the one having belonged to the superior, the other to the inferior clergy, and yet they had nothing in common, but their having both taken advantage of the Revolution to cast aside, the former the prelate's robes, the latter the humble gown of the Oratorian professor. How strange, it must be confessed, and how characteristic of that deeply convulsed society, was the spectacle presented by this government, composed of a soldier and two priests, who had abjured their profession, and, though thus composed, having none the less splendour, grandeur, and influence in the world.

M. de Talleyrand, descended from a family of the noblest lineage, destined by his birth for the army, doomed to the priesthood by an accident, which deprived him of the use of one foot, having no liking for this imposed profession, successively bishop, courtier, revolutionist, and emigrant, then afterwards minister for foreign affairs under the Directory—M. de Talleyrand had retained something of all these different states; there was to be found in him a touch of the bishop, of the man of quality, and of the revolutionist. Having no firmly fixed opinion, but only a natural moderation, which was opposed to every species of exaggeration; capable of entering at once into the feelings of those whom he wished to please, either from liking or from interest; speaking a unique language peculiar to that society which had Voltaire for instructor; full of smart, poignant repartees, which rendered him as formidable as he was attractive; by turns caressing or disdainful, demonstrative or impenetrable; careless, dignified, lame without loss of gracefulness, in short, one of the most extraordinary personages, and such a one as a revolution alone can produce, he was the most seducing of negotiators, but at the same time incapable of directing, as head, the affairs of a great state; for every leader should possess a resolute will, settled views, and application, and he had none of these. His will was confined to pleasing, his views consisted in the opinions of the moment, his application was next to nothing. In a word, he was an accomplished ambassador, but not a directing minister: be it understood, however, that this expression is to be taken in its most elevated acceptation. For the rest, he held no other post under the consular government. The First Consul, who allowed no person the right to give an opinion on the affairs of war and of diplomacy, merely employed him to negotiate with the foreign ministers, on bases previously prescribed, and this M. de Talleyrand did with an art that will never be surpassed. He possessed, however, a moral merit, that of being fond of peace under a master who was fond of war, and of showing that he was so. Endowed with exquisite taste, uniting with it unerring tact, and even a useful indolence, he was able to render real services, by simply opposing to the First Consul's exuberance of language, pen, and action, his sobriety, his perfect moderation, and his very propensity to do nothing. But he made little impression on that imperious master, from whom he extorted no respect either by genius or by conviction. Thus he had no more empire than M. Fouché, nay, even less, though quite as much employed, and more agreeable.

¹ DE BOURRIENNE. This man has written a book about Napoleon, in which, whatsoever else he may show, he very clearly shows himself a miserable, weak, vindictive, and ungrateful scoundrel. See his Memoirs of Napoleon H. W. H.

Then again, M. de Talleyrand said just the contrary to what M. Fouché said. Attached to the ancient régime, minus the persons and the ridiculous prejudices of other times, he recommended the re-establishment of the monarchy as soon as possible, or an equivalent for it, by availing of the glory of the First Consul in lieu of blood-royal, adding that, if we wished to have a speedy and a durable peace with Europe, we ought to make haste to resemble other states. And, while his colleague, Fouché, in the name of the Revolution, advised that we should not go too fast, M. de Talleyrand, in the name of Europe, advised that we should not go so slow.

The First Consul prized the plain good sense of M. Fouché, relished the graces of M. de Talleyrand, but absolutely believed neither the one nor the other on any subject, and, as for his confidence, had given that, given it wholly and entirely, but not to either of those two men—to his colleague Cambacérés. The latter, with an understanding far from brilliant, had extraordinary good sense, and an unbounded attachment to the First Consul. Having trembled for ten years of his life under proscribers of all sorts, he loved, with a kind of affection, the powerful master, who at length procured him the faculty of breathing at his ease. He loved his power, his genius, his person, from which he had not received, and hoped never to receive, any thing but favours. Acquainted with the weaknesses of men, even of the greatest, he counselled the First Consul, as one ought to counsel when one wishes to be attended to, with perfect sincerity, with extreme discretion, never for the purpose of showing off his own wisdom, but always to be serviceable to a government which he loved as dearly as himself, always approving of all its acts in public, whatever they might be, and never disapproving of them but in private, in an absolute tête-à-tête with the First Consul; keeping silence when there was no good to be done, and when censure could be but a vain pleasure of finding fault; sure to speak his mind, and with a courage highly meritorious in a man so extremely timid, when he was in time to prevent a blunder, or influence the general conduct of affairs. And, as if a character which is incessantly under self-restraint must needs be betrayed into some weakness, the consul Cambacérés exhibited a puerile vanity with his inferiors, lived with some subaltern courtiers, who paid him fulsome homage, walked every day in the Palais Royal, in a ridiculously magnificent dress, and sought, in the gratification of a gourmandise that has become proverbial, pleasures which were suited to his vulgar but prudent soul. Of what consequence, however, are a few foibles, redeemed by superior reason!

The First Consul cheerfully forgave these foibles in his colleague, and made much of him. He appreciated that superior good sense, which never wished to shine but to be useful, and which threw a tempered and true light upon every thing. He appreciated, above all, the sincerity of his attachment, laughed at his weaknesses, but always with delicacy, and paid him the very high compliment of confiding every thing to him alone, of never being concerned but about his judgment. Hence, he was susceptible of no influence but his—an influence scarcely suspected, and on that account very great.

The consul Cambacérés was qualified more especially to temper his vehemence in regard to persons, and his precipitancy in regard to things. Amidst this conflict of two opposite tendencies, one urging to a precipitate reaction, the other, on the contrary, combating that reaction, M. Cambacérés, inflexible when the maintenance of order was in question, was, in every thing else, always a decided advocate for not going too fast. He did not oppose the end to which things were visibly tending, for he kept incessantly repeating, "Let them in due time decree as much power as they please to the First Consul, well and good, but not too soon." He wished especially that reality should always be preferred to appearance, real power to that which was but ostentation. A First Consul, possessing the power to do all that he pleased for the welfare of the state, seemed to him far superior to a crowned prince, cramped in his action. To act, and to keep out of sight, above all, never to act too quickly, constituted the whole of his wisdom. This most certainly is not genius, but it is prudence; and, for founding a great state, both are requisite.

M. Cambacérés was useful to the First Consul in another way, besides advising him with superior judgment—that of governing the Senate. That body, as we have said, was of immense importance, owing to the patronage vested in it. In the first moments, it had been relinquished, in some measure, to M. Sieyès, as a compensation for the executive power, vested wholly in General Bonaparte. M. Sieyès was at first content to abdicate, but, living on his estate of Crosne, began to feel somewhat vexed at his nullity; for there never was abdication without regret. Had he possessed firmness and consistency, he might have wrested the Senate from the First Consul, who would then have had no resource left but a coup d'état. But M. Cambacérés, without noise, without ostentation, insinuating himself by degrees with that body, occupied the ground which the peevish negligence of M. Sieyès abandoned to him. People knew that it was through him they could come at the First Consul, the source of all favour, and to him they accordingly addressed themselves. Of this he availed himself with infinite and always concealed art, to repress or to regain opponents. But this was done with such discretion, that nobody thought to complain of it. At a time when repose had become true wisdom, when repose was even necessary for reviving one day a taste for liberty, we dare not censure, we dare not give the name of corrupter to the man who, on the one hand, tempered the master imposed by events, and, on the other, checked the imprudences of an opposition without aim, unseasonable, and politically unwise.

As for the consul Lebrun, General Bonaparte treated him with respect, even with affection, but as a person meddling but little with public affairs, the administration excepted. To him he consigned the superintendence over the details of the finances, and charged him to keep him acquainted with the proceedings and the sentiments of the royalists, by whom this third consul was frequently surrounded. He had thus an ear and an eye among them, but only from the mere interest of curiosity as to what might be hatching in that quarter.

To convey an accurate idea of the circle surrounding the First Consul, we must say a word concerning his family. He had four brothers, Joseph, Lucien, Louis, and Jérôme. The two latter we shall notice in due time. Joseph and Lucien only were then of any importance. Joseph, the eldest of all, had married the daughter of a wealthy and respectable merchant of Marseilles. He was mild, tolerably acute, agreeable in person, and caused his brother less vexation than any of the others. It was for him that the First Consul reserved the honour of negotiating the peace of the Republic with the states of the old and the new world. He had charged him to conclude the treaty which had been signed with America, and had just appointed him plenipotentiary to Lunéville, thus seeking to assign to him a part which should be popular in France. Lucien, at present minister of the interior, was a clever man, but of an unequal mind, restless, ungovernable, and, though possessing talent, not having sufficient to make amends for what he wanted in point of good sense. Both flattered the propensity of the First Consul to raise himself to the supreme power; and this was but natural. The genius of the First Consul, like his glory, were things personal to himself; one quality only could be transmissible to his family, that was the princely quality, if he should one day assume it, in preference to that of first magistrate of the Republic. His brothers were among those who asserted, with least reserve, that the present form of government was but one of transition, devised to lull revolutionary prejudices; but that he ought to make up his mind, and that, if he wished to found something truly stable, it was indispensably necessary to introduce greater concentration, unity, and durability. The drift of all this was very evident. The First Consul, as every one knows, had no children, which greatly embarrassed those who already dreamed of the transformation of the Republic into a monarchy. It was, in fact, an inconsistency to pretend to be desirous of insuring the regular and natural transmission of the supreme power in the family of a man who had no heirs. Thus though, hereafter, this default of heirs might be a personal advantage for the brothers of the First Consul, it was now an argument against their projects, and they frequently reproached Madame Bonaparte for a misfortune, of which, they said, she was the cause. Having quarrelled with her, from sheer jealousy of her influence, they had not spared her in conversation with her husband, and persecuted her with their remarks, incessantly and loudly repeating that it was absolutely necessary for the First Consul to have a wife who should bring him children, that this was not a private but a consideration, and that a resolution on this point was indispensable, in order to insure the future welfare of France. They caused these cruel sentiments, pregnant with the most sinister consequences for her, to be repeated by all lips. The wife of the First Consul, apparently so fortunate, was, therefore, at this moment very far from happy.

Joséphine Bonaparte, who had been married first to the Count de Beauharnais, then to the young general who had saved the Convention on the 13th Vendémiaire, and now shared with him a place which began to resemble a throne, was a Creole by birth, and had all the graces, all the defects, usual in women who are so born. Kind-hearted, profuse, and frivolous, not a beauty, but perfectly elegant, and endowed with infinite fascination, she could please much more than women who were superior to her in understanding and personal charms. The levity of her conduct, depicted to her husband in the most unfavourable colours when he returned from Egypt, filled him with anger. He had thoughts of separating himself from a wife whom, right or wrong, he believed to be culpable. She wept a long time at his feet; her two children, Hortense and Eugène Beauharnais, both very dear to General Bonaparte, wept too; he was overcome, and yielded to a conjugal tenderness, which, for many years, was with him paramount to policy. He forgot the real or alleged faults of Joséphine; he loved her still, but not as in the early period of their union. The unbounded extravagance, the vexatious imprudences, in which she daily indulged, frequently excited in her husband gusts of impatience which he could not repress; but he forgave her with the kindness which prosperity inspires, and could not long be angry with a woman, who had shared the first moments of his nascent greatness, and who, from the day of their union, seemed to have brought Fortune along with her.

Madame Bonaparte was altogether a woman of the ancien régime, devout, superstitious, nay, a royalist, detesting what she called the Jacobins, who hated her in return; seeking only the society of the ancient nobility, who returning in throngs, as we have said, used to visit her in the morning. They had known her the wife of an honourable man, pretty high in rank and in military standing, the unfortunate Beauharnais, who died on the revolutionary scaffold; they found her the wife of a parvenu, but of a parvenu more powerful than any prince in Europe; they did not hesitate to go and solicit favours, while affecting to look down upon her. She was eager to make them partakers of her power, and to render them services. She even took pains to excite in them a sort of illusion which they were fond of indulging, that, in reality, General Bonaparte was only waiting for a favourable occasion to recall the Bourbons, and to restore the inheritance which belonged to them. And, singularly enough, this illusion which she delighted to instil into them, she would almost fain have shared herself; for she would rather have seen her husband a subject of the Bourbons, but a subject the protector of his kings, surrounded by the homage of the ancient French aristocracy, than crowned monarch by the hand of the nation. She was a very faint-hearted woman. Though giddy, she loved that man who covered her with glory, and loved him the more since she was less beloved by him. Not conceiving it possible that he could set his daring foot on the steps of the throne, without falling immediately beneath the dagger of republicans or royalists, she foresaw her children, her husband, and herself, overwhelmed in one general ruin. But, supposing that he ascended safe and sound to that usurped throne, another fear narrowed her heart—it would not be her lot to share his elevation. If General Bonaparte should some day be made king or emperor, it would evidently be under the pretext of giving a stable government to France, by rendering it hereditary; and unfortunately her physicians left her no hope of ever having more children. She recollected on this subject the extraordinary prediction of a woman, a sort of Pythoness then in vogue,¹ who had told her: "You will occupy the first place in the world, but only for a short time." She had already heard the brothers of the First Consul pronounce the fatal word, divorce. The victim of grandeur, whom, to judge of her lot from the external splendour by which she was surrounded, the queens of Europe might have envied, was a prey to corroding care. Each advance of fortune added apparently to her happiness, but really augmented her distress; and if she did escape from her keen anxieties, it was by a levity of character which saved her long and intense thought. The attachment of General Bonaparte for her, his gusts of passion, when he gave way to them, repaired the next moment by demonstrations of the greatest kindness, served also to cheer her. Hurried away, moreover, like all the people of that time, by a stupefying whirlwind, she reckoned upon the god of revolutions, upon chance; and, after painful agitations, she returned to the enjoyment of her fortune.

She strove, meanwhile, to divert her husband from his ideas of an exaggerated greatness, ventured even to talk to him of the Bourbons, at the risk of raising storms; and, in spite of her partialities, which ought to have led her to prefer M. de Talleyrand to M. Fouché, she had taken a liking to the latter, because, thorough Jacobin as he was, she said, he dared tell the truth to the First Consul; and to tell the truth to the First Consul was, in her estimation, to advise him to uphold the Republic, but to increase at the same time his consular power. Messrs. de Talleyrand and Fouché, thinking to strengthen themselves by penetrating into the family of the First Consul, introduced themselves into it by flattering each as each liked to be flattered. M. de Talleyrand strove to please the brothers, by saying that it was necessary to devise for the First Consul a different position from that which the Constitution conferred on him. M. Fouché endeavoured to please Madame Bonaparte by saying, that to hurry things would be the height of imprudence, and endanger the loss of all. This method of insinuating themselves into his family, and exciting disharmony by their interference, was excessively displeasing to the First Consul. This feeling he often manifested; and when he had any communication to make to his relations, he employed his colleague Cambacérès, who, with his accustomed prudence, listened to every thing, but said no more than he was directed to say, and acquitted himself of this kind of commission with equal delicacy and precision.

A very strange circumstance occurred to impart a present and positive feature to all these internal agitations. The prince, who was afterwards Louis XVIII., then an exile, ventured upon a singular and indiscreet step. Many royalists, to account for and excuse their return towards the new government, affected to believe, or really did believe, that General Bonaparte meant to recall the Bourbons. These men, who had not read or knew not how to read, the history of the English revolution, and to appreciate the terrible lessons with which it abounds, all at once discovered in it an analogy which flattered their hopes; it was the recall of the Stuarts by General Monk. They said nothing about Cromwell, who, however, acted a part great enough not to be forgotten. The unfounded rumour had at length gained currency, and reached Louis XVIII. This prince, endowed with tact and a good understanding, had committed the blunder of writing to General Bonaparte himself, and had transmitted to him several letters which he thought seasonable, but which were not, and which proved only one thing—the ordinary illusions of the emigrants. The first of the letters was as follows:—

"February 20th, 1800.

"Men such as you, sir, whatever their apparent conduct may be, never excite uneasiness. You have accepted an eminent post, and I am glad you have done so. You know better than any one else how much strength and power are required to secure the happiness of a great nation. Save France from its own frenzy, and you will have fulfilled the first wish of my heart; restore her king to her, and future generations will bless your memory. Your services will always be found too valuable to the state, to admit of my discharging in full, and as I could wish, the debt of my ancestors and my own, by the bestowal of important posts.

"Louis."

The First Consul was extremely surprised on receiving this letter, and was for some time undecided whether he ought to reply. It had been transmitted to him by the consul Lebrun, who had received it himself from the Abbé Montesquieu. The First Consul, engrossed by a multiplicity of business, on entering upon the government, had suffered some time to elapse without answering it. The prince, impatient as an emigrant, wrote a second letter, stamped still more with the credulity of his party, still more derogatory to his dignity. It was in these terms:—

¹ Mademoiselle Le Normand, the celebrated fortune-teller, whom some readers may have visited at her residence, No. 5, Rue de Tournon, Paris. She published, in 1830 Mémoires Historiques et Secrètes de l'Imperatrice

Josephine, in two volumes, containing very interesting particulars of her distinguished patroness, and died in 1844.—Translator.

"You must long have been aware, general, of the esteem in which I hold you. If you doubt whether I am susceptible of gratitude, mark your own place; fix that of your friends. As for my principles, they are those of the French character. I am clement by disposition. I shall be so from reason also.

"No, the victor of Lodi, of Castiglione, and of Arcola, the conqueror of Italy and of Egypt, can never prefer a vain celebrity to true glory. You are, nevertheless, losing valuable time: we can insure the repose of France; I say we, because I need Bonaparte for this purpose, and he could not accomplish it without me.

"General, Europe observes you, glory awaits you, and I am impatient to restore peace to my people."

"Louis."

This time the First Consul thought that he could not help answering. At bottom he had never had any doubt as to the course which he ought to pursue towards the deposed princes. Ambition apart, he considered the recall of the Bourbons as impracticable and fatal. It was from conviction that he repelled them, earnestly as he might otherwise desire to be master of France. His wife had been made acquainted with the incident, so had his secretary; and, though he did them not the honour to admit them to such deliberations, he gave them his motives. His wife had thrown herself at his feet to implore him to leave at least some hope for the Bourbons; he repulsed her angrily, and addressing his secretary, "You do not know those people," said he; "if I were to give them back their throne, they would fancy that they had recovered it by the grace of God. They would soon be surrounded and hurried away by the emigrants; they would overturn, in pretending to remodel, every thing, even what cannot be remodelled. What would become of the numerous interests created since '89? What would become of the purchasers of national domains, and of the leaders of the army, and of all those who have embarked their lives and fortunes in the Revolution? After men, what would become of things? What would become of the principles for which we have fought so hard? All this would perish, but not perish without a struggle; the conflict would be tremendous; thousands of men would perish. No, never will I take so fatal a resolution." He was right. Setting aside all personal interest, he acted judiciously. His dictatorship, which retarded the establishment of public liberty in France, a liberty, however, extremely difficult to establish at that time,—his dictatorship completed the triumph of the French Revolution, which Waterloo itself, after a lapse of fifteen years, could no longer destroy.

As might be expected, his answer was in unison with his sentiments, and did not hold out more hopes than he meant to give. It is only from the very words of the letter that one can judge of the grandeur of expression with which he replied to the imprudent overture of the exiled prince:—

"Paris, the 30th Fructidor, year VIII.—7 Sept. 1800.

"I have received your letter, sir, and thank you for the obliging expressions which it contains regarding myself.

"You should renounce all hope of returning to France; you could not do so but over the corpses of half a million Frenchmen.

"Sacrifice your individual interest to the repose and happiness of France; history will give you credit for it.

"I am not insensible to the misfortunes of your family; I will contribute with pleasure to the ease and the tranquillity of your retirement.

"BONAPARTE."

Some portions of this got abroad, and the personal designs of the First Consul became, in consequence, the more evident.

It is full-often the attempts of parties to stifle an infant power, that accelerate its growth, and encourage it to dare all that it meditates. An attempt more ridiculous than criminal of the republicans against the First Consul, hastened a demonstration quite as ridiculous, on the part of the men who purposed to hurry forward his elevation: both came to nothing.

The patriot declaimers, more noisy and far less formidable than the agents of the Bourbons, met frequently at the house of a man formerly employed by the Committee of Public Welfare, now out of office. His name was Demerville; he talked a great deal, hawked about the pamphlets against the government, and was scarcely capable of doing more. His house was the resort of Aréna,¹ the Corsican, one of the members of the Five Hundred, who had escaped by a window on the 18th Brumaire; of Topino Lebrun, a painter of some talent, pupil of David, participating in the revolutionary extravagance of the artists of that time; and of many Italian refugees, who were exasperated against General Bonaparte, because he protected the pope and did not re-establish the Roman republic. The principal and the most violent of these latter was a sculptor named Ceracchi.² These hot-brained men used to meet at Demerville's, and made use of language the most absurd. It was requisite, they said, to put a finishing hand to the business; they had plenty of people on their side; Masséna, Carnot, Lannes, Sieyès, nay, Fouché himself. There was nothing to do but to strike the tyrant, and all the genuine republicans would speak out; all would unite to raise up the expiring Republic again. But it was necessary to find a Brutus to strike the new Cæsar. Nobody came forward. A soldier out of employ, named Harrel, leading a life of idleness and penury with these declaimers, indigent and discontented like them, appeared to them the man of action whom they needed. They made proposals to him which alarmed him ex-

¹ARENA.—CERACCHI. Aréna appears to have been a thorough scoundrel, actuated only by personal hatred to Napoleon. Ceracchi was an Italian, half crazy with that excited and inefficient love of liberty which is continually stirring his countrymen up to momentary ebullitions of patriotism and freedom, generally resulting only in individual murder, but never by any chance moving them to any sustained or useful resistance to oppression. There are some curious gossiping details about this conspiracy in the book of the Duchesse d'Angantes, with whose mother, Madame de Permon, the conspirators were all on terms of intimacy. In addition to the men named above, a person called Diana was also engaged in the plot, and was arrested. There is no doubt that the plot was real in intention, and not a police affair, but the men were fools, drivellers, and cowards, and unequal to perpetration of the crime, which they did not lack the wickedness to conceive. M. W. M.

ceedingly. In his agitation, he communicated the matter to a commissary of war, with whom he was somewhat intimate, and who advised him to report all he knew to the government. This Harrel went to M. de Bourrienne, secretary to the First Consul, and General Lannes, commandant of the consular guard. The First Consul, apprized by them, directed the police to give Harrel money and orders to consent to all that his accomplices should propose to him. These miserable conspirators conceived that they had found in him the very man for executing their purpose; but they thought that one was not sufficient. Harrel offered to bring some others. They agreed to it, and Harrel brought to them some spies of M. Fouché's. After they had fallen into this snare, they thought of procuring daggers to arm Harrel and his companions. This task they took upon themselves, and brought daggers purchased by Topino Lebrun. At length, they chose the place for despatching the First Consul, and this was the Opera, then called the Theatre of the Arts. They fixed the moment, and that was the 10th of October—18th Vendémiaire, year IX.—on which day the First Consul was to attend the first representation of a new opera. The police, being forewarned, had taken its precautions. The First Consul went to the Opera House followed by Lannes, who, watching over him with the most anxious attention, had doubled the guard, and placed the bravest of his grenadiers around his box. The would-be assassins actually came at the time agreed upon, but not all, and not armed. Topino Lebrun was not there, neither was Demerville; Aréna and Ceracchi alone appeared. Ceracchi approached nearer to the First Consul's box than the others, but he had no dagger. The only bold fellows on the spot, and armed, were the conspirators sent by the police to the theatre of crime. Ceracchi and Aréna were apprehended, as were successively all the others, but most of them either at home or in the houses where they had sought refuge.

This affair produced a great sensation; it was not deserving of it. Assuredly the police, which ignorant men, not conversant with such matters, in general charge with fabricating itself such plots as it discovers—the police had not invented this, but it must be admitted, that it had taken too great a part in it. The conspirators wished, without the least doubt, the death of the First Consul, but they were incapable of striking him with their own hands; and, by furnishing them with what was most difficult to be found, pretended perpetrators, they had been led further into the crime than they would have ventured had they been left to themselves. If all this were to have terminated in a severe but only temporary punishment, such as ought to be inflicted on madmen, well and good! but to put them to death on such grounds is more than it is right to do, even when the object is to protect a precious life. But at that time of day people were not so nice; proceedings were immediately instituted, and these were destined to lead the unhappy wretches to the scaffold.

This attempt excited a general alarm. Hitherto there had been seen during the Revolution only what were then called journées, or attacks by armed bands; but people now felt secured from such assaults by the military power of the government. They had not yet thought of assassination, or of the possibility of the First Consul being struck unawares, in spite of the guard of grenadiers which surrounded him. The attempt of Ceracchi, the ridiculous part of which was not known, was a kind of forewarning which terrified all classes. A dread of finding themselves plunged back into chaos seized everybody, and generated a sort of enthusiasm in favour of the First Consul. The populace crowded round the Tuileries. The Tribunate, the only one of the assemblies of the state assembled at that moment, since it met every fortnight in the interval between the sessions, repaired thither in a body. All the public authorities followed this example. Great numbers of addresses were sent to the First Consul. They may all be summed up in these words of the municipal body of Paris:

"General," it said, "we beg in the name of our fellow-citizens, to express the deep indignation which they have felt at the news of the attempt meditated against your person. So many interests are involved with your existence, that the plots which have threatened it must necessarily be a subject of public grief, as the vigilance which has preserved it will be a subject of national gratitude and joy.

"That Providence, which in the year VIII. brought you back from Egypt, which at Marengo seemed to protect you from all dangers, which, lastly, on the 18th Vendémiaire, year IX., has just saved you from the fury of assassins, is, permit us to say so, the Providence of France much more than yours. It has not willed that a year so brilliant, so full of glorious events, destined to occupy so large a space in the recollection of men, should terminate all at once in a detestable crime. May the enemies of France cease to seek your destruction and ours! May they submit to that destiny, which, more mighty than all plots, will ensure your preservation and that of the Republic! We say nothing to you about the guilty; justice lays claim to them."

These addresses, all cast in the same mould, repeated to the First Consul that he had no right to exercise clemency, that his life belonged to the Republic, and ought to be defended like the public welfare, of which it was the pledge. It must be added that these manifestations were sincere. Every one thought himself in danger along with the First Consul. Every one but the factious wished for his preservation. The royalists believed that, if he were to die, they should be sent back to the scaffold or into exile; the revolutionists imagined that they beheld counter-revolution triumphant through the arms of foreigners.

The First Consul took particular and remarkable pains to diminish the estimate that was formed of the danger to which he had been exposed. He would not have it believed that his life depended on the first corner; and he conceived this to be equally necessary for his safety and for his dignity. In conversing with the authorities deputed to congratulate him, he told them all that the danger, about which they were so much alarmed, had not been serious: he explained to them how, surrounded by the officers of the consular guard and a piquet of his grenadiers, he was completely secure against the seven or eight wretches who purposed to attack him. He was convinced, much more than his words could lead people to suppose, of the danger with which his life was threatened; but he thought it useful to exhibit himself to all imaginations surrounded by the grenadiers of Marengo, and inaccessible amidst them to the weapons of assassins.

More serious plots than this, about which so much fuss was made, and framed by other hands, were preparing in the dark. Under the influence of a vague presentiment, people said to one another, that these attempts would be repeated. Hence the partisans of the First Consul took occasion to insist that something more stable was requisite than an ephemeral power resting on the head of a single man, to which the stab of an assassin's dagger might at any time put an end. The brothers of the First Consul, Messrs. Roederer, Regnault de St. Jean d'Angely, de Talleyrand, de Fontanes, and many others held these ideas, some from conviction, others to please the master, all, as is usually the case, from a mixture of sincere and interested motives. This led to the appearance of a very singular, and very remarkable anonymous pamphlet, said to have been written by Lucien Bonaparte, but which, from the extraordinary elegance of the language, from the classic knowledge of history, ought to have been attributed to its real author, who was M. de Fontanes. This pamphlet excited so strong a sensation as to deserve mention here. It marks one of the steps taken by General Bonaparte in the career of supreme power. Its title was, "Parallèle entre César, Cromwell, Monk, et Bonaparte." The author first compared General Bonaparte with Cromwell, and found in him no resemblance to that leading personage of the English Revolution. Cromwell, as he said, was a fanatic, a sanguinary leader of a faction, the murderer of his king, victor only in the civil war, conqueror of a few cities or counties of England, in short, a barbarian who had ravaged the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, a clever villain but no hero. The counterpart to Cromwell in the French Revolution would be Robespierre, if Robespierre had possessed courage, and if, France having nothing to subdue but La Vendée, he had been the conqueror of it. General Bonaparte, on the contrary, having no hand in the evils of the Revolution, had compensated by immense glory for crimes which were not his. He had abolished the barbarous festival instituted in honour of regicide; he was putting an end to the horrors of the revolutionary fanaticism; he honoured the arts and sciences, established schools, opened the temple of the arts. He had not carried on civil war; he had conquered not cities but kingdoms. As for Monk, what had that unsteady mind, that deserter from all parties, who did not know whither he was steering, who wrecked the vessel of the Revolution upon monarchy, as he might have wrecked it on the Republic, what had this sorry personage in common with General Bonaparte, who possessed a mind so firm, and knew so clearly what he purposed! The title of Duke of Albemarle might be enough to satisfy the vulgar vanity of General Monk, "but is it to be supposed that the truncheon of marshal, or the sword of constable, would suffice for the man before whom the universe stands aghast? . . . Does not every one know that there are certain destinies which call to the loftiest station? . . . And besides, were Bonaparte ever to imitate Monk, is it not evident that France would be again plunged into the horrors of a new revolution? The tempests, instead of being allayed, would spring up again on all sides."

After rejecting these comparisons, the author found in the whole range of history no counterpart to General Bonaparte but Cæsar. He discovers in him the same military greatness, the same political greatness, but he discovers also one point of dissimilarity. Cæsar, at the head of the Roman demagogues, had oppressed the party of the honest citizens, and destroyed the Republic; General Bonaparte, on the contrary, had raised in France the party of the honest citizens and put down that of the wicked.

All this was true: the task undertaken thus far by General Bonaparte was much more moral than that of Cæsar.

After all these comparisons, it was necessary to draw a conclusion. Happy the Republic, exclaimed the author, if Bonaparte was immortal! "But where," he added, "where are his heirs? where are the institutions capable of upholding his benefits and perpetuating his genius! The destiny of 30,000,000 of human beings hangs on the life of a single man! Fellow countrymen, what would become of you, if at this moment a funeral wail were to announce that this man had ceased to live!"

The author next examined the different chances that might turn up at the death of General Bonaparte. Would the nation return under the yoke of an assembly? but the remembrance of the Convention was there to exclude such a supposition from every mind. Would it throw itself into the arms of a military government? but where was the equal of General Bonaparte? The Republic, no doubt, possessed great generals, but which of them so far eclipsed all the rest as to extinguish all rivalry, and to prevent the armies from slaughtering one another, in behalf of their particular chief? . . . In default of the government of assemblies, in default of the government of Prætorians, would the country have recourse to the legitimate dynasty, which was on the frontiers, stretching out its arms to France? . . . But this would be counter-revolution, and the return of Charles II. and James II. to England, and the blood which flowed at their appearance, were examples sufficient to enlighten nations; and, were more recent examples needed, the late return of the Queen of Naples, and her imbecile husband to their unfortunate kingdom was a lesson written in characters of blood. Frenchmen, you are sleeping on the brink of an abyss! Such were the conclusions of this singular composition.

All that it contained, except the language, was true; but very premature, to judge from the impression which they produced. Lucien, minister of the interior, employed the means at his disposal for circulating this pamphlet over all France. He filled Paris and the provinces with it, taking care to conceal its origin. The publication produced a great effect. In reality it said only what everybody thought, but it required of France an avowal which a very legitimate pride did not yet permit her to make. Eight years before, the French had abolished a royalty of fourteen centuries, and were they to come so soon and confess, at the feet of a general of thirty, that they were wrong, and beseech him to revive that royalty in his person! They were willing enough to invest him with a power equal to that of kings, but it was necessary at least to save appearances, were it merely for the sake of the national dignity. True, this young warrior had already gained admirable victories, and already restored, to some extent, security throughout the country, but he had scarcely commenced the reconciliation of parties, the reorganization of France, the compilation of its laws, and above all, he had not yet given peace to the world. There were then many titles yet left for him to acquire, but which he was sure of soon concentrating on his glorious head.

The impression was general and painful. The prefects reported from all quarters that the pamphlet produced a mischievous effect; that it supplied the demagogue faction with some justification; that Cæsars called forth Brutuses; that the publication was imprudent and to be regretted. In Paris the impression was the same. In the Council of State the disapprobation was not concealed. The First Consul, whether he had been concerned in the pamphlet, or whether he had been compromised without his knowledge by impatient and unskillful friends, deemed it incumbent on him to disavow it, especially in the eyes of the revolutionary party. He sent for M. Fouché, and asked him publicly how he could suffer such publications to be circulated. "I know the author," replied the minister. "If you know him you ought to have sent him to Vincennes." "I could not send him to Vincennes," rejoined M. Fouché, "for it is your own brother." At these words General Bonaparte complained bitterly of that brother, who had already compromised him oftener than once. A feeling of displeasure with Lucien Bonaparte was the consequence. One day, the latter not being punctual at the council of the ministers, which was frequently the case, and many complaints being preferred against his administration, the First Consul expressed strong dissatisfaction, and seemed disposed to dismiss him immediately. But Cambacérès advised him not to proceed so harshly, and not to take the portfolio of the interior from Lucien, without giving him a suitable compensation. The First Consul complied. M. Cambacérès contrived the embassy to Spain, and was directed to offer it to Lucien. He had no difficulty in persuading him to accept it. Lucien set off, and before long the imprudent pamphlet ceased to be thought of.

Thus a first attempt at assassination against the First Consul had provoked in his favour a first attempt at elevation: but the one was as mad as the other was awkward. It was requisite that General Bonaparte should purchase by fresh services an augmentation of authority, which nobody yet defined with precision, but which all foresaw confusedly in the future, and to which he or his friends already aspired in an open manner. At all events his fortune was soon to furnish him, in services rendered, in dangers encountered, with immense claims, which France would no longer resist.

BOOK VII.

HOHENLINDEN.

Peace with the United States and with the Barbary Regencies—Meeting of the Congress of Lunéville—M. de Cobenzel declines a Separate Negotiation, and insists at least on the Presence of an English Plenipotentiary, to mask the real Negotiation between Austria and France—The First Consul, with a view to hasten the Conclusion, orders the Renewal of Hostilities—Plan of the Winter Campaign—Moreau is directed to cross the Inn, and to march for Vienna—Macdonald, with a second Army of Reserve, has Orders to pass from the Grisons into the Tyrol—Brune, with eighty thousand Men, is destined to force the Adige and the Mincio—Plan of the young Archduke John, appointed Generalissimo of the Austrian Armies—His Plan for turning Moreau miscarries through defective Execution—He halts by the way, and proposes to attack Moreau in the Forest of Hohenlinden—Admirable Manœuvre of Moreau's executed in a superior Manner by Richepanse—Memorable battle of Hohenlinden—Important Results of that Battle—Passage of the Inn, the Salza, the Traun, and the Enns—Armistice of Steyer—Austria promises to sign the Peace immediately—Operations in the Alps and in Italy—Macdonald crosses the Splügen, despite the Perils and Hardships of Winter—His Arrival in the Italian Tyrol—Dispositions of Brune for crossing the Mincio at two Points—Defect in those Dispositions—General Dupont attempts a first Passage at Pozzolo, and draws upon himself alone the Main Body of the Austrian Army—The Mincio is forced after a useless Effusion of Blood—Passage of the Mincio and the Adige—Fortunate Escape of General Laudon in consequence of a Falsehood—The Austrians, being beaten, propose an Armistice in Italy—Signature of that Armistice at Treviso—Renewal of the Negotiations at Lunéville—The Principle of a separate Peace admitted by M. de Cobenzel—The First Consul requires Austria to pay the Expenses of this second Campaign, and imposes harder Conditions than in M. de St. Julien's Preliminaries—He fixes, as his Ultimatum, the Boundary of the Rhine in Germany, the Boundary of the Adige in Italy—Courageous Resistance of M. de Cobenzel—This Resistance, though honourable, causes Austria to lose valuable Time—While the Negotiations are pending at Lunéville, the Emperor Paul, to whom the First Consul has ceded the Island of Malta, claims it from the English, who refuse it—Rage of Paul I.—He invites the King of Sweden to St. Petersburg, and renews the League of 1780—Declaration of the Neutrals—Rupture of all the Northern Powers with Great Britain—The First Consul avails himself of it to force harder Terms upon Austria—He insists, not only upon the Boundary of the Adige, but also on the Expulsion of all the Princes of the House of Austria from Italy—The Grand-duke of Tuscany and the Duke of Modena are to be removed to Germany—M. de Cobenzel at length gives way, and, with Joseph Bonaparte, signs the celebrated Peace of Lunéville, on the 9th of February, 1801—France obtains for the second Time the Boundary of the Rhine, throughout its whole Length, and is left almost Mistress of Italy—Austria is thrust back beyond the Adige—The Cisalpine Republic is to include the Milanese, Mantua, the Duchy of Modena, and the Legations—Tuscany destined for the House of Parma, with the Title of Kingdom of Etruria—The Principle of the Secularizations laid down for Germany—Important Results obtained by the First Consul in the course of fifteen Months.

JOSEPH BONAPARTE had just signed at Morfontaine, with Messrs. Ellsworth, Davie, and Van-Murray, the treaty which re-established peace between France and the United States. It was the first treaty concluded by the consular government. It was natural that the reconciliation of France with the different powers of the globe should begin with that Republic, to which she had, in a measure, given birth. The First Consul had allowed the difficulties relative to the treaty of alliance of the 6th of February, 1778, to be adjourned; but, on the other hand, he had required the adjournment of the claims of the Americans relative to captured vessels. He judged, and very justly, that, at the moment, he ought to be satisfied with the acknowledgment of the rights of neutrals. This was giving to France one ally more, and to England one enemy more upon the seas; it was a new heaven added to the maritime quarrel, which was arising in the North, and which became from day to day more serious. In consequence, the principal articles of the law of neutrals, such, at least, as they are laid down by France and all the maritime States, were inserted integrally in the new treaty.

These articles were the same to which we have already adverted.

1. The flag covers the merchandise—consequently, the neutral can carry the goods of any enemy, without being searched.

2. There is no exception from this rule, unless for contraband of war, and that contraband does not extend to alimentary substances, or to naval stores, timber, pitch, hemp, but solely to manufactured arms and munitions of war, such as powder, saltpetre, petards, matches, balls, bullets, bombs, grenades, carcasses, pikes, halberds, swords, sword-belts, or accoutrements, pistols, scabbards, cavalry-saddles, harness, cannon, mortars with their carriages, and generally all arms, munitions of war, and implements for the use of troops."

3. Neutral bottoms can sail from any port to any port; there is no exception to their freedom of navigating, unless in regard to ports bonâ fide blockaded; and only those ports are bonâ fide blockaded which are guarded by such a force that there is serious danger in attempting to break the blockade.

4. The neutral is bound to submit to search, for the purpose of ascertaining her real character; but the visiting vessel must keep at the distance of cannon-shot, and send only a boat and three men to board her; and, if the neutral is convoyed by a vessel of war, no search can take place, the presence of the admiralty flag being a sufficient guarantee against every species of fraud.

The treaty contained other stipulations of detail, but these four principal clauses, which truly constitute the law of neutrals, were an important victory; for the Americans, in adopting them, were obliged to insist on the application of them to their vessels on the part of the English, or forced to go to war with them.

The signature of this treaty was celebrated with éclat at Morfontaine, a beautiful seat, which Joseph, who was richer than his brothers, in consequence of his marriage, had some time before purchased. The First Consul went thither, accompanied by a numerous and brilliant party. Elegant decorations, set up in the mansion and the gardens, everywhere exhibited France and America united. Toasts suited to the occasion were drunk. The First Consul proposed the following: "To the manes of the French and the Americans who died on the field of battle for the independence of the New World." Lebrun proposed, "The union of America with the Northern powers, to enforce respect for the liberty of the seas." Cambacérès gave for the third, "The Successor of Washington."

The French government waited with impatience for the arrival of M. de Cobenzel at Lunéville, to learn whether his court was disposed to conclude peace. The First Consul, if he was not satisfied with the progress of the negotiations, was determined to renew hostilities, let the season be ever so far advanced. Since he had crossed the St. Bernard, he reckoned obstacles as nothing, and thought that men could fight just as well in snow or on ice, as on ground covered with verdure or with crops. Austria, on the contrary, wished to gain time, because she was pledged to England not to make any separate peace before the month of February ensuing, that is, February, 1801—Pluviôse, year IX. Extremely apprehensive of the renewal of hostilities, she had just applied for a third prolongation of the armistice. The First Consul had peremptorily refused it, on the ground that M. de Cobenzel had not yet arrived at Lunéville. He was resolved not to concede this point, till the Austrian plenipotentiary should be on the very spot fixed for the negotiation. At length, on the 24th of October, 1800, M. de Cobenzel arrived at Lunéville. He was received on the frontiers and along the whole route with salutes of cannon, and with extraordinary demonstrations of respect. General Clarke had been appointed governor of Lunéville, to do the honours of the place to the members of the Congress; and, that he might be able to discharge that duty in a suitable manner, a sum of money and some crack regiments had been placed at his disposal. Joseph, on his part, had repaired thither, accompanied by M. de Laforêt, for secretary. No sooner had M. de Cobenzel arrived, than the First Consul, anxious to learn himself the dispositions of the Austrian negotiator, sent him an invitation to come and pass a few days in Paris.¹ M. de Cobenzel durst not refuse, and proceeded to Paris with great deference. He reached it on the 29th of October. A new prolongation of the armistice for twenty days was at once granted him. The First Consul then conversed with him on the peace, and the conditions upon which it might be concluded. M. de Cobenzel's replies were not very satisfactory on the question of a separate negotiation, and, as to the conditions, he put forward pretensions that were totally out of place. Austria had views in regard to Italy which it was impossible to satisfy, and she expected, if the indemnities promised in Italy by the treaty of Campo Formio were granted to her in Germany only, she expected that exorbitant concessions of territory should be made to her either in Bavaria, or in the Palatinate, or in Swabia. The First Consul gave way to some sallies of passion. This he had done before in the negotiations of Campo Formio, with this same M. de Cobenzel; but, with increasing age and power, he controlled himself even less than he had formerly done. M. de Cobenzel complained bitterly, saying that he had never been treated in that manner, either by Catherine, or by Frederick, or by the Emperor Paul himself. In consequence, he desired to return to Lunéville, and the First Consul suffered him to depart, imagining that it would be better to negotiate foot by foot with him, through the medium of Joseph. The latter, mild, calm, and tolerably intelligent, was fitter than his brother for this operation of patience.

M. de Cobenzel and Joseph Bonaparte, having met at Lunéville, exchanged their full powers on the 9th of November—18th Brumaire. Joseph had orders to put to him the three following questions:—1. Had he authority to treat? 2. Was he authorized to treat separately from England? 3. Was he to treat for the Emperor, in the name of the house of Austria alone, or in the name of the whole Germanic empire?

The powers being exchanged, and found to be valid, for which purpose they were most minutely scrutinized, on account of the misadventure of M. de St. Julien, they entered into explanations concerning the extent of those powers. M. de Cobenzel declared, without hesitation, that he could not treat without the presence of an English plenipotentiary at the congress. As to the question, whether he was to treat for the house of Austria alone, or for the whole empire, he said that he must refer to Vienna for fresh instructions.

These answers were transmitted to Paris. The First Consul immediately directed M. de Cobenzel to be informed that hostilities should be renewed at the expiration of the armistice, that is to say, in the last days of November; that, nevertheless, the congress need not break up; that while the hostilities continued they might negotiate; but that the French armies would not stop in their march till the Austrian plenipotentiary had consented to treat without England.

During these transactions, the First Consul had taken a precaution, which had become indispensable in regard to Tuscany. The Austrian general, Sommariva, had remained there with a few hundred men, agreeably to the convention of Alessandria, but he continued to raise levies en masse with English money. At the same moment intelligence was received of the landing at Leghorn of those same English troops which had so long been on their way from Mahon to Ferrol, from Ferrol to Cadiz. The Neapolitans, on their part, were advancing towards Rome, and the Austrians, spreading themselves in the Legations beyond the limits marked out by the armistice, were thus endeavouring to extend a hand to the Tuscan insurrection. The First Consul, seeing that, while the Austrians were seeking to gain time, they were preparing to place the French army between two fires, directed Gene ral Duprat to march upon Tuscany, and Murat, commanding the camp at Amiens, to proceed immediately to Italy. He had several times warned the Austrians what he meant to do, unless they suspended the movements of troops begun in Tuscany; and, perceiving that they paid no attention to these intimations, he had actually given orders accordingly. General Dupont, with Pino's, Malher's, and Carra St. Cyr's brigades, rapidly crossed the Apennines, and occupied Florence; while General Clement marched from Lucca to Leghorn. No resistance was anywhere experienced. Meanwhile, the insurgents assembled in the town of Arezzo, which had already distinguished itself against the French, at the time of Macdonald's retreat in 1799. They were obliged to take it by assault, and to punish it. This was done less severely, perhaps, than it had deserved for its conduct towards our soldiers. All Tuscany was thenceforward submissive. The Neapolitans were stopped in their march, and the English driven from the soil of Italy, at the very moment when they were about to enter Leghorn. Two days afterwards, they landed 12,000 men.

¹ Napoleon said, at St. Helena, that M. de Cobenzel was desirous to come to Paris in order to gain time. His memory deceived him. The diplomatic correspondence shows what I advance.

The armies were in motion on all sides, from the banks of the Mayn to the coast of the Adriatic, from Frankfort to Bologna. Notice of hostilities had, moreover, been given. Austria, in alarm, made a last attempt, through the medium of M. de Cobentzel—an attempt which proved her desire to bring matters to a conclusion, but also the embarrassment resulting from her unfortunate engagements with England. M. de Cobentzel, therefore, addressed himself to Joseph Bonaparte, and, assuming a tone of confidence, asked him several times if the discretion of the French government might be depended upon. Made easy on this point by Joseph, he showed him a letter, in which the emperor, expressing the same fears that he himself had just expressed, relative to the danger of an indiscretion, but, relying upon his knowledge of men and things, authorized him to make the following overture. Austria consented, at length, to detach herself from England, and to treat separately, on two conditions, on which she must insist in the most absolute manner; firstly, inviolable secrecy till the 1st of February, 1801, the period at which her engagements with England terminated, with a formal promise, if the negotiation should miscarry, to give up all the papers written on both sides; secondly, the admission of an English plenipotentiary to Lunéville, to mask the real negotiation by his presence. On these two conditions, Austria consented to treat immediately, and desired a fresh prolongation of the armistice.

The proximity of Paris admitted of an immediate answer. The First Consul would not, at any rate, admit an English negotiator to Lunéville. He consented, however, to suspend hostilities again, on condition of a peace signed secretly, if that suited Austria, but signed within forty-eight hours. The conditions of this peace were already settled, in a great measure, by the discussion on the preliminaries. They were the following:—The Rhine as boundary of the French Republic in Germany; the Mincio for the boundary of Austria in Italy, instead of the Adige, which she had in 1797, but with the cession of Mantua to the Cisalpine; the Milanese, the Valteline, Parma, and Modena to the Cisalpine; Tuscany to the Duke of Parma; the Legations to the Duke of Tuscany; lastly, as general conditions, the independence of Piedmont, Switzerland, and Genoa. These were the groundwork of the St. Julien preliminaries, with a single difference, the relinquishment of Mantua to the Cisalpine, to punish Austria for the refusal of her ratification. But the First Consul required that the treaty should be signed within forty-eight hours, otherwise he threatened immediate war, and with redoubled vigour. In case of acceptance, he bound himself to absolute secrecy till the 1st of February, and to a new suspension of hostilities.

Austria was not disposed either to proceed so expeditiously, or to assent to such sacrifices in Italy. Deceiving herself respecting the conditions which she was able to obtain, she rejected the French proposal. Hostilities were, therefore, renewed immediately. M. de Cobentzel and Joseph remained at Lunéville, waiting, before they made new communications to one another, for the events that were about to take place at once on the Danube, on the Inn, on the High Alps, and on the Adige.

The renewal of hostilities had been announced for the 28th of November—7th Frimaire, year IX. Every thing was ready for this winter campaign, one of the most celebrated, and one of the most decisive in our annals.

The First Consul had disposed five armies on the vast theatre of this war. His intention was to direct them from Paris, without putting himself personally at their head. Still he had not renounced the idea of going to Germany or Italy, and assuming the direct command of one of them, if an unforeseen reverse, or any other cause, should render his presence necessary. His equipages were at Dijon, quite ready to start for the point to which he might be obliged to repair.

These five armies were those of Augereau on the Mayn, of Moreau on the Inn, of Macdonald in the Grisons, of Brune on the Mincio, and of Murat on march for Italy, with the grenadiers of Amiens. Augereau had under his command 8000 Dutch, 12,000 French, in all 20,000 men; Moreau 180,000, of whom 110,000 belonged to the active army. The army of this latter had been raised to this considerable force by recruiting, by the return of sick and wounded, and by the junction of St. Suzanne's corps. The delivery of Philipsburg, Ulm, and Ingolstadt, had, moreover, permitted Moreau to concentrate all his troops between the Isar and the Inn. Macdonald had at his disposal 15,000 men in the Grisons. Brune in Italy was at the head of 125,000 soldiers, 80,000 of whom were on the Mincio, 12,000 in Lombardy, Piedmont, and Liguria, 8000 in Tuscany, and 25,000 in the hospitals. Murat's corps formed a force of 10,000 grenadiers. This constituted a total of 300,000 combatants. If we add to this number 40,000 men in Egypt and in the colonies, 60,000 in the interior and on the coasts, we shall find that, since the administration of the First Consul, the Republic numbered nearly 400,000 soldiers under arms. The 300,000 posted on the theatre of war, 250,000 of whom were effective, and capable of acting immediately, were provided with every thing, thanks to the united resources of the Treasury, and the contributions levied in the countries occupied. The cavalry was well mounted, especially that in Germany. The parks of artillery were large, and in admirable condition. Moreau possessed 200 pieces of cannon, Brune 180. We were, therefore, much better prepared than in spring, and our armies had unbounded confidence in themselves.

Enlightened but rigid judges have asked why the First Consul, instead of dividing the whole of his active forces into five corps, had not, according to his own principle, formed two great masses, one of 170,000 men under Moreau, marching for Vienna through Bavaria; the other of 130,000 under Brune, crossing the Mincio, the Adige, and the Alps, and threatening Vienna by the Friule. This was, indeed, the plan which he adopted in 1805, but the exposition of facts will enable the reader to comprehend his motives, and prove with what a profound knowledge of men and things he understood how to vary the application of the great principles of war according to circumstances.

Our two principal armies, that of Moreau and that of Brune, were posted on the two sides of the Alps, nearly on the same meridian, the first along the Inn, the second along the Mincio. Moreau was to force the line of the Inn, Brune that of the Mincio. These two armies were at least equal in numerical force, immensely superior in moral force, to those which were opposed to them. Between the two lay the chain of the Alps, forming in this part what is called the Tyrol. The Austrians had the corps of General Iller in German Tyrol, and that of General Davidovich in Italian Tyrol. General Macdonald, with the 15,000 men placed under his command, and designated the second army of reserve, was to occupy those two corps, and to attract all their attention, by leaving them uncertain respecting the point of attack which he should choose; for, placed in the Grisons, he had the option of throwing himself directly into German Tyrol, or by the Splügen into Italian Tyrol. The title borne by his army, and the doubts circulated respecting its force, could not but excite apprehensions of some other extraordinary stroke, and it was there to profit by the dread which the passage of the St. Bernard had produced. People had not given sufficient credit to the first army of reserve; they were ready to give too much to the second. Moreau and Brune, thenceforth relieved from all uneasiness about the side next to the Alps, could, without being alarmed for their flanks, push forward with the whole of their forces.

Augereau's little army was destined to watch the levies en masse of Franconia and Swabia, supported by the Austrian corps of Simbschen. It covered, therefore, the left and the rear of Moreau. Lastly, Murat, with 10,000 grenadiers and a powerful artillery, was to perform precisely the same part, in regard to Brune, as Augereau was about to perform in regard to Moreau. He was to cover the right and the rear of Brune, against the insurgents of central Italy, the Neapolitans, and the English, &c.

These prudential precautions are such as it is right to take, when you are confined within the conditions of ordinary warfare. Now, the First Consul was necessarily confined within them, when he had for executors of his plans two such generals as Brune and Moreau. Moreau, the best of the two, and one of the best in Europe, was, nevertheless, not the man to do what the First Consul, after he became emperor, himself did in 1805, when, collecting a considerable force on the Danube and leaving a smaller force in Italy, he swept onwards like a torrent upon Vienna, regardless either about his flanks or his rear, and placing his safety in the overwhelming vigour of the strokes which he dealt to the principal enemy. But Moreau, but Brune, were not men to act thus. It was, therefore, necessary that, in directing them, he should keep within the conditions of methodical warfare; it was necessary to guard their flanks and their rear, to secure them against whatever might happen around them; for neither was capable of controlling accidents by the grandeur and vigour of his resolutions. For this reason it was that Macdonald was placed in the Tyrol, Augereau in Franconia, Murat in central Italy.

These dispositions did not admit of improvement, unless the state of affairs at home had allowed the First Consul to assume, in person, the command of one of the armies; but everybody agreed that at this moment he ought not to leave the centre of the government. His absence, during the short campaign of Marengo, had been attended with inconveniences serious enough to prevent him from incurring them again, without absolute necessity.

The dispositions of the Austrians were, in all respects, inferior to ours. Their armies, nearly equal in number to the French forces, were not a match for them in any other respect. They had not yet recovered from their recent defeats. The Archduke John commanded in Germany, Marshal Bellegarde in Italy. Simbschen's corps, destined to form the nucleus of the levies in Swabia and Franconia, appuied itself on General Klenau. The latter commanded an intermediate corps, placed à cheval on the Danube, connecting itself, on the right, with Simbschen's corps, on the left with the principal army of the archduke. Generals Simbschen and Klenau had, between them, 24,000 men, exclusively of the partisan troops raised in Germany. General Klenau was destined to follow the movements of General St. Suzanne, to approach the archduke if St. Suzanne approached Moreau, to join Simbschen's corps if St. Suzanne should join the little army of Augereau.

The Archduke John had with him 80,000 men, of whom 60,000 were Austrians, in advance of the Inn, and 20,000 Wurtembergers or Bavarians, behind the entrenchments of that river. General Iller commanded 20,000 men in the Tyrol, besides 10,000 Tyrolese. Mar sual Belligarde in Italy, was at the head of 80,000 soldiers, well established behind the Mincio. Lastly, 10,000 Austrians, detached towards Ancona and La Romagna, were to second the Neapolitans and the English, in case these latter should make an attempt upon central or southern Italy. They formed, therefore, a principal force of 224,000 men, which, with the Mayencers, the Tyrolese, the Neapolitans, the Tuscans, and the English, might amount to about 300,000. The First Consul, in causing the Tuscans to be disarmed, in closing Leghorn against the English, in repressing the Neapolitans, had taken very useful and proper precautions for preventing the augmentation of the hostile forces.

By a sort of mutual resolution, both the belligerent parties prepared to settle the quarrel in Germany, between the Isar and the Inn. The operations commenced on the 28th of November—7th Frimaire—in severe weather, produced by a very cold rain in Swabia, and intense frost in the Alps. While Augereau, advancing by Frankfort, Aschaffenburg, Wurtzburg, and Nuremberg, fought a brilliant action at Burg-Eberach, separated the Mayence levies from Simbschen's corps, and crippled the latter for the rest of the campaign; while Macdonald, after occupying the Austrians for a considerable time towards the sources of the Inn, was preparing, in spite of the season, to cross the great chain of the Alps, with the intention of boldly throwing himself into Italian Tyrol, and facilitating for Brune the attack of the line of the Mincio; Moreau, with the principal mass of his forces, advanced, between the Isar and the Inn, to a field of battle which he had long studied, seeking a decisive engagement with the great Austrian army.

It is necessary to give an accurate idea of the ground on which the French and the Austrians were about to meet, upon one of the most important occasions of our long wars. We have elsewhere described the basin of the Danube, watered by that great river and a series of tributaries, which, descending rapidly from the Alps, come in succession to swell the mass of its waters. These tributaries, we observed, are lines which an Austrian army, intending to cover Vienna, ought to defend, and which a French army, purposing to march on that capital, must force. In the summer campaign, Moreau, as it will be recollected, after penetrating from the valley of the Rhine into that of the Danube, and crossing the Iller, the Lech, the Isar, had halted between the Isar and the Inn. He was master of the course of the Isar, all the principal points of which he occupied; first Munich, then Freising, Moosburg, Landshut, &c. He had advanced beyond that river, and was facing the Inn, occupied in force by the Austrians.

The Isar and the Inn, both issuing from the Alps, run together towards the Danube, separated by an almost invariable distance of between ten and twelve leagues. Proceeding at first in a northward direction, the Isar to Munich, the Inn to Wasserburg, they both turn off towards the east, till they fall into the Danube: the Isar at Deggendorf, the Inn at Passau. We were masters of the Isar, and it was requisite that we should force the Inn; but the Inn, broad, deep, defended at its outlet from the mountains by the fort of Kufstein, and in the lower part of its course by the fortress of Braunau, covered between these two points by a vast number of intrenchments, the Inn was a difficult barrier to pass. If Moreau attempted to force it in the upper part of its course, between Kufstein, Rosenheim, and Wasserburg, he would meet with almost insurmountable local difficulties; he would, moreover, have the army of Tyrol on his right flank. If he determined on forcing it in the lower part of its course, between Braunau and Passau, near the point where it falls into the Danube, he would have to run the risk of a lengthened march upon the left, through a difficult, wooded, marshy country, exposing his flank to the Austrian army, which, advancing by Mühldorf and Braunau, might throw itself upon the right wing of the French army. These two inconveniences were judged extremely serious. If the Austrians, taking care to guard themselves properly, and to observe with vigilance all the passes of the Inn, confined themselves to the defensive, Moreau might encounter almost invincible obstacles. But such was not their design. The offensive was resolved upon in the Austrian staff. The young archduke, John, with his head full of new theories invented by the Germans, and emulous also to imitate something of the great movements of General Bonaparte, devised a very extensive plan, which was not badly conceived either, in the opinion of competent judges. Unluckily this plan was inapplicable, because it was not based on the accurate appreciation of present circumstances. As far as it has come to our knowledge, it was as follows:—

Moreau was established on the ground which separates the Isar from the Inn. Between Munich and Wasserburg this ground forms an elevated plain, covered with a thick forest, subsides as it approaches the Danube, and, as it sinks, is rent into numerous ravines, continues wooded in some parts, becomes swampy in others, and, in short, is very difficult of access on every side. Moreau was in possession of this plateau, of the forest which covers it, and of the roads that intersect it. From Munich, where he had his head-quarters, two roads lead to the Inn; the one running direct through Ebersburg to Wasserburg, the other in an oblique direction to the left, and passing through Hohenlinden, Haag, Ampfing, and Mühldorf. Both crossed the gloomy forest of pines, which covers that elevated tract. It was in this formidable retreat, formed by a hilly and wooded country, approachable by two roads, both of which were held by Moreau, that an assailing force must needs encounter him. The other roads consisted of only very narrow paths, destined solely for the conveyance of timber, and impassable for the heavy wagon train of an army.

The young archduke projected a great manœuvre. He purposed not to attack Moreau's position in front, but to turn it, in debouching by the bridges of Mühldorf, Neu-Oetting, and Braunau. Leaving about 20,000 men, Bavarians, Wurtembergers, and Condé's emigrants, to dispute the Inn, he intended to assume the offensive with 60,000 Austrians, and to march on the left of Moreau, through that half woody, half swampy country, which extends between the Inn and the Isar, near the points where they fall into the Danube. If the young archduke proceeded rapidly through the difficult country by Eggenfelden, Neumarkt, and Wilsburg, and arrived in time at Landshut on the Isar, he would be able to ascend the Isar on our rear, to Freising, cross it at that place, and thence continue his march upon a chain of heights which begins at Dachau, and commands the plain of Munich. Occupying this point, he would dangerously threaten Moreau's line of retreat, and oblige him to evacuate the country between the Inn and the Isar, and to pass through Munich with the utmost haste, in order to take a retrograde position on the Lech. But, to insure the success of such a manœuvre, one must have correctly calculated all the means of execution, and, after engaging in it, great firmness was requisite for encountering its perilous chances; for there was an almost impassable country to traverse, in horrible weather, and at the same time incessantly skirting an enemy, who was not prompt and daring, it is true, but intelligent, firm, and not easily disconcerted.

The troops of both nations were in motion on the 26th and 27th of November—5th and 6th Frimaire—to commence hostilities on the 28th—7th Frimaire. The Austrian general Klenau, stationed on the Danube to support Simbschen against the little army of Augereau had attracted the attention of General St. Suzanne, commanding Moreau's fourth corps. Being thus both of them removed to a considerable distance from the principal theatre of events, they were on the Danube; General St. Suzanne towards Ingolstadt, General Klenau towards Ratisbon.

Moreau had moved his left wing, 26,000 strong, and under the command of General Grenier, along the high road from Munich to Mühldorf, by Hohenlinden, Haag, and Ampfing, thus making it occupy the slopes of that species of plateau which extends between the two rivers. His centre, which he commanded in person, and which amounted to about 34,000 men,¹ occupied the direct road from Munich to Wasserburg by Ebersberg. The right wing under Lecourbe, of about 26,000 men, was posted along the upper Inn, in the environs of Rosenheim: a division of it observed the Tyrol. Moreau had constantly at hand only his left and his centre, nearly 60,000 men. He had set his army in motion to make a strong reconnaissance from Rosenheim to Mühldorf, and to force the enemy to disclose his intentions. Moreau, unable to anticipate, like General Bonaparte, the designs of his adversary, still less to dictate them, as the latter did, by taking the initiative with a high hand,—Moreau was obliged to grope about to discover what he could neither divine nor pre-induce. But he advanced prudently, and if he was surprised, he repaired expeditiously, and with great calmness, the mischief of the surprise.

The 29th and 30th of November—8th and 9th Frimaire—were spent by the French army in reconnoitring the line of the Inn; by the Austrian army in crossing that line and traversing the low tract between the Inn, the Danube, and the Isar. Moreau forced the Austrian advanced posts to fall back, moved his right under Lecourbe to Rosenheim, his centre, under his own immediate command, to Wasserburg, his left, under Grenier, to the heights of Ampfing. These heights command, but at a great distance, the banks of the Inn. The left of the French army was in some danger; for, following the course of the Inn to Mühldorf, it was fifteen leagues from Munich, while the rest of the army was only ten. Moreau had, in consequence, taken care that it should be supported by a division of the centre, that which General Grandjean commanded. But it was a fault to advance in this manner in three corps, so far separated from one another, in place of marching on the Inn en masse, and presenting himself before a single débouché, while he made false demonstrations at several points. This fault had well-nigh been productive of serious consequences.

The Austrian army had passed, at Braunau, Neu-Oetting Mühldorf, and crossed the low tract which has been already mentioned. Part of the archduke's troops, recently arrived, had scarcely had time to rest themselves. They were marching laboriously in that region, sometimes wooded, sometimes intersected by small rivers, the Wils, the Rott, the Isen, which descend from the plateau occupied by the French army. The narrow paths, which it was necessary to follow, were broken up; and it was with the utmost difficulty that the heavy park of wagons could move along them. The young archduke and his advisers, who had not foreseen any of these circumstances, were alarmed at the undertaking, now that it was begun. Our left wing, advanced nearly to Ampfing and Mühldorf, gave them uneasiness, and made them apprehensive lest they should be cut off from the Inn. They designed to turn Moreau, and now they were fearful that they should themselves be turned instead. This danger should have been foreseen, and a new base of operations prepared on the Danube, between Ratisbon and Passau, in case they should be separated from the Inn. But nothing of this kind was done. In every bold operation it is necessary to provide, in the first place, for difficulties of execution, and, in the next, after commencing the execution, to persevere with firmness in what one has planned, for it is very rarely the case that we do not incur ourselves the dangers in which we would involve our adversary. The Austrian staff, from the very outset, was astonished, terrified, at what it had projected, and suddenly changed its plan. Instead of persisting in gaining the Isar, for the purpose of ascending on our rear, it stopped short, and resolved to turn down upon our left, and to give battle immediately. This was meeting the difficulty in front, and undiminished; for it became necessary, in ascending the bed of the rivers, to climb the steep vated ground which we occupied, and then penetrate into the forest, in which we had been for a long time established. The enemy might at first have an advantage over our left wing, which was somewhat endangered, but, this success obtained, he would find our army concentrated in an absolute labyrinth, all the outlets of which it knew and occupied.

¹ The centre consisted of 30,000 men; but the Polish division of Kniacewitz, which had rejoined General Decaen, and the artillery reserve, must have augmented it to about 34,000 or 35,000 men.

Accordingly, on the 1st of December—10th Frimaire, year IX.—the Archduke John moved the greater part of his army upon our left by three roads at once; the valley of the Isen, the high road from Mühldorf to Ampfing, lastly, the bridge of Kraiburg on the Inn. The valley of the Isen, commencing on the flanks of the woody plateau, already described, permitted the greatly lengthened position of our left to be turned. A corps of 15,000 men ascended it. Another corps marched direct for the high road from Mühldorf, which, after ascending the heights of Ampfing, leads through the forest to Hohenlinden and Munich. Lastly, a detachment, crossing the Inn at Kraiburg, and passing through Aschau, took in flank our left wing, which had unluckily ventured as far as Ampfing. Forty thousand men were going in a moment to fall upon 26,000.

These 26,000 men, commanded by General Grenier, had to sustain a severe and unequal contest. Ney, who defended the heights of Ampfing, displayed that incomparable energy which distinguished him in war. He performed prodigies of valour, and contrived to retire without serious loss. Threatened by the corps which had passed the Inn at Kraiburg and penetrated into the defile of Aschau, he was fortunately extricated by Grandjean's division, which Moreau, as we have said, had detached from his centre to support his left. Legrand's division, which was in the valley of the Isen, ascended that valley in retrograding upon Dorfen. Moreau, seeing the superiority of the Austrians, had the good sense not to persist, and effected his retreat in the best order.

It is obvious from these first movements that Moreau had not been able to penetrate the designs of the enemy, and that, in advancing upon all the débouchés of the Inn at once, instead of making an attack upon a single point, he had compromised his left. The extraordinary valour of his troops, and the vigour of his lieutenants, who, in execution, were accomplished generals, had made amends for all.

But this was only an insignificant beginning. Moreau had abandoned the outskirts of his position, and retired to the centre of the extensive forest of Hohenlinden. It would be requisite to force him in this formidable retreat. His coolness and vigour were here about to be pitted against the inexperience of the archduke, flushed by a first success.

We have already said that two roads ran through the forest: one on the right, descending directly to the Inn, by Ebersberg and Wasserburg; the other, on the left, which passes through Hohenlinden, Mattenboett, Haag, Ampfing, and joins the Inn at Mühldorf, is rather longer. It was along this latter road that the Austrians were proceeding en masse, some following the defile which it forms through the forest, others laboriously ascending the banks of the small rivers which gave access to the flank of our position. Moreau immediately formed a judgment, and a sound one, of this situation, and conceived an idea from which he derived great results: it was to allow the Austrians, already engaged with his left, to penetrate into the forest, and then, when they should be pretty far advanced in it, to transfer his centre from the Ebersberg road to the Hohenlinden road, to surprise them in that dangerous place, and to destroy them there. He made his dispositions accordingly.

The road on the left, or the Hohenlinden road, adopted by the Austrians, after leaving the banks of the Inn and ascending the heights of Ampfing, passed over hills, alternately wooded and naked, as far as Mattenboett, then through a thick wood from Mattenboett to Hohenlinden, forming there a long defile bordered by lofty pine-trees. At Hohenlinden itself the forest suddenly ceased. A small plain, free from wood, studded with several hamlets, extended to the right and left of the road; in the middle were the village of Hohenlinden and the post-house. Not only the principal column of the Austrian army, marching in the defile of the forest, but also the detachments ascending the river Isen, for the purpose of debouching by different outlets on the left of our position, would necessarily have to pass this spot.

In this little plain of Hohenlinden, Moreau deployed his left wing under Grenier, Grandjean's division having been previously detached from the centre, with all the reserves of artillery and cavalry.

On the right of the road and village of Hohenlinden he posted Grandjean's division, commanded on this day by General Grouchy; on the left, Ney's division; still further to the left, on the skirt of the wood, and at the head of the roads by which the Austrian columns ascending the valley of the Isen would arrive, Legrand's and Bastoul's divisions, both drawn up in advance of the villages of Preisendorf and Harthofen. The reserves of cavalry and artillery were in rear of these four divisions of infantry, deployed in the middle of the plain. The centre, reduced to Richepanse's and Decaen's two divisions, was at some leagues' distance, on the right-hand road, in the environs of Ebersberg. Moreau sent to those two divisions an order, somewhat vaguely expressed, but positive, to throw themselves from the right-hand into the left-hand road, to get into the latter in the environs of Mattenboett, and there surprise the Austrian army entangled in the forest. This order was neither precise, nor clear, nor circumstantial, as well conceived and well expressed orders ought to be, and those of General Bonaparte, for instance, invariably were. He neither indicated the route to be pursued, nor provided against any accidents which might occur; he left every thing that was to be done to the intelligence of Generals Decaen and Richepanse. They, however, might well be trusted to make up for all that the commander-in-chief omitted to say. Moreau, moreover, directed Lecourbe, who formed his right towards the Tyrol, and General St. Suzanne, who formed his left towards the Danube, to draw near in haste to the spot on which the decisive event of the campaign was about to take place. But one was fifteen leagues off, at least, the other twenty-five, and they were consequently out of reach. It was not this that General Bonaparte acted on the eve of great battles: on these occasions he did not leave half his forces at such distances. But, to bring up all the parts of which a numerous army is composed in time to the point where the fortunes of war are decided, there is required a superior foresight, which the greatest men alone possess, and without which it is still possible to be an excellent general. Moreau was about to fight nearly 70,000 Austrians with fewer than 60,000 French; this number was more than sufficient, with the soldiers of whom our legions were then composed.

The Archduke John, ignorant of all this, was intoxicated with his success on the 1st of December—10th Frimaire. He was young, and he had seen that formidable army of the Rhine, which for many years the Austrian generals had not possessed the skill to stop, falling back before him. He rested on the 2d of December, which gave Moreau time to make the dispositions which we have just detailed; and he prepared every thing for passing through the extensive forest of Hohenlinden on the 3d of December—12th Frimaire. This general, rather raw in his profession, imagined that the French army could not make the least resistance to him in the route which he was about to pursue. He conceived at most that he should fall in with it in advance of Munich.

He divided his army into four corps. The principal, that of the centre, composed of the reserve, the Hungarian grenadiers, Bavarians, the greater part of the cavalry, the baggage, and a hundred pieces of cannon, was to follow the high road from Mühldorf to Hohenlinden, to traverse the defile which it forms through the forest, and then debouch in the little plain of Hohenlinden. General Riesch, who had crossed the Inn at Kraiburg, on the 1st of December, with about twelve thousand men, was to flank the centre, and to debouch in the open ground at Hohenlinden, on the left of the Austrians, on the right of the French. At the other extremity of this field of battle, the corps of Baille-Latour and Kienmayer, which had entered the valley of the Isen, were to continue to ascend it, and to debouch at some distance from one another, the first by Isen upon Kronacker and Preisendorf, the second by Lendorf upon Harthofen; both in the unwooded plain of Hohenlinden. They had orders not to lose time, to leave even their artillery behind, the corps of the centre taking a great quantity along with it by the principal road, and to carry with them no more baggage than was necessary for making soup for the soldiers.

Thus these four corps of the Austrian army, marching at a considerable distance from each other, in that thick forest, one only, that of the centre, on a high road, with causeway, the three others by paths exclusively destined for the carriage of timber, were to meet in the open space extending between Hohenlinden and Harthofen, exposed to the risk of not arriving together, and of encountering, by the way, many unforeseen adventures. The Bavarians having rejoined the Austrians, the archduke's army amounted, at this moment, to 70,000 men.

On the morning of the 3d of December, the French were deployed between Hohenlinden and Harthofen. Moreau, on horseback before daybreak, was at the head of his staff, and, a little farther off, Richepanse and Decaen were executing the movement which they were directed to make from the Ebersberg road to that of Hohenlinden.

The four Austrian corps, on their part, advanced simultaneously, each as fast as it could, sensible of the value of time in a season when there is so little daylight either for marching or for fighting. A thick fall of snow darkened the air, and rendered the nearest objects indistinguishable. The Archduke John, at the head of the centre, had penetrated into the defile of the forest from Mattenboett to Hohenlinden, and had almost cleared it long before General Riesch, on his left, and Generals Baille-Latour and Kienmayer on his right, could reach the field of battle, embarrassed as they were in those horrible roads. The young prince at length appeared on the margin of the wood facing Grandjean's and Ney's divisions, both drawn up in order of battle, in advance of the village of Hohenlinden. The 108th demi-brigade, of Grandjean's division, was deployed, having on its wings the 46th and the 57th, formed in close column. The 4th hussars and the 6th of the line supported it in the rear. A very brisk cannonade was opened on both sides. The Austrians attacked the 108th, which made a firm resistance. Eight battalions of Hungarian grenadiers were ordered to file through the wood, in order to turn it on its right. On seeing this, Generals Grandjean and Grouchy hastened, with the 46th, to the assistance of the 108th, which was shaken, and began to lose ground. They penetrated into the wood, and commenced, among the pine-trees, a desperate struggle, almost man to man, with the Hungarian grenadiers. A battalion of the 57th, pushing still deeper into it, turned the Hungarians, and obliged them to seek refuge in the recesses of the forest. Thus Grandjean's division remained victorious, and prevented the Austrian column from deploying in the plain of Hohenlinden.

After a few moments' rest, the Archduke John made a new attack on Hohenlinden, and on Grandjean's division. This second attack was repulsed like the first. At this moment, the Austrian troops of Baille-Latour began to be perceived towards Kronacker, making their appearance on our left, at the margin of the wood, ready to debouch into the plain of Hohenlinden. The snow, having ceased falling for a few minutes, allowed them to be easily discerned. But they were not yet in a state to act, and, besides, Bastoul's and Legrand's divisions were preparing to receive them. All at once, a kind of agitation, a wavering, was perceptible in the Austrian troops of the centre, which had not yet been able to get out of the defile of the forest. Something extraordinary seemed to be taking place on their rear. Moreau with a sagacity which does honour to his military intuition, remarked this circumstance, and said to Ney, "Now is the moment to charge; Richepanse and Decaen must be upon the rear of the Austrians." He immediately ordered Ney's and Grandjean's divisions, which were on the right and left of Hohenlinden, to form into columns of attack, to charge the Austrians drawn up on the margin of the forest, and to drive them back into that long defile in which they had till then been shut up. Ney charged them in front; Grouchy,¹ with Grandjean's division, took them in flank, and both drove them impetuously into that gorge, where they were crowded together pell-mell, along with their artillery and cavalry.

At this very instant, the events which Moreau had foreseen and prepared were taking place at the other extremity of the defile, at Mattenboett. Richepanse and Decaen,² in obedience to the orders which they had received from him, had struck off from the Eldersberg road into that of Hohenlinden. Richepanse, who was the nearest to Mattenboett, had started, without waiting for Decaen, and daringly penetrated into that tract of thickets and ravines which separates the two roads, marching while the fight was going on at Hohenlinden, and making incredible efforts to drag with him, over that inundated ground, six pieces of small calibre. He had already passed, without accident, the village of St. Christoph, when the corps of General Riesch, destined to flank the centre of the Austrians, arrived there; but he had proceeded onward from St. Christoph with a single brigade, leaving the second, Drouet's, engaged with the enemy. Richepanse, reckoning upon Decaen to extricate Drouet's brigade, had marched, without losing a moment, for Mattenboett; for his military instinct told him that there was the decisive point. Though he had left but two demi-brigades of infantry, the 8th and the 48th, a single regiment of cavalry, the 1st chasseurs, and six pieces of cannon, with about 6000 men, he had continued his march, dragging his artillery by hand, almost always through the quagmire. On reaching Mattenboett, at the other extremity of the defile of the forest, the head of which we have just said that Ney was attacking, he fell in with a body of Austrian cuirassiers, dismounted, with their horses' bridles over their arms; he fell upon them, and made them prisoners. Then deploying on the small open spot which surrounds Mattenboett, he placed the 8th on the right, the 48th on the left, and pushed the 1st chasseurs on eight squadrons of cavalry, which, on seeing him, had formed to charge him. The 1st chasseurs, after a vigorous charge, was repulsed, and fell back behind the 8th demi-brigade. The latter, crossing bayonets, stopped the career of the Austrian cavalry.

¹ GROUCHY, EMANUEL, Count of. Born in 1766; entered the service at fourteen; in 1785, an officer in the king's body-guard, which he left on the breaking out of the Revolution. In 1792 he commanded a regiment of dragons, and the next year all the cavalry in Savoy and the Alps. In 1794 commanded in La Vendée, and defeated the emigrants at Quiberon. In 1797 he was second in command of the army of Ireland, but effected nothing, the fleet having been dispersed by a storm in Bantry Bay. In 1798 he joined the army of Italy, and

At this moment, Richepanse's position became critical. Having left behind his second brigade to make head against Riesch's corps, surrounded himself on all sides, he thought that he ought not to give the Austrians time to perceive his weakness. Committing to General Walther, with the 8th demi-brigade and the 1st chasseurs, the duty of keeping in check the enemy's rear-guard, which was preparing to fight, he himself, with the 48th alone, fell to the left, and took the bold resolution to fall upon the Austrian rear in the defile of the forest. Hazardous as was this resolution, it was not less sensible than vigorous; for the archduke's column, entangled in this defile, must have before it the main body of the French army, and, by dashing furiously upon its rear, it was probable that he should produce great disorder in it, and obtain important results. Richepanse immediately formed the 48th into columns, and, marching sword in hand amidst his grenadiers, penetrated into the forest, sustained, without flinching, a violent discharge of grape-shot, then fell in with two Hungarian battalions, which hastened up to bar his passage. Richepanse would have inspirited his brave soldiers with words and gestures, but they had no need of them. "Those fellows are our prisoners," cried they, "let us charge!" They charged accordingly, and completely routed the Hungarian battalions. Presently, they came to masses of baggage, artillery, infantry, accumulated pell-mell at this spot. Richepanse struck inexpressible terror into this multitude, and threw it into frightful disorder. At the same moment, he heard confused shouts at the other extremity of this defile. On advancing, these shouts, becoming more distinct, revealed the presence of our troops. It was Ney, who, marching from Hohenlinden, had penetrated by the head of the defile, and pushed before him the Austrian column, which Richepanse was driving the other way, by attacking it in rear.

Ney and Richepanse met, recognised one another, and embraced, intoxicated with joy on seeing so glorious a result. Their troops rushed, on all sides, upon the Austrians, who sought shelter by flight in the woods, or begged quarter of the conqueror. They took thousands of prisoners, the whole of the artillery, and the baggage. Richepanse, leaving Ney to secure these trophies, returned to Mattenboett, where General Walther had remained with a demi-brigade and a single regiment of cavalry. He found this brave general, struck by a ball, borne away in the arms of his soldiers, but his countenance beaming with joy, and compensated for his sufferings by the satisfaction of having contributed to a decisive manœuvre. Richepanse extricated his troops, and returned to St. Christoph, where he had left Drouet's brigade alone engaged with

In the next year contributed greatly to Moreau's successes at Hohenlinden and on the Rhine. On Moreau's trial he incurred the displeasure of Napoleon.—Encyclopædia Americana.

² DECAEN. Born at Creully near Caen, was employed in the army of the Rhine and Moselle, distinguished himself in July, 1796, under Moreau, particularly at Ettlingen and Albe. In 1798 he was cashiered, but restored and promoted in the same year, and in 1800 made a general of division.—Biographie Moderne.

Riesch's corps. But all his anticipations were verified on that auspicious day. General Decaen had arrived in time, extricated Drouot's brigade, and repulsed Riesch's corps, after taking from it a great number of prisoners.

It was by this time mid-day. The centre, of the Austrian army had been enveloped and entirely routed. The left, under General Riesch, arriving too late to stop Richepanse, attacked and driven towards the Inn by Decaen, was in full retreat, after sustaining considerable losses. With such results at the centre and on the left of the Austrians, the issue of the battle could no longer be doubtful.

During these events, Bastoul's and Legrand's divisions, posted on the left of the clear ground about Hohenlinden, had had upon their hands the infantry of Generals Baillet-Latour and Kienmayer. These divisions had been hard pressed, for they were inferior by one-half to the enemy; they had, moreover, the disadvantage of ground; for the head of the wooded ravines, by which the Austrians debouched into the little plain of Hohenlinden, being rather higher than that open plain, enabled them to pour a downward fire upon it. But Generals Bastoul and Legrand, under the command of General Grenier, seconded by the courage of their brave soldiers, made a vigorous stand. Luckily, too, D'Hautpoul's cavalry was there to support them, as well as Ney's second brigade, the latter general having entered the field with one only.

The two French divisions, at first overwhelmed by numbers, had lost a little ground. Quitting the margin of the wood, they had fallen back into the plain, but with extraordinary steadiness and displaying to the enemy an heroic firmness. Two demi-brigades of Legrand's division, the 51st and the 42d, thrown back towards Harthofen, had to oppose Kienmayer's infantry, besides a division of cavalry attached to that corps. Sometimes keeping up a well-sustained fire upon the infantry, at others crossing bayonets against the cavalry, they opposed an invincible resistance to all attacks. But, at this moment, Grenier, being apprized of the success obtained at the centre, formed Legrand's division into columns, caused it to be supported by charges of D'Hautpoul's cavalry, and drove back Kienmayer's corps to the skirt of the wood. General Bonnet, on his side, with a brigade of Bastoul's division, charged the Austrians, and overthrew them in the valley from which they had endeavoured to issue. Meanwhile, the grenadiers of Iola's brigade, Ney's second, rushed upon Baillet-Latour, and repulsed him. The impulsion of victory communicated to these brave troops, redoubled their ardour and their strength. They finally drove back the two corps of Baillet-Latour and Kienmayer, the one towards the Isen, the other towards Lenddorf, in that low and difficult tract from which they had in vain attempted to debouch, in order to gain possession of the plateau of Hohenlinden.

Moreau returned at this moment from the heart of the forest with a detachment of Grandjean's division, to bring relief to his left, which was so briskly attacked. But there, as at all the other points, he found his soldiers victorious, transported with joy, congratulating their general on such a glorious triumph. That triumph was indeed glorious. The Austrian army had greater difficulty to get out of those thickets than it had to penetrate into them. There were seen everywhere straggling corps, which, not knowing whither to flee, fell into the hands of our victorious troops, and laid down their arms. It was five o'clock, and darkness shrouded the field of battle. The French had killed or wounded 7000 or 8000 of the enemy, made 12,000 prisoners, taken 300 wagons, and eighty-seven pieces of cannon, results very uncommon in war. Thus in one day the Austrian army had lost nearly 20,000 soldiers, almost all its artillery, its baggage, and, what was of still greater importance, its whole moral courage.

This battle is the most brilliant of all that Moreau ever fought, and certainly one of the greatest in the present century, which has beheld such extraordinary conflicts. It has been wrongfully asserted that there was another conqueror of Marengo than General Bonaparte, and that this was General Kellermann. With much greater reason it might be alleged that there was another conqueror of Hohenlinden than General Moreau, namely, General Richepanse, for he executed, upon a rather vague order, a most brilliant manœuvre. But, though less unjust, this assertion would still be unjust. Let us leave to every man the merit of his deeds, and not imitate those paltry efforts of envy, which is on all occasions bent on discovering a different conqueror from the real one.

Moreau, in advancing along the Inn from Kufstein to Mühldorf, without having chosen a precise point of attack, without having concentrated all his forces upon that point, to make nothing but mere demonstrations,—Moreau had in this manner exposed his left in the battle of the 1st of December. Still this could prove but a momentary advantage to the enemy; and, in retiring into the recesses of the labyrinth of Hohenlinden, in drawing the Austrians thither, in bringing down opportunely his centre upon his left, from Ebersburg to Mattenboett, he had executed one of the most successful manœuvres known in the history of modern warfare. It has been alleged that Richepanse marched without orders; that is incorrect; an order was given to him, as we have related, but it was too general, not sufficiently detailed. None of the circumstances that might have happened had been provided against. Moreau had merely directed Richepanse and Decaen to strike off from Ebersberg, for St. Christoph, without specifying the route, without providing against either the presence of Riesch's corps, or any of the possible and even probable accidents, amidst that forest full of enemies; and, with an officer less vigorous than Richepanse, he might have reaped a disaster instead of a triumph. But fortune always has some share in military successes. All that can be said is, that in this case it was very great, nay, greater than usual.

¹ So Napoleon erroneously asserted at St. Helena. The written orders exist, and have been printed in the Memorial of the war.

Moreau has been censured because, while fighting with six divisions out of twelve, he left three under General St. Suzanne on the Danube, three under General Lecourbe on the Upper Inn, and thus exposed his left, under General Grenier, to the hazard of fighting in the proportion of one against two. This reproach is certainly more weighty and more deserved; but let us not tarnish so glorious a triumph, and let us add, in order to be just, that there are flaws in the finest works of men, that in the most splendid victories there are faults,—faults which fortune repairs, and which must be admitted as an ordinary accompaniment of great military exploits.

After this important victory, the conqueror would have done well to pursue the Austrian army briskly, to march for Vienna, to demolish, by pushing forward, the defences of the Tyrol, to necessitate in this manner a retrograde movement in the whole line of the Austrians from Bavaria to Italy; for the retreat of the troops from the Inn would occasion that of the troops from the Tyrol, and the retreat of these latter would render the abandonment of the Mincio inevitable. But to obtain all these results it would have been necessary to have forced the Inn, then the Salza, which falls into the Inn, and forms a second line to cross after the first. At the moment, all this might have been accomplished from the impulsion given to our army by the victory of Hohenlinden.

Moreau, as soon as he had allowed some rest to his troops, moved his left and part of his centre into the Mühldorf road, threatening at once the bridges of Kraiburg, Mühldorf, and Braunau, to persuade the enemy that he intended to cross the Inn in its lower course. But, meanwhile, Lecourbe, who a few months before had so gloriously passed the Danube at the battle of Hochstett, was directed to cross the Inn, with the right, near Rosenheim. This general had discovered a spot called Neuburn, where the right bank, which we occupied, commanded the left bank, occupied by the enemy, and where the artillery might be advantageously employed to protect the passage. This point was therefore chosen. Several days were unfortunately lost in collecting the necessary matériel, and it was not till the morning of the 9th of December, six days after the great battle of Hohenlinden, that Lecourbe was enabled to act.

Moreau had suddenly resumed his position on the Upper Inn. The three divisions of the centre had been despatched from Wasserburg to Aibling, at a little distance from Rosenheim, ready to assist Lecourbe. The left had succeeded them in their positions, and General Collaud, with two divisions of St. Suzanne's corps, had been pushed forward from the Isar to Erding.

On the morning of the 9th of December—18th Frimaire—Lecourbe commenced the operations for the passage before Neuburn. Montrichard's division was to cross the Inn first. General Lemaire placed on the heights of the right bank a battery of twenty-eight pieces of cannon, and swept off every thing that appeared on the left bank. On this part of the Inn there was nothing but Condé's corps, and this was too weak to oppose any serious resistance. While all the enemy's detachments were kept at a respectable distance by a continued fire of artillery, the pontonniers threw themselves into boats, accompanied by some battalions of élite, destined to protect their operations. In two hours and a half a bridge was completed, and Montrichard's division could begin to debouch. It advanced upon the Austrians, who retreated, and descended the right bank of the Inn till they were opposite to Rosenheim. They took a strong position at Stephans Kirchen. During this movement the divisions of the centre, stationed before Rosenheim itself, exerted themselves to prevent the Austrians from destroying completely the bridge of that town. Having been unsuccessful, they ascended the Inn and crossed at Neuburn, for the purpose of seconding Lecourbe. Condé's corps, reinforced by some succours, appraised itself, on the one hand, upon the destroyed bridge of Rosenheim, on the other upon the small lake of Chiemsee. Lecourbe sent a detachment to turn this lake, which obliged the enemy to retire, after a resistance that was not very bloody. The Inn was thus crossed, and that formidable obstacle, which it was alleged could not fail to stop the French army, was surmounted. Thus Lecourbe had gathered a fresh laurel in the winter campaign. The march was not slackened. Next day, a bridge was thrown before Rosenheim for the passage of the rest of the centre. Grenier, with the left, crossed the Inn over the bridges of Wasserburg and Mühldorf, which the enemy had abandoned without destroying them.

It was expedient to lose no time in driving the Austrians to the banks of the Salza, which runs behind the Inn and falls into that river, a little above Braunau. The Salza is like a second arm of the Inn itself. If you would cross the Inn near the mountains, you are obliged to cross it twice, as it were; whereas, in passing it in the environs of Braunau, after its junction with the Salza, there is but one passage to perform. But then the volume of its waters is doubled, and the difficulty of crossing by main force is proportionably increased. This reason, and a desire to surprise the enemy, who did not expect to see the French attempt the passage above Rosenheim, had decided the choice of Moreau.

Lecourbe, supported by the divisions of the centre, advanced rapidly, in spite of all the difficulties presented by that hilly country, interspersed with woods, rivers, and lakes,—a country difficult in any season, but still more so in the middle of December. The Austrian army, though shaken by so many reverses, still kept the field. The sentiment of honour, awakened by the danger of the capital, caused it still to make noble efforts to stop us. The Austrian cavalry covered the retreat, and vigorously charged the French corps which advanced too rashly. The enemy crossed the Alz, which conveys the water of the Chiemsee to the Inn; they passed Fraunstein, and at length arrived near the Salza, not far from Salzburg.

There, before Salzburg itself, was still left a strong position to occupy. The Archduke John thought that he might there concentrate his troops, hoping to procure for them some success, which would raise their courage, and somewhat slacken the daring pursuit of the French. Accordingly, he did concentrate them there on the 13th of December—22d Frimaire.

The town of Salzburg is seated on the Salza. In advance of that river runs another small stream, the Saal, which descends from the neighbouring mountains, and falls into the Salza below Salzburg. The ground between the two is level, marshy, covered with clumps of trees, everywhere difficult of access. Here the Archduke John took a position, with his right to the Salza, his left to the mountains, his front covered by the Saal. His artillery swept this level tract. His cavalry, drawn up on the naked and solid parts of the ground, was ready to charge the French corps which should dare to take the offensive. His infantry was solidly appuyed upon the town of Salzburg.

On the morning of the 14th, Lecourbe, impelled by his ardour, forded the Saal, sustained several charges of cavalry on the strand bordering the river, and bore them bravely; but presently, the thick fog which covered the plain clearing off, he perceived, in advance of Salzburg, a formidable line of cavalry, artillery, and infantry. It was the whole Austrian army. In presence of this danger he behaved with great steadiness, but suffered some loss.

Fortunately, Decaen's division at this moment crossed the Salza towards Laufen, in an almost miraculous manner. On the preceding day, the advanced guard of this division, finding the bridge of Laufen destroyed, had explored the banks of the Salza, everywhere covered by the enemy's tirailleurs, in search of a passage. It had perceived a boat lying on the opposite shore. At this sight, three chasseurs of the 14th swam across to the other side, in spite of the most intense cold, and a current still more rapid than that of the Inn. After fighting hand to hand with several Austrian tirailleurs, they had taken and brought across the boat. Some hundred French availed themselves of it for crossing successively to the opposite bank, occupied a village quite close to the destroyed bridge of Laufen, and barricaded themselves there in such a manner that a small number of them sufficed to defend it. The others had rushed upon the Austrian artillery, taken it, seized all the craft on the right bank of the Salza, and thus furnished the division remaining on the left bank with the means of crossing. On the morning of the following day, the 14th, Decaen's whole division having crossed, and ascending to Salzburg, came up at the very moment when Lecourbe was engaged single-handed with the whole Austrian army. It could not have arrived more opportunely. The Archduke, apprized of the passage of the French, and of their march upon Salzburg, hastily decamped, and thus Lecourbe was extricated from the serious danger to which chance and his ardour had exposed him.

All the defences of the Inn and the Salza were thus overcome. From that moment there was no obstacle to cover the Austrian army, or to give it courage to resist the French army. In Tyrol, it is true, there were left 25,000 men, who might have annoyed our rear, but it is not when you are victorious, and demoralization has seized your enemy, that you need fear bold attempts. Moreau, having left St. Suzanne's corps behind, to invest Braunau, and to occupy the tract of country between the Inn and the Isar.—Moreau, emboldened by the success attending every step he took, marched towards the Traun and the Ens, which were now incapable of stopping him. Richepanse formed the advanced guard, supported by Grouchy and Decaen. The retreat of the Austrians was affected in disorder. The French picked up every moment men, carriages, or cannon. Richepanse fought brilliant actions at Frankenmarkt, at Vöcklabruck, and at Schwanstadt. Incessantly engaged with the Austrian cavalry, he took so many as 1200 horse at a time. On the 20th of December—29th Frimaire—the French had crossed the Traun, and were marching for Steyer, with the intention of crossing the Ens at that place.

The young Archduke John, whom such a series of disasters had completely disheartened, had just been superseded by the Archduke Charles, who was at length recalled from disgrace, to have a task assigned to him, now impossible to be performed—that of saving the Austrian army. He beheld with grief, on his arrival, the spectacle exhibited by those soldiers of the empire, who, after they had nobly resisted the French, desired that they might no longer be sacrificed to a fatal and universally reprobated policy. He sent M. de Meerfeld to Moreau, to propose an armistice. Moreau agreed to grant forty-eight hours, on condition that within this time he would return from Vienna, furnished with the emperor's powers; but he stipulated, at the same time, that the French army should meanwhile have license to advance to the Ens.

On the 21st, he crossed the Ens at Steyer. His advanced posts appeared on the Ips and the Erlaf. He was at the gates of Vienna; he might feel tempted to enter it, and to appropriate to himself the glory which no French general had yet had, of penetrating into the capital of the empire. But the moderate spirit of Moreau was not fond of pushing fortune to extremities. The Archduke Charles gave him his word that if hostilities were suspended, Austria would treat immediately for peace, on the conditions which France had always insisted upon, especially that of a separate negotiation. Moreau, full of a just esteem for that prince, showed a disposition to believe him.

Several of his lieutenants urged him to march to Vienna.—“It will be better,” he replied, “to secure peace . . . I hear nothing of Macdonald and Brune; I know not whether the one has succeeded in penetrating into the Tyrol, whether the other has been able to cross the Mincio. Augereau is at a great distance from me, in a critical situation. I might perhaps drive the Austrians to despair, were I to persist in humbling them. We had better halt and be content with peace, for it is for that alone that we are fighting."

These were wise and praiseworthy sentiments. On the 25th of December—4th Nivôse, year IX—he consented, therefore, to sign, at Steyer, a new suspension of arms, the conditions of which were the following:—There was to be a cessation of hostilities in Germany, between the Austrian armies and the French armies, commanded by Moreau and Augereau. General Brune and Macdonald were to be invited to sign a similar armistice for the armies of the Grisons and of Italy. The whole valley of the Danube, including the Tyrol, was given up to the French, besides the fortresses of Braunau and Wurtzburg, the forts of Scharnitz, Kufstein, &c. The Austrian magazines were placed at our disposal. No detachment of troops could be sent to Italy, in case a suspension of arms should not be agreed to by the generals commanding in that country. This stipulation was obligatory on both armies.

Moreau was satisfied with these conditions, calculating, with reason, upon peace, and preferring it to more signal but more hazardous triumphs. A brilliant glory surrounded his name, for his winter campaign surpassed that of the spring. After crossing the Rhine in that first spring campaign, and driving the Austrians to the Danube, while the First Consul was crossing the Alps; after having then dislodged them from their camp at Ulm by the battle of Hochstett, and pushed them back to the Inn, he had taken breath during the summer, and, resuming his march in winter, during the most intense cold, he had overwhelmed them at Hohenlinden, driven them from the Inn to the Salza, from the Salza to the Traun and the Ens, pushing them, in disorder, to the very gates of Vienna. At last, halting a few leagues from the capital, he granted them time for signing peace. In his conduct there had been irresolution, dilatoriness, in short, faults which severe judges have since keenly censured, as if to revenge, on the memory of Moreau, the injustices committed upon the memory of Napoleon; but there was an unbroken series of successes, obtained by prudence and firmness. We ought to respect all glories, and not destroy one to avenge another. Moreau had proved himself capable of commanding 100,000 men with prudence and vigour; no man, excepting Napoleon, has manœuvred such a force so well, in the present century; and, although the place of the conqueror of Hohenlinden be at an immense distance from that of the conqueror of Rivoli, of Marengo, and of Austerlitz, that place is, nevertheless, glorious, and would have remained glorious, if criminal misconduct, the fatal effects of jealousy, had not subsequently sullied a life till then noble and pure.

The armistice in Germany happened seasonably for extricating the Gallo-Batavian army, commanded by Augereau, from its hazardous position. The Austrian general, Klenau, who had always remained at a great distance from the Archduke John, had suddenly formed a junction with Simbschen, and, by this union of forces, had brought Augereau into danger. But the latter had bravely defended the Rudnitz, and maintained his ground till the conclusion of hostilities. The retreat of the Austrians into Bohemia relieved him from embarrassment, and the armistice covered him from the dangers of a position too destitute of support, since Moreau was at the gates of Vienna.

During these events in Germany, hostilities continued in the Alps and in Italy. The First Consul, seeing, from the commencement of the campaign, that Moreau could dispense with the assistance of the army in the Grisons, had ordered Macdonald to cross the Splügen, to throw himself from the great chain of the Alps into the Valteline, and from the Valteline into Italian Tyrol, then to proceed to Trent, and thus turn the line of the Mincio, and, by this manœuvre, put an end to the resistance of the Austrians in the plains of Italy. No objection, founded on the height of the Splügen or the inclemency of the season, could shake the First Consul. He had invariably replied that, wherever two men could set their feet, an army had the means of passing, and that the Alps were easier to cross in frost than when the snow was melting, the season in which he had himself crossed the Saint Bernard. This was the argument of an absolute spirit, which is determined to attain its end at any rate whatever. The event proved that, in the mountains, winter is attended with dangers at least equal to those of spring, and that, moreover, it dooms men to the most frightful hardships.

General Macdonald prepared to obey, and he did it with all the energy of his character. After leaving Morlot's division in the Grisons, to guard the débouchés which communicate between the Grisons and the Engadine, (the upper valley of the Inn,) he approached the Splügen. For some time past the division of Baraguay d'Hilliers¹ was in the Upper Valteline, threatening the Engadine from the Italian side; while Morlot threatened it from the side next to the Grisons. With the bulk of his army, about 12,000 men, Macdonald commenced his movement, and climbed the first acclivities of the Splügen. The passage of that lofty mountain, narrow and winding during an ascent of several leagues, was attended with the greatest dangers, especially at that season, when frequent tempests covered the roads with enormous drifts of snow and ice. The artillery and ammunition had been placed disgraced with Menou in 1795. Employed in Italy in 1796. Had a command in the army of Egypt, and was taken by the English in the frigate Sensible in 1798. In 1799 he was on the general staff on the Rhine. Shared the events of the 18th of Brumaire, and was made inspector-general of the 14th, 15th, and 16th divisions.—Biographie Moderne m.

¹ BARAGUAY D'HILLIERS, LOUIS. Born of a noble family at Paris in 1764. He entered the service early, and was in the regiment of Alsau on the breaking out of the Revolution. He was aid-de-camp successively to Crillon, La Bourdonnaye Montesquieu, and Custine, with whom he was arrested in 1793. Tried and acquitted by the revolutionary tribunal in 1794, he was again

on sledges, and the soldiers were laden with biscuit and cartridges. The first column, composed of cavalry and artillery, began the passage in fine weather, but it was all at once assailed by a tremendous tempest. An avalanche precipitated one half of a squadron of dragoons into the abyss, and struck terror into the soldiers. They, nevertheless, kept up their courage. In three days, the storm having ceased, a fresh attempt was made to cross this formidable mountain. It was encumbered with snow. Oxen were driven before the troops, to trample the snow, into which they sunk up to the belly; then labourers beat it down hard; the infantry, in passing, rendered it quite solid; lastly, sappers widened the passes, when too narrow, by cutting the ice with hatchets. These exertions were requisite to render the road passable for cavalry and artillery. The first days of December were thus spent in effecting the passage of the first three columns. The soldiers endured these horrible sufferings with admirable fortitude, living upon biscuit and a small quantity of brandy. The fourth and last column had at last nearly reached the summit of the mountain, when a fresh storm once more closed the passage, entirely dispersed the 104th demi-brigade, and buried about 100 men. General Macdonald was there. He rallied his soldiers, cheered them under dangers and hardships, caused the road, barred by blocks of frozen snow, to be again opened, and at length de-bouched with all the rest of his corps into the Valteline.

This truly extraordinary enterprise had carried the greater part of the army of the Grisons across the great chain, and to the very threshold of the Italian Tyrol. General Macdonald, as he had been ordered, sought, as soon as he had passed the Splügen, to concert with Brune before proceeding to the sources of the Mincio and the Adige, and thus demolishing the whole defensive line of the Austrians, which extended from the Alps to the Adriatic.

Brune would not deprive himself of a whole division to assist Macdonald, but he consented to detach Lecchi's Italian division, which was to ascend from the valley of the Chiesa to the Rocca d'Anfo. Macdonald, therefore, resolved to ascend the Valteline, and to attack Mont Tonal, which commands the pass into the Tyrol and the valley of the Adige. But here, though the height was inferior to that of the Splügen, the ice was as deeply drifted; and besides, General Wukassowich had covered the principal approaches to Mont Tonal with intrenchments. On the 22d and 23d of December, General Vandamme made an attack at the head of a corps of grenadiers, and renewed it several times with heroic courage. Those brave fellows made incredible but useless efforts. Several times, marching upon the ice, and exposed to a most destructive fire, they advanced to the very palisades of the intrenchment, and endeavoured to pull them up, but, the ground being frozen, they were foiled in the attempt. It was useless to persist further; it was, therefore, resolved, to pass into the valley of the Oglio, to descend it to Pisogno, and then proceed into the valley of the Chiesa. The intention in this was to cross the mountains in a less elevated region, and by passes not so well defended. Macdonald, having descended to Pisogno, crossed the Cols which separated him from the valley of the Chiesa, formed his junction with Lecchi's brigade towards the Rocca d'Anfo, and found himself beyond the obstacles which parted him from the Italian Tyrol and the Adige. He was enabled to reach Trent, before General Wukassowich had effected his retreat from the heights of Mont Tonal, and to take a position between the Austrians who defended the sources of the rivers amidst the Alps, and the Austrians who defended the lower part of their courses in the plains of Italy.

Brune, before he attempted to force the Mincio, had waited till Macdonald had made sufficient progress for the attacks to be nearly simultaneous in the mountains and in the plain. Out of 125,000 spread over Italy, he had, as we have observed, 100,000 effective men, tried soldiers, and recruited after their privations, an artillery admirably organized by General Marmont, and an excellent cavalry. Nearly 20,000 men guarded Lombardy, Piedmont, Liguria, and Tuscany. A weak brigade, commanded by General Petitot, observed the Austrian troops, which, setting out from Ferrara, threatened Bologna. The national guard of the latter city was ready, besides, to defend itself against the Austrians. The Neapolitans were again passing through the Roman States on their march to Tuscany; but Murat, with the 10,000 men from the camp of Amiens, was gone to meet them. Brune, after providing for the guard of the different parts of Italy, had about 70,000 men to direct upon the Mincio. General Bonaparte, who was perfectly acquainted with this theatre of operations, had recommended to him carefully to concentrate his troops as much as possible in Upper Italy; to take no heed what the Austrians might attempt towards the banks of the Po, in the Legations, or even in Tuscany; to remain steadily, as he had himself formerly done, at the débouchés of the Alps; and he was incessantly repeating that, when the Austrians should be beaten between the Mincio and the Adige, that is to say, on the line by which they enter Italy, all those who had passed the Po and penetrated into central Italy would be in so much the greater danger.

The Austrians did actually seem disposed to come out of Ferrara and to threaten Bologna; but General Petitot found means to repress them, and the national guard of Bologna displayed on its part the firmest attitude.

Brune, straightways conforming to the instructions which he had received, advanced to the Mincio, between the 20th and 24th of December,—29th Frimaire to 3d Nivôse,—took the positions which the Austrians had occupied in advance of that river, and made his dispositions for passing it on the morning of the 25th. General Delmas¹ commanded his advanced-guard, General Moncey¹ his left. General Dupont his right, and General Michaud his reserve. Besides the cavalry and artillery distributed in the divisions, he had a considerable reserve of both.

¹ DELMAS was born at Tullies, of a poor but noble family. In 1791, he was chief of the first battalion of the Corrèze. He distinguished himself in the army of the North, and was soon made general of brigade. In 1793, he served in the army of the Rhine, and afterwards

In recording the first campaigns of General Bonaparte,² we have already described this theatre as the scene of so many memorable events; we must, nevertheless, portray in a few words the configuration of the country. The mass of the waters of the Tyrol is discharged by the Adige into the Adriatic: hence the Adige forms a line of great strength. But, before you reach the line of the Adige, you come to one of minor importance, namely, that of the Mincio. The waters of several valleys lateral to that of the Tyrol, at first accumulated in the lake of Garda, afterwards pour themselves into the Mincio, tarry some time at Mantua, around which they form an inundation, and at last fall into the Po. There was, consequently, a double line to cross, first that of the Mincio, then that of the Adige, the latter being far the more considerable and the stronger of the two. It was requisite to cross both, and if this were done promptly enough to give a hand to Macdonald, who was marching by the Rocca d'Anfo and Trent to the Upper Adige, it would be possible to separate the Austrian army defending the Tyrol from the Austrian army defending the Mincio, and to take the former.

The line of the Mincio, seven or eight leagues long at most, appuying on the lake of Garda on the one hand and Mantua on the other, bristling with artillery, and defended by 70,000 Austrians, under the command of the Count de Bellegarde, was not easy to force. The enemy had at Borghetto and Valleggio a well intrenched bridge, which enabled him to act on both banks. The river was not fordable at this season; and the mass of its waters had been further increased by closing all the canals which are supplied by it.

Brune, after collecting his columns, conceived the singular idea of crossing the Mincio at two points at once, at Pozzolo and at Mozzembano. Between these two points the river formed a bend, the convexity of which was turned towards our troops; moreover, the right bank, which we occupied, commanded the left bank occupied by the Austrians, so that at Mozzembano, as well as at Pozzolo, we could open a converging fire from higher batteries upon the enemy's bank, and thus cover the operation of a passage. But at both points the Austrians were found firmly seated behind the Mincio, covered with solid intrenchments, appuyed either on Mantua or on Peschiera.

The advantages and the inconveniences of the passage were, therefore, nearly alike at Pozzolo and at Mozzembano. But what ought to have decided Brune to prefer one of the two points, no matter which, while he might have made a false demonstration on the other, was that between these two points there was a tête de pont, then occupied by the enemy. The Austrians, therefore, could debouch by this tête de pont, and throw themselves on one of the two operations with a view to interrupt it. It follows that only one should have been attempted, and that with the whole of the forces.

Brune, nevertheless, persisted in his double plan, apparently to divide the enemy's attention, and on the 25th of December made all necessary dispositions for a double passage. But difficulties which supervened in regard to carriage, difficulties extremely great at this season, prevented every thing from being ready at Mozzembano, the point at which Brune himself was with the greater part of his troops, and the operation was deferred till the next day. It would seem that, in this case, the second passage ought to have been countermanded; but Brune, having always considered the attempt near Pozzolo as a mere diversion, thought that the diversion would produce its effect with the greater certainty, if it preceded the principal operation by twenty-four hours.

Dupont, who commanded at Pozzolo, was an officer full of ardour: he advanced, on the morning of the 25th, to the bank of the Mincio, crowned with artillery the heights of Molino della Volta, which commanded the opposite bank, threw a bridge in a very short time, and, favoured by a thick fog, succeeded in passing Watrin's division to the right bank. Meanwhile, Brune continued motionless with the left and the reserves, at Mozzembano. General Suchet,³ placed between the two with the centre, masked the Austrian bridge of Borghetto. General Dupont, then, was on the left bank with a single corps, in presence of the whole Austrian army. It was easy to foresee the result. The Count de Bellegarde, without loss of time, directed the mass of his forces upon Pozzolo. General Dupont sent to apprise his neighbour, Suchet, and the commander-in-chief, of the success of the passage, and of the danger to which that success exposed him. General Suchet, like a brave and faithful comrade, hastened to the assistance of Dupont's division; but, on quitting Borghetto, he sent to beg Brune to provide for the guard of that débouché, which he left uncovered by his movement towards Pozzolo. Brune, instead of hurrying with all his forces to the point where a lucky accident had opened the with great credit in Holland. He carried the advanced works at Bols-le-Duc, by leaping the palisades on horseback at the head of a body of hussars.

He served in the army of Italy, in 1797 and 1799, and again in 1800 with great credit on the Rhine.—Biographie Moderne.

1. MONCEY, BON. ADRIAN JEAN-OT. Born at Besançon in 1754. His father was an advocate, he entered the regiment of Champagne in 1773, and in 1789, at 25 years, was only a sub-lieutenant of dragons. In 1790 captain, in 1794, chief of battalion, and in 1796, general of division. He led one of the divisions of Napoleon's army, that of St. Gothard, across the Alps, and fought at Mazingo, Pozzolo, and Roveredo.—Court and Camp of Napoleon.

2. In the History of the French Revolution.

3. SUCHET, LOUIS GABRIEL. Born at Lyons in 1770, the son of a silk manufacturer. Entered a regiment raised in Lyons, as volunteer, at twenty years. In 1793 commanded a battalion at the siege of Toulon, and captured General O'Hara. In 1794, joined the army of Italy, distinguished himself at Vado and Laona, where he took three Austrian standards. In 1796, commanded the eighteenth battalion under Massena, fought at Dego, Lodi, Rivoli, Arcola, &c., &c.

In 1798, distinguished himself against the Swiss, and was sent to Paris, with twenty-three standards. He served in Italy and on the Danube, with Joubert, &c., &c.—Court and Camp of Napoleon.

passage of the Mincio to his army—Brune, still engrossed by his operation of the following day upon Mozzembano, never quitted his position. He approved the movement of General Suchet, at the same time recommending to him not to compromise himself on the other side of the river, and merely sent Boudet's division to mask the bridge of Borghetto.

But General Dupont, eager to follow up his success, was absolutely engaged. He had crossed the Mincio, taken Pozzolo, which is situated on the left bank, and carried successively Watrin's and Monnier's divisions across the river. One of his wings was appuyed on Pozzolo, the other on the Mincio, under the protection of the elevated batteries of the right bank.

The Austrians marched with all their reinforcements upon that position. They were preceded by a great number of pieces of cannon. Fortunately, our artillery, placed at Molino della Volta, and firing from one bank to the other, protected our soldiers by the superiority of its fire. The Austrians fell furiously upon Watrin's and Monnier's divisions. The 6th light, the 28th, and the 40th of the line, were wellnigh overwhelmed, but they resisted, with admirable intrepidity, all the joint assaults of the Austrian infantry and cavalry. Monnier's division, however, surprised in Pozzolo by a column of grenadiers, was dislodged. At this moment, Dupont's corps, separated from its principal point d'appui, was on the point of being thrown into the Mincio. But General Suchet, arriving on the other bank, with Gazan's division, and perceiving from the heights of Molino della Volta the serious danger of his brother commander, engaged with 10,000 men against 30,000, hastened to send him reinforcements. Restrained, at the same time, by the orders of Brune, he durst not send him the whole of Gazan's division, and threw Clauzel's brigade only to the other side of the river. This brigade was insufficient; and Dupont must have succumbed notwithstanding these succours, when the rest of Gazan's division, crowning the opposite bank, from which the Austrians could be reached with grape-shot and even by musketry, poured on them a murderous fire, and thus stopped them short. Dupont's troops, being supported, resumed the offensive, and made the Austrians fall back. General Suchet, seeing that the danger increased every moment, resolved to send Gazan's whole division to the other bank. The important point of Pozzolo was thenceforward most fiercely disputed. That village was six times taken and retaken. At nine o'clock at night, the combatants were still fighting by moonlight and in a severe frost. The French finally remained masters of the left bank, but they had lost the élite of four divisions. The Austrians had left 6000 dead or wounded on the field of battle, the French nearly as many. But for the arrival of General Suchet, our left wing would have been destroyed; and, as it was, he durst not engage completely, his hands being tied by the orders of the commander-in-chief. If M. de Bellegarde had directed his whole forces upon that point, or if he had debouched from the bridge of Borghetto, while Brune was immovable at Mozzembano, he might have inflicted a disaster on the centre and on the right of the French army.

Fortunately, he did nothing of the kind. The Mincio was thus crossed at one point. Brune persisted in his plan of passing the next day, the 25th of December, towards Mozzembano, thus exposing himself anew to the risks of an operation by main force. He covered the heights of Mozzembano with forty pieces of cannon, and favoured by the fogs of the season, succeeded in throwing a bridge. The Austrians, fatigued with the preceding day, doubting the intention of a second passage, made less resistance than the day before, and suffered the neighbouring positions of Sallionzo and Valleggio to be taken from them.

The whole army debouched in this manner beyond the Mincio, and was enabled to march, with all its divisions united, for the second line, that of the Adige. The tête de pont of Borghetto must have fallen as a matter of course, from the offensive movement of our columns. A fresh blunder was committed in sacrificing several hundred of our brave soldiers for the conquest of a point which was not tenable. Twelve hundred Austrians were made prisoners there.

The French were victorious, but at the cost of valuable blood, which Generals Bonaparte and Moreau would not have failed to spare the army. Lecourbe passed the rivers of Germany in a different manner. Brune, having forced the Mincio, advanced towards the Adige, which he ought to have crossed immediately. He was not ready to effect the passage till the 31st of December—10th Nivôse. On the 1st of January, General Delmas, with the advanced guard, crossed the river without accident at Bus-solengo, above Verona. General Moncey, with the left, was to ascend to Trent, while the rest of the army descended again to envelope Verona.

Count de Bellegarde was at this moment in imminent danger. Part of the troops of the Tyrol, under General Laudon, had retired before Macdonald, and fallen back upon Trent. General Moncey, with his corps was marching thither also, in reascending the Adige. General Laudon, hemmed in between Macdonald's corps and Moncey's, must succumb, unless he had time to escape into the valley of the Brenta, which, running beyond the Adige, terminates, after numerous windings at Bassano. Brune, if he suddenly crossed the Adige, and vigorously pushed Count de Bellegarde beyond Verona, to Bassano itself, might anticipate at this latter point the corps of the Tyrol, and take it entire by closing the débouché of the Brenta.

An act not the most honourable of General Laudon's, and the tardiness of General Brune, extenuated, it is true, by the season, extricated the Tyrol corps from all these perils.

Macdonald had actually reached Trent, while Moncey's corps was proceeding thither, on its side. General Laudon, hemmed in between these two corps, had recourse to a falsehood. He assured General Moncey that an armistice had just been signed in Germany, and that this armistice extended to both armies, which was false; for the convention signed at Steyer by Moreau applied only to the armies operating upon the Danube. General Moncey, from a nice sense of honour, credited the statement of General Laudon, and opened to him the passes leading to the Brenta; so that he was enabled to rejoin the Count de Bellegarde in the environs of Bassano.

But the disasters in Germany were known. The Austrian army, beaten in Italy, pressed by an army of 90,000 men, since the junction of Macdonald's and Brune's troops, could hold out no longer. An armistice was proposed to Brune, who hastened to accept it, and signed it on the 16th of January at Treviso. Brune, impatient to settle matters, demanded no more than the line of the Adige, with the fortresses of Ferrara, Peschiera, and Portolegnago. He never thought of requiring the cession of Mantua. Yet he had received specific orders not to halt till he had entered Isonzo, and made himself master of Mantua. That place was the only one which was worth the trouble; for all the others must have fallen as a matter of course. It was of especial importance to occupy it, that there might be a ground for demanding, at the Congress of Lunéville, its cession to the Cisalpine Republic.

While these events were occurring in Upper Italy, the Neapolitans penetrated into Tuscany. The Count de Damas, who commanded a corps of 16,000 men, 8000 of whom were Neapolitans, had advanced to Sienna. General Miollis, obliged to guard all the posts of Tuscany, had not more than 3500 disposable men, mostly Italians. He marched, nevertheless, to meet the Neapolitans. The brave soldiers of Pino's division rushed upon the advanced-guard of the Count de Damas, overthrew it, forced an entrance into Sienna, and put to the sword a considerable number of the insurgents. The Count de Damas was obliged to fall back. Besides, Murat was advancing with his grenadiers, to wring from him the signature of a third armistice.

Thus the campaign was finished everywhere, and peace insured. In every quarter our operations had been successful. Moreau's army, flanked by that of Augereau, had penetrated to the very gates of Vienna; Brune's, seconded by that of Macdonald, had passed the Mincio and the Adige, and advanced to Treviso. Though it had not entirely thrown the Austrians to the other side of the Alps, it had dispossessed them of sufficient territory to furnish the French negotiator at Lunéville with powerful arguments against the pretensions of Austria in Italy. Murat was about to complete the submission of the court of Naples.

On receiving intelligence of the battle of Hohenlinden, the First Consul, who was said to be jealous of Moreau, was filled with sincere joy.¹ This victory lost none of its value in his estimation, because it was achieved by a rival. He deemed himself so superior to all his companions in arms, in military glory, and in political influence, that he felt no jealousy of any of them. Wholly devoted to the task of pacifying and reorganizing France, he derived warm satisfaction from every event which contributed to facilitate his task, even when such events added to the fame of those men who were destined afterwards to be set up for rivals to him.

What displeased him in this campaign was the useless effusion of French blood at Pozzolo, and especially the grievous fault of not demanding Mantua. He refused to ratify the convention at Treviso, and declared that he would give orders for the renewal of hostilities, if the fortress of Mantua were not immediately delivered to the French army.

All the while, Joseph Bonaparte and M. de Cobentzel were at Lunéville, awaiting the events occurring on the Danube and the Adige. It is a singular situation, that of two negotiators, treating while hostilities are going on, witnesses, as it were, of the duel between two great nations, expecting every instant the news not of the death, but of the exhaustion of the one or the other. On this occasion, M. de Cobentzel displayed an energy of character, which may be held up as an example to men who are called to serve their country in disastrous circumstances. He did not suffer himself to be disconcerted by the defeat of the Austrians at Hohenlinden, or by the passage of the Inn, the Salza, the Traun, &c. To all these events he replied, with imperturbable composure, that all this was certainly unfortunate, but that the Archduke Charles had recovered from his mortifications; that he had arrived at the head of the extraordinary levies of Bohemia and Hungary; that he had brought to the assistance of the capital 25,000 Bohemians and 75,000 Hungarians; that, in advancing farther, the French would meet with a resistance which they did not expect. At the same time, he persisted in all the pretensions of Austria, particularly in that of not treating without an English plenipotentiary, who would at least mask by his presence the real negotiations which might take place between the two legations. Sometimes he went so far as to say, that he would retire to Frankfort, and thus put an end to the hopes of peace, which the First Consul needed for lulling people's minds. At this threat the First Consul, who never shuffled when any one tried to intimidate him, sent word to M. de Cobentzel, that if he left Lunéville, all chance of an accommodation would be totally lost, and that the war should be pushed to the utmost extremity, even to the entire destruction of the Austrian monarchy.

Amidst this diplomatic struggle, M. de Cobentzel received intelligence of the armistice of Steyer, the emperor's order to treat on any terms, and, in particular, urgent injunctions to obtain an extension to Italy of the armistice already agreed on for Germany; for there would be nothing gained, if, after stopping one of the two French armies which were marching for Vienna, the other should be suffered to reach that capital by the Friule and Carinthia. In consequence, M. de Cobentzel declared, on the 31st of December, that he was ready to treat without the concurrence of England; that he consented to sign preliminaries of peace, or a definitive treaty, whichever the French government pleased; but that, before he definitively committed himself by separating from England, he desired that an armistice common to Italy and Germany should be signed, and that some explanation respecting the conditions of peace should be entered into, at least in a general manner. For his part, he proposed these conditions: the Oglio, for the boundary of Austria in Italy, together with the Legations; and at the same time, the reinstatement of the Dukes of Modena and Tuscany in their former dominions.

¹ M. de Bourrienne says that "he leaped for joy;" and this biographer is not to be suspected, for though he owed every thing to Napoleon, he seems not to have recollected this in his Memoirs.

These conditions were unreasonable. The First Consul would not have admitted them even before the successes of the winter campaign, and still less after them.

The reader has not forgotten the preliminaries signed by the Count de St. Julien. The treaty of Campo Formio was there adopted for basis, with this difference, that certain indemnities promised to Austria for various petty territories should be granted in Italy, instead of Germany. We have already mentioned the drift of this negotiation; the treaty of Campo Formio assigned the Adige for the boundary between the Cisalpine Republic and Austria; by promising Austria indemnities in Italy, she was led to hope for the Mincio, for example, instead of the Adige, as a boundary, but the Mincio at most, and never the territory of the Legations, which the First Consul intended to dispose of otherwise.

The ideas of the First Consul were thenceforth fixed. He determined that Austria should pay the expenses of the winter campaign; he determined that she should have the Adige, and nothing more, and that she should receive no indemnity, either in Germany or Italy, for the small territories ceded on the left bank of the Rhine. As for the Legations, he meant to reserve them, and to make them subservient to various combinations. Hitherto they had belonged to the Cisalpine Republic. His design was either to leave them to it, or to devote them to the aggrandizement of the house of Parma, promised, by treaty, to the court of Spain. In this latter case, he should give Parma to the Cisalpine, Tuscany to the house of Parma, which would be a considerable aggrandizement, and the Legations to the Grand-duke of Tuscany. As for the Duke of Modena, Austria had promised, by the treaty of Campo Formio, to indemnify him for the loss of his duchy by means of the Brisgau. It was, therefore, for her to fulfil her engagements towards that prince.

The First Consul wished for something else, that was thoroughly understood but very difficult to make Austria agree to. He wished not to be obliged, as after the peace of Campo Formio, to hold a congress with the princes of the empire, to obtain from each individually the formal cession of the right bank of the Rhine to France. He recollected the congress of Rastadt, which terminated in the murder of our plenipotentiaries; he recollected the trouble it had been to treat with each prince separately, and to agree with all those who had lost territories upon a system of indemnities that would satisfy them. In consequence, he required that the emperor should sign, as head of the house of Austria, for what related to his house, and, as emperor, for what related to the empire. In short, he wanted to have, in a single stroke, an acknowledgment of our conquests, both on the part of Austria and on the part of the Germanic confederation.

He, therefore, ordered his brother Joseph to notify to M. de Cobentzel the following conditions, as definitely fixed:—The left bank of the Rhine to France; the boundary of the Adige for Austria and the Cisalpine, without relinquishing the Legations; the Legations to the Duke of Tuscany; Tuscany to the Duke of Parma; Parma to the Cisalpine; the Brisgau to the Duke of Modena; lastly, peace to be signed by the emperor, both for himself and for the empire. As for the armistice in Italy, he was willing to grant it, on condition of the immediate delivery of the fortress of Mantua to the French army.

As the First Consul was acquainted with the Austrian manner of negotiating, and particularly that of M. de Cobentzel, he wished to cut short a great many difficulties, a great many oppositions, a great many threats of a feigned desperation; and he devised a new way of signifying his ultimatum. The Legislative Body had just assembled; it was proposed to it on the 2d of January—12th Nivose,—to declare that the four armies commanded by Generals Moreau, Brune, Macdonald, and Angereau, were entitled to their country's thanks. A message, added to this proposal, announced that M. de Cobentzel had at length engaged to treat without the concurrence of England, and that the definitive condition of peace was the Rhine for France, and the Adige for the Cisalpine Republic. The message added that, in case these conditions were not accepted, the French would march on Prague, on Vienna, and on Venice, and there enforce them.

This communication was hailed with transport in Paris, but excited a strong emotion at Lunéville. M. de Cobentzel raised great outcries against the hardness of these conditions, and particularly against their form. He complained bitterly that France seemed to be making the treaty by herself, without having to negotiate with anybody. He, nevertheless, continued firm, and declared that Austria could not give way on all the points, that she would rather fall with arms in her hand than accede to such conditions. M. de Cobentzel consented, however, to fall back from the Oglio to the Ciesà, which runs between the Oglio and the Mincio, on condition of having Peschiera, Mantua, and Ferrara, without obligation to demolish those fortresses. He consented to indemnify the Duke of Modena with the Brisgau, but he insisted on the restitution of the dominions of the Duke of Tuscany. He spoke of formal guarantees to be given for the independence of Piedmont, the Holy See, Naples, &c. As for peace with the empire, he declared that the emperor was about to demand powers of the Germanic Diet, but that his sovereign would never take it upon him so treat for it without being authorized. He insisted further on the signature of an armistice in Italy, declaring that, as for Mantua, if Austria were to deliver that fortress to the French army, she would put all Italy at once into the hands of the French, and deprive herself of all means of resistance, if hostilities should be renewed. Adding caresses to firmness, M. de Cobentzel endeavoured to touch Joseph, by talking to him of the favourable dispositions of the emperor towards France, and particularly towards the First Consul, insinuating even that Austria might probably ally herself with the French Republic, and that such an alliance would be very serviceable against the secret but real ill-will of the northern courts.

Joseph, who was extremely mild, could not help being affected, to a certain degree, by the complaints, the threats, and the caresses of M. de Cobentzel. The First Consul roused his energy by numerous despatches. "You are forbidden," he wrote to him, "to admit of any discussion on the principle laid down in the ultimatum: the Rhine and the Adige. Stick to those two conditions as irrevocable. Hostilities shall not cease in Italy till Mantua is given up. If they begin again, the thalweg of the Adige shall be carried back to the Julian Alps, and Austria shall be excluded from Italy. If Austria," added the First Consul, "should talk of her friendship and her alliance, reply that those who have just shown themselves so attached to the English alliance cannot care about ours. Assume, in negotiating, the attitude of General Moreau, and force M. de Cobentzel to play the part of the Archduke John."

At length, after a further resistance of several days, intelligence more and more alarming every moment arriving from the banks of the Mincio—it must not be forgotten that hostilities continued in Lombardy longer than in Germany—M. de Cobentzel consented, on the 15th of January, 1801—25th Nivôse—that the Adige should be adopted for the boundary of the possessions of Austria in Italy. He ceased to mention the Duke of Modena, but renewed the formal demand of the reinstatement of the Duke of Tuscany in his dominions. He consented further to declare that the peace of the empire should be signed at Lunéville, but after the emperor should have obtained powers from the Germanic Diet. In the same protocol, this plenipotentiary again claimed an armistice for Italy, but without assenting to the condition which France attached to it—the immediate delivery of Mantua to our troops. His fear was, that after giving up this point d'appui, France would impose harder conditions; and alarming as the resumption of hostilities appeared to him, he would not yet part with this pledge.

This persevering firmness in defending his country in so difficult a situation was natural and honourable, but at last it became imprudent, and led to consequences which M. de Cobentzel had not foreseen.

The occurrences in the north contributed as much as the victories of our armies to augment the pretensions of the First Consul. He had hitherto sought anxiously for peace with Austria; in the first place, to have peace, and, in the next, to secure himself against one of those changes of humour so frequent in the Emperor Paul. For some months past, it is true, that prince had shown a keen resentment against Austria and England; but a manœuvre of the Austrian or English cabinet might bring back the Czar to the coalition, and then France would again have all Europe upon her hands. It was this apprehension which had induced the First Consul to brave the inconveniences of a winter campaign, in order to crush Austria while she was deprived of the support of the forces of the continent. The turn which events had recently taken in the north having relieved him from all fear on this head, he had become at once more patient and more exacting. Paul, in fact, had formally broken with his late allies, and thrown himself completely into the arms of France, with that warmth which he showed in all his actions. Strongly disposed to this line of conduct by the effect produced upon his mind by the victory of Marengo, by the restitution of the Russian prisoners, by the offer of the island of Malta, lastly, by the adroit and delicate flatteries of the First Consul, he had been definitively decided by a recent event. It will be recollected that the First Consul, despairing of saving Malta, strictly blockaded by the English, had conceived the happy idea of offering that island to Paul I.; that this prince had received that offer with transport; that he had commissioned M. de Sprengporten to go to Paris, to thank the head of the French government, to receive the Russian prisoners, and to conduct them to Malta, to form its garrison. But in the mean time, General Vaubois, reduced to the last extremity, had been compelled to surrender the island to the English. This event, which, under any other circumstances, must have mortified the First Consul, grieved him but little. "I have lost Malta," said he, "but I have put an apple of discord into the hands of my enemies." Paul hastened to claim from England the seat of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem; but the British cabinet, instead of giving it up, replied by a flat refusal. Paul was enraged beyond measure. He laid an embargo on the English shipping, caused so many as three hundred of their vessels at once to be seized in the ports of Russia, and even ordered such as endeavoured to escape to be sunk. This circumstance, added to the quarrel of the neutrals noticed above, could not fail to produce a war. The czar put himself at the head of this quarrel, calling to his aid Sweden, Denmark, and even Prussia, and proposing to them to renew the league of maritime neutrality of 1780. He invited the king of Sweden to repair to St. Petersburg, to confer with him on this important subject. Gustavus went thither, and was magnificently entertained. Paul, full of the mania with which he was possessed, held at St. Petersburg a grand chapter of Malta, admitted as knights the King of Sweden and all the personages who accompanied him, and conferred most lavishly the honours of the Order. But he did something more serious—he immediately renewed the league of 1780. On the 26th of December, a declaration was signed by the ministers of Russia, Sweden, and Denmark, by which those three maritime powers engaged to maintain even by arms, the principles of the law of neutrals. They specified all these principles in their declaration, without omitting one of those which we have mentioned, and which France had just induced America to recognise. The

be and themselves, moreover, to unite their forces, and to direct them in common against any power whatever that should violate the rights which they alleged to belong to them. Denmark, though extremely zealous for the interests of the neutrals, would have been glad not to proceed so fast; but the ice defended her for three months, and she hoped that, before her waters were navigable, England would have given way, or at least that the preparations of the neutrals of the Baltic would be sufficient to prevent the British fleet from appearing before the Sound, as it had done in the month of August last. Prussia too, which would rather have negotiated than proceeded with such promptness, was hurried along like Sweden and Denmark, and gave her adhesion two days afterwards to the declaration of St. Petersburg.

These were important events, and insured to France the alliance of the whole north of Europe against England; but these were not all the diplomatic successes of the First Consul. The Emperor Paul had proposed to Prussia to concur with France in what was passing at Lunéville, and to agree to three of the bases of the general peace. Now, the tenour of the communications¹ of these two powers to our government, entirely coincided with those principles on which France had most insisted at Lunéville.

Prussia and Russia conceded the left bank of the Rhine, without dispute, to the French Republic; but they demanded an indemnity for the princes who lost portions of territory, but solely for the hereditary princes, and by means of the secularization of the Ecclesiastical States. This was precisely the principle which Austria repudiated, and which France proposed. Russia and Prussia demanded the independence of Holland, of Switzerland, of Piedmont and of Naples, which, at the moment, was in no way contrary to the designs of the First Consul. The Emperor Paul interfered in behalf of Naples and Piedmont, solely on account of the treaty of alliance concluded with those states in 1798, when it had been necessary to involve them in the second coalition war; but he meant to protect Naples only on condition that this court should break with England. As for Piedmont, he claimed but a slight indemnity for the cession of Savoy to France. He thought it right, and Prussia with him, that France should curb the ambition of Austria in Italy, and confine her within the boundary of the Adige. Paul became at last so ardent, that he proposed to the First Consul to form a close alliance with him against England, and to engage not to make peace with her until the restitution of Malta to the Order of St. John of Jerusalem. This was more than was desired by the First Consul, who was shy of such absolute engagements. Paul, wishing appearances to correspond with the real state of things, opened, instead of the clandestine communications between M. de Krudener and General Beurnonville in Berlin, a public negotiation in Paris itself. He accordingly appointed M. de Kalitscheff as plenipotentiary to treat ostensibly with the French cabinet. M. de Kalitscheff received orders to repair immediately to France. This negotiator was the bearer of a letter addressed to the First Consul, and, moreover, written by the Emperor Paul with his own hand. We already had M. de Sprengporten in Paris; we were now about to have M. de Kalitscheff: it was not possible to desire a more signal reconciliation of Russia with France.

Thus the face of things was changed in Europe, in the North as well as in the South. In the North, the maritime powers, at open war with England, sought to join with us against her, by absolute engagements. In the South, Spain was bound to us by the closest ties: she threatened Portugal, to compel her to break with Great Britain. Lastly, Austria, worsted in Germany and Italy, left by all the powers at our mercy, had nothing but the daring obstinacy of her negotiator at Lunéville to defend her.

These events, the fruits of the ability of the First Consul, followed each other in rapid succession in the first days of January. Prussia and Russia, in fact, manifested their desire for the peace of the Continent; and Paul,² with his own hand, apprized the First Consul of the mission of M. de Kalitscheff, at the very moment when M. de Cobentzel, giving way as to the boundary of the Adige, but obstinately standing out in regard to all the rest, refused the delivery of Mantua, as the price of an armistice in Italy.

The First Consul immediately wished to retard the progress of the negotiation at Lunéville. He directed instructions to be given to Joseph,³ and wrote to him, prescribing a new

¹ Letter of the King of Prussia of the 14th of January, communicated by M. de Lucchesini.

² PAUL I., Emperor of Russia, son of Peter III. and Catharine II., was born in 1754. His father would not acknowledge his legitimacy, but on the death of Ivan, in 1763, he became sole heir to the crown, and was placed under the care of the Counts Panin and Olinus. He married first a princess of Darmstadt, who soon died without issue, and after that a princess of Wirtemberg, by whom he had the Emperors Alexander and Nicholas, grand-dukes Constantine and Michael, and several daughters. In 1796, on the death of his mother, he ascended the throne. He joined the first coalition against Bonaparte, but the defeat of Zurich, and the artful management of Bonaparte, soon brought him round, and he shortly afterwards declared against England. His mind was soon found to be deranged, and he was murdered, as related above, on the 11th of March, 1801.—Encyclopedia Americana.

³ JOSEPH NAPOLEON BONAPARTE, the eldest of Napoleon's brothers, and the one in whom he placed most confidence, was born at Corte, in Corsica, on the 7th of January, 1768. On completing his studies at Autun, he was desirous of entering the army, but in compliance with the wishes of his father, he became a member of the departmental administration, under the presidency of Paoli. When Corsica fell into the possession of the English, he retired to the continent. At Marseilles he married Mademoiselle Clary, whose sister was the wife of Bernadotte. After the victory of Mondovi, Napoleon sent Joseph to Paris, to convince the Directory of the necessity of making peace with Sardinia. He succeeded, and was soon after made minister to Parma, and then ambassador at Rome. Returning from Rome, he entered the Council of Five Hundred, of which he was chosen secretary. Under the Consulate he was a member of the Council of State, and as such was one of the commission to terminate the differences then existing between France and the United States. It was while he was engaged in diplomatic pursuits, that he suggested the plan of union between several Christian powers, for the extinction of the corsairs of Barbary. In 1803 he was created a senator and grand officer of the Legion of Honour. In 1804 he was intrusted by his brother with command of the fourth regiment of Boulogne. When Napoleon ascended the throne, Joseph and his children were declared heirs to the crown, in case of the death of the emperor without issue. In the same year he was

line of conduct to our legation.¹ In a state of crisis, such as Europe was in at that time, he thought it inexpedient to be in a hurry. It was possible, in fact, that too much might have been ceded, or something stipulated, which might have run counter to the views of the northern courts. Anticipating, besides, that M. de Kalitscheff would arrive in a few days, he wished to see him, before he concluded definitively. Instructions were therefore transmitted to Joseph, to temporize for at least ten days, before he signed, and to require conditions still more stringent than the preceding.

Austria had consented to confine herself within the Adige. The construction which the First Consul now sought to put upon this was, that the Duke of Tuscany was not to remain in Italy, but should receive, like the Duke of Modena, an indemnity in Germany. His ultimate object was not to leave a single Austrian prince in Italy. To leave the Duke of Tuscany in Tuscany, was, in his views, equivalent to giving Leghorn to the English; to remove him to the Legations, was granting Austria a footing beyond the Po. In consequence, he adopted the idea, of transferring Tuscany to the house of Parma, as he had stipulated at Madrid; thereby converting Leghorn into a Spanish arsenal; and of thenceforth including the whole valley of the Po in the Cisalpine Republic; for, according to this plan, it would comprehend the Milanese, the Mantuan, Plaisance, Parma, Modena, and the Legations. Piedmont, at the entrance of that valley, would in future be but a vassal of France. Austria, limited by the Adige, would be thrown to one extremity of Italy; Rome and Naples confined to the other extremity; France, with Tuscany and the Cisalpine for her advanced posts, would control and sway that superb country. Joseph Bonaparte was therefore directed by his new instructions to require that the Duke of Tuscany should, like the Duke of Modena, be removed into Germany; that the scheme for the secularization of the Ecclesiastical States, should be realized to indemnify the hereditary German princes, as well as the Italian princes, dispossessed by France; that the peace with the empire should be signed at the same time as the peace with Austria, without even waiting for the sanction of the Diet; that nothing should be stipulated respecting Naples, Rome, and Piedmont, because France, though willing to preserve those states, desired first to arrange with them the conditions of their preservation; lastly, that Mantua should be delivered up to the French army, under threat of immediate renewal of hostilities.

offered the throne of Lombardy, which he declined. In 1802 he presided in the Senate, and administered the government. After the battle of Austerlitz, he was appointed to the command of the army destined to invade the kingdom of Naples, the capital of which he entered on the 15th of February, 1806. While making a tour, to inform himself of the condition and wants of the country, he was informed that the emperor had recognized him king. His reign in Naples is regarded by his biographers with unmingled satisfaction. He gathered about him the best and wisest men, and introduced important reforms into every department. He regenerated the nation, which was prosperous beyond all precedent, when he was called, against his will, to the throne of Spain. The events of his reign in Madrid will be narrated in the succeeding pages of this history. It was in Nothing is more usual, when a negotiation is still pending, when a treaty is not signed, nothing is more common than to modify the proposed conditions. The French cabinet, therefore, was quite justified in departing from its first conditions; but it must be confessed that, in this case, the alterations were abrupt and extensive.

M. de Cobentzel, by waiting too long, by demanding too much, by being wilfully blind to his real position, had lost the favourable moment. According to his custom, he complained bitterly, and threatened France with the desperation of Austria. He was, nevertheless, pressed to obtain the armistice for Italy, and made up his mind to concede Mantua; but he feared lest, after he had given up this bulwark, he should be at the mercy of France, and that fresh demands should be brought forward. In this frame of mind, he showed himself mistrustful and captious, and would not relinquish Mantua till at the last extremity. At length, on the 26th of January—6th Pluviôse,—he signed the surrender of that fortress to the French army, to obtain an armistice in Italy and a prolongation of the armistice in Germany. The negotiators immediately despatched couriers from Lunéville to the Adige, to prevent an effusion of blood, which was imminent.

Warm discussions ensued at the conferences, which were held at Lunéville, on the following days. M. de Cobentzel said that he had been promised the re-establishment of the grand-duke, on the very day that he had consented to the boundary of the Adige. Joseph replied, that this was true, but that the re-establishment of this prince was to be granted in Germany; that every state availed itself of its present situation to treat more advantageously: that France, in acting thus, adopted the very principles expressed by M. de Thugut, in his letters of the preceding winter; that, moreover, the grand-duke, whose case was under discussion, would be in Tuscany, cut off from Austria and unsupported; that, in the Legations, on the contrary, he would be too well placed, as he would serve for a link between Austria, Rome, and Naples, that is to say, between the enemies of France—an arrangement to which France would never consent. The idea of placing him either in Tuscany or in the Legations should, therefore, be relinquished.

After vehement controversies, M. de Cobentzel seemed at last to consent that the indemnities for the grand-duke should be taken in Germany; but he would not admit the absolute principle of the secularization of the Ec-all respects most honourable to him. After the battle of Vittoria he returned to Paris, where the emperor left him with the title of his lieutenant. On the final overthrow of Napoleon at Waterloo, Joseph followed him to Rochefort, where it was their intention to embark for the United States. When he learned from Bertrand, afterward, the resolution of the emperor, he quitted France in an American vessel, and arrived in safety at New York. He purchased an estate near Bordentown, in New Jersey, where he lived many years, under the name of Count Surville, devoting his time to study and acts of benevolence. He returned to Europe after the last revolution in Paris, and died at Florence in 1844.

¹Letter dated 1st Pluviôse—21st January—(State Paper Office.)

eclesiastical States. The Ecclesiastical States were devoted to Austria, especially the three archbishop-electors of Treves, Cologne, and Mayence, whereas the hereditary princes, on the contrary, were often opposed to her interest in the Germanic Diet. Austria assented to the secularizations, understood in this way, that the small Ecclesiastical States should serve to indemnify not only the hereditary princes of Bavaria, Wurtemberg, and Orange, but the great ecclesiastical princes, such as the Archbishops of Treves, Cologne, and Mayence; for then her influence in Germany would have been in part maintained. Joseph Bonaparte had orders to make an obstinate opposition to this proposal. He was to admit the principle of secularizations solely for the benefit of the hereditary princes. Lastly, M. de Cobenzel would not sign the peace for the empire, without powers from the Diet. This refusal proceeded, according to him, from a reluctance to violate forms; but in reality from an unwillingness to render too evident the part usually played by Austria in regard to the members of the Germanic body, a part which consisted in compromising them with France, whenever it was to the interest of Austria to do so, and afterwards deserting them, when the war had been disastrous. In 1797, she had delivered Mayence to the French, a proceeding most severely censured by all Germany; and now, to sign for the empire, without powers from the Diet, seemed to M. de Cobenzel a new and very grievous act, to add to all the anterior acts with which the German princes reproached their sovereign. To these reasons Joseph Bonaparte replied, that it was easy to perceive the real motive of Austria; that she was afraid of committing herself with the Germanic body, but that it was not for France to heed such considerations; that, as to form, there was a precedent in the peace of Baden, signed by the emperor in 1714, without powers from the Diet; that, besides, the emperor was now only asked to sanction what the representatives of the empire had already assented to at Rastadt, that is to say, the cession of the left bank of the Rhine to France; and that his refusal would be a sorry service rendered to Germany, for the French armies would continue in the territories occupied by them, till peace was concluded with the empire; whereas, if the peace were common to all the German princes, the evacuation would immediately follow the ratifications.

These discussions lasted several days. M. de Cobenzel was, nevertheless, anxious to conclude. The French negotiator, on his side, though at first desirous to defer the signature of the treaty for a few days, being now apprized that M. de Kalitscheff would not arrive in Paris so soon as he was at first expected, saw no further advantage in temporizing: he too was desirous to bring matters to a close. Orders had, in fact, been given to the two plenipotentiaries to come to an agreement; and, to decide M. de Cobenzel, Joseph Bonaparte had been authorized to make one of those concessions, which, at the last moment, serve for a pretext to an exhausted negotiator for yielding with honour. The *thalweg*¹ of the Rhine was the limit assigned to France and Germany; consequently Düsseldorf, Ehrenbreitstein, Philipsburg, Kehl, Old Breisach, situated on the right bank, though attached to the left bank by many ties, were to be left to the Germanic Confederation. But Cassel, a suburb of Mayence, on the right bank, was a subject of dispute, for that suburb could scarcely be separated from the city itself. Joseph was authorized to cede Cassel, but on condition that it should be dismantled. Mayence would thus cease to be longer a fortified tête de pont, affording a passage at all times to the right bank of the Rhine.

The last conference was held on the 9th of February, 1801—20th Pluviôse, year IX. As it usually happens, the negotiators were never nearer to a rupture than when they were on the point of agreeing definitively. M. de Cobenzel warmly insisted on the maintenance of the Grand-duke of Tuscany in Italy; on the indemnity destined for the German princes, an indemnity which he wished to extend to the ecclesiastical princes of the first order; lastly, on the inconvenience of signing for the Germanic body, without having powers from the Diet. An article relative to the debts of Belgium also gave rise to great difficulties. On all these accounts he at last declared that he durst not conclude without referring to Vienna. Joseph thereupon replied that his government enjoined him to declare the negotiations at an end, unless they brought them to a termination before they broke up; he added that in the event of another campaign Austria would be thrown back beyond the Julian Alps. At length he ceded Cassel, besides all the fortified positions on the right bank, but on condition that France should demolish before she evacuated them, and that they should never be reconstructed.

Upon this concession, M. de Cobenzel yielded, and the treaty was signed on the 9th of February, 1801, at half-past five in the evening, to the great joy of Joseph, to the great grief of M. de Cobenzel, who, however, had nothing to reproach himself with; for, if he had endangered the interests of his court, it was because he had persisted in defending them too warmly.

Such was the celebrated treaty of Lunéville, which terminated the war of the second coalition, and for the second time conceded to France the left bank of the Rhine, with a commanding situation in Italy. The principal clauses were as follows.

The thalweg of the Rhine, from its exit out of the Helvetic territory to its entry into the Batavian territory, formed the boundary of France and Germany. Düsseldorf, Ehrenbreitstein, Cassel, Kehl, Philipsburg, Old Breisach, situated on the right bank, were left to Germany, but were first to be dismantled. The hereditary princes who suffered losses on the left bank were to be indemnified. No mention was made of the ecclesiastical princes or of the mode of fixing the indemnities; but it was perfectly understood that the whole or part of the ecclesiastical territories were to serve for the indemnities.

¹ The middle of the stream.—Translator

The emperor, at Lunéville as at Campo-Formio, ceded the Belgic provinces to France, as well as the small territories which he possessed on the left bank, such as the county of Falkenstein, and the Frickthal, which lay wedged in between Zurzach and Basle. He gave up, moreover, the Milanese to the Cisalpine. For these he obtained no other indemnity than the Venetian States as far as the Adige, which had been previously insured to him by the treaty of Campo-Formio. He lost the archbishopric of Salzburg, which had been promised him by a secret article of the same treaty. His house was, besides, deprived of Tuscany, which was ceded to the house of Parma. An indemnity in Germany was promised to the Duke of Tuscany. The promise of the Breisgau was still held out to the Duke of Modena.

The territorial distribution of Italy was thus settled on a much more advantageous basis for France than at the time of the treaty of Campo-Formio. Austria continued to have the Adige for her boundary; but Tuscany was taken from her house and given to a house dependent on France; the English were excluded from Leghorn; the whole valley of the Po, from the Sesia and the Tanaro to the Adriatic, belonged to the Cisalpine Republic, a dependent daughter of the French Republic; lastly, Piedmont, confined to the sources of the Po, was dependent on us. Thus, masters of Tuscany and the Cisalpine, we occupied all central Italy, and prevented Austria from giving a hand to Piedmont, the Holy See, and Naples.

By the first coalition, Austria had lost Belgium and Lombardy, besides Modena for her family. By the second, she lost the bishopric of Salzburg for herself, and Tuscany for her house, which placed her in a position somewhat inferior in Germany, but very inferior in Italy. This was certainly not too much for all the bloodshed, for all the efforts imposed upon France.

The principle of the secularizations was not explicitly but implicitly laid down, since it was promised to indemnify the hereditary princes without alluding to the ecclesiastical princes. Evidently the indemnity could not be demanded of any but the ecclesiastical princes themselves.

The peace was declared common to the Batavian, Helvetic, Cisalpine, and Ligurian Republics. Their independence was guaranteed: nothing was said concerning Naples, Piedmont, or the Holy See. These States were dependent on the pleasure of France, which, for the rest, was tied in regard to Piedmont and Naples, by the interest which the Emperor Paul took in behalf of those two courts, and in regard to the Holy See, by the religious plans of the First Consul.

The First Consul, however, as we have seen, had not thought fit to explain himself to any one relative to Piedmont. Displeased with the King of Sardinia, who gave up his ports to the English, he was desirous of keeping himself at liberty in regard to a territory situated so near to France and of such high importance to her.

The emperor signed the peace for himself as sovereign of the Austrian States, and for the whole Germanic body as Emperor of Germany. France promised secretly to use her influence with Prussia to dispose her to approve this mode of proceeding of the emperor's. The ratifications were to be exchanged in thirty days by Austria and by France. The French armies were not to evacuate Germany till the ratifications had been exchanged at Lunéville, but were to have evacuated it entirely a month after that exchange.

Here, as at Campo-Formio, the liberation of all persons confined for political offences was stipulated. It was agreed that the Italians, shut up in the prisons of Austria, particularly Moscati and Caprara, should be released. The First Consul had not ceased to insist on this act of humanity ever since the opening of the congress.

General Bonaparte had attained the supreme power on the 9th of November, 1799—18th Brumaire, year VIII.;—it was now the 9th of February, 1801—20th Pluviôse, year IX.;—consequently just fifteen months had elapsed, and France, partly reorganized at home, completely victorious abroad, was already at peace with the Continent, and in alliance with the North and the South of Europe against England. Spain was preparing to march against Portugal; the Queen of Naples had thrown herself at our feet; the court of Rome was negotiating in Paris the arrangement of religious affairs.

General Bellavène, appointed to carry the treaty, left Lunéville in the evening of the 9th of February, and arrived as an extraordinary courier in Paris. The treaty which he brought was immediately inserted entire in the Moniteur. Paris was suddenly illuminated; vehemence and general joy burst forth on all sides; and thanks without number were given to the First Consul for this happy result of his victories and his policy.

BOOK VIII.

INFERNAL MACHINE.

Plots against the Life of the First Consul—Carbon, St. Réjant, and Limoëlan, three Agents of Georges, form a Plan for destroying the First Consul by the Explosion of a Barrel of Gunpowder—Choice of the Rue St. Nicolas, and of the 3d Nivôse for the Execution of this Crime—The First Consul saved by the Dexterity of his Coachman—Sensation produced—The Crime attributed to the Revolutionists, and to the indulgence shown them by Fouché, the Minister—Animosity of the new Courtiers against that Minister—His Silence and Coolness—He discovers Part of the Truth and makes it known; but Measures are nevertheless taken against the Revolutionists—Irritation of the First Consul—Project of an arbitrary Measure—Deliberation on this Subject in the Council of State—After long Discussions, a Resolution is adopted for transporting a certain Number of Revolutionists without Trial—Some Resistance, but very faint, made to this arbitrary Act—Discussion whether it shall take place by a Law, or by a spontaneous Measure of the Government, referred only to the Senate, for the sake of Constitutionality—The latter Course adopted—Transportation decreed against one hundred and thirty alleged Terrorists—Fouché, who knew them to be innocent of the Attempt of the 3d Nivôse, consents, nevertheless, to the Measure which proscribes them—Discovery of the real Authors of the Infernal Machine—Execution of Carbon and St. Réjant—Unjust Condemnation of Topino Lebrun, Arena, &c.—Session of the Year IX.—French Manifestations of Opposition in the Tribunal—Institution of Special Tribunals for the Suppression of Robbery on the Highroads—Financial Statement of Ways and Means for the Years VI., VII., and VIII.—Budget of the Year IX.—Definitive Adjustment of the Public Debt—Rejection by the Tribunal, and Adoption by the Legislative Body, of this Plan of Finance—Sentiments of the First Consul—Continuation of his administrative Labours—Roads—Canal of St. Quentin—Bridges over the Seine—Works at the Simplon—The Monks of the Great St. Bernard established at the Simplon and at Mont Cenis.

WHILE the external position of France was daily becoming more brilliant, while Germany and Austria were treating for peace, while the northern powers were leaguings with us to resist the maritime pretensions of England, while Portugal and Naples were closing their ports against her, and while, in short, every thing was succeeding to the wish of a victorious and moderate government, her internal situation exhibited a spectacle, at times frightful, of the last convulsions of expiring parties. We have already seen, in spite of the prompt reorganization of the government, robbery infesting the highroads, and factions, in despair, attempting the assassination of the First Consul. These were the inevitable consequences of our past disunion. The men whom civil war had trained to crime, and who could no longer resign themselves to a peaceable and honest life, sought employment on the highways. The broken-down factions, despairing of overpowering the consular guard, attempted to destroy, by atrocious means, the invincible author of their defeat.

Robbery had increased on the approach of winter. It was impossible to travel the roads without running the risk of being plundered or murdered. The departments of Normandy, Anjou, Maine, Bretagne, and Poitou, were, as formerly, the theatres of these depredations. But the evil had spread. Several departments of the centre and the south, as those of the Tarn, la Lozère, the Aveyron, the Upper Garonne, l'Hérault, the Gard, the Ardèche, the Drôme, Vaucluse, the Bouches du Rhone, the Upper and Lower Alps, the Var, had been infested in their turn. In these departments the bands of robbers had been recruited by the assassins of the south, who, upon pretext of chastising Jacobins, murdered, for the purpose of robbing, the purchasers of national domains; by young men who would not submit to the conscription; and by some soldiers whom want had driven from the army of Liguria, during the cruel winter of 1799 and 1800. These wretched men, having once entered upon this criminal life, had taken a liking to it; and nothing but the force of arms and the severity of the laws could now divert them from those courses. They stopped the public conveyances; they kidnapped from their homes the purchasers of national domains, and frequently opulent landed proprietors also, carried them into the woods, as they did the Senator Clement de Ris, for example, whom they detained for twenty days, inflicted horrible tortures on their victims, sometimes burning their feet, till they had paid considerable sums for their ransom. They plundered more especially the public chests, and even seized the funds of the state at the houses of the collectors, upon pretext of making war upon the government. Vagabonds who, in these times of trouble, had left their homes to follow a wandering life, served them for scouts, by assuming the character of beggars in the towns. These wretches, picking up all sorts of information while engaged in begging, intimated to the robbers, their accomplices, what carriages to stop and what houses to plunder.

Small bodies of troops had been required to repress these bands. When any of them were taken, justice could not take its course, for the witnesses durst not give evidence, and the juries were afraid to convict. Extraordinary measures are always to be regretted, not so much on account of the severities attendant on them, as the shock which they give to the constitution of a country, especially when that constitution is new. But, in this case, measures of that kind were indispensable; for ordinary justice, after it had been tried, was found to be powerless. A bill (projet de loi) had been prepared for instituting special tribunals for the suppression of highway robbery. This bill, presented to the legislative body, which was then sitting, was violently attacked by the opposition. The First Consul, exempt from those scruples of legality which are felt only in times of quiet, and which, even when they happen to be petty or narrow, are at least a happy sign of respect for the authority of the law, the First Consul had not hesitated to have recourse to martial law till the plan under discussion should be adopted. As it was necessary to employ bodies of troops to suppress these bands of robbers, the government not being strong enough to cope with them, he thought that this situation might be assimilated to a state of real war, which authorized the application of the laws peculiar to the state of war. He formed several small corps, which scoured the infested departments, and were accompanied by military commissions. All the robbers taken in arms were tried within forty-eight hours and shot.

The horror excited by these villains was so great and so general, that nobody durst raise a doubt as to the regularity or the justice of these executions. Meanwhile, villains of another stamp were meditating the destruction of the consular government by different and still more atrocious means. While Demerville, Ceracchi, and Arena, were undergoing judicial examination, their adherents of the revolutionary party continued to form a thousand schemes, the one more insane than the other. They had planned the assassination of the First Consul in his box at the opera, and had scarcely dared, as we have seen, to grasp their daggers. Now, they were dreaming of something else. One day they proposed to excite a disturbance at the breaking up of one of the theatres, and to despatch the First Consul amidst the tumult; on another, to seize him on his way to Malmaison, and to murder him after they had carried him off. Like genuine declaimers at clubs, they talked of the schemes everywhere and aloud, so that the police was informed from hour to hour of each of their plans. But, while they talked incessantly, not one of them was bold enough to act. M. Fouché feared them but little, and yet watched them with continual attention. However, among their numerous devices, there was one more formidable than the rest, and which had roused the particular vigilance of the police. One Chevalier, a workman employed in the manufactories of arms established in Paris under the Convention, had been found at work upon a frightful machine. It was a barrel filled with powder and langrage, to which was adjusted a musket-barrel with a trigger. This machine was evidently destined to blow up the First Consul. The inventor was apprehended and thrown into prison. This new contrivance made some noise, and contributed greatly to keep all eyes fixed on those who were called Jacobins and Terrorists. Their reputation of 1793 caused them to be more feared than they deserved to be. The First Consul, as we have already said, participated in the error of the public respecting them; and, having continually to do with the revolutionary party, sometimes with honest men of that party dissatisfied with too rapid a reaction, sometimes with villains planning crimes which they no longer had the energy to commit, he laid the blame of every thing upon the Revolutionists, was angry with none but them, talked of punishing them alone. M. Fouché persisted, but to no purpose, in directing his attention to the Royalists. It would have required strong facts to change the opinion of the First Consul and that of the public on this subject. Unfortunately, atrocious facts were in course of preparation.

Georges, having returned from London to the Morbihan, was full of money, thanks to the English, and secretly directed the plunderers of the diligences. He had sent some of his cut-throats to Paris, for the purpose of murdering the First Consul. Among them were two men, named Limoëlan and St. Réjant, both practised in the horrors of the civil war, and the latter formerly a naval officer, having some knowledge of gunnery. To these two he added a third, called Carbon, a subordinate person, the worthy tool of those great criminals. Arriving in Paris one after another, towards the end of November—first days of Frimaire—they sought the surest means of killing the First Consul, and made more than one trial with air-guns in the neighbourhood of Paris. Fouché, the minister apprized of their presence and of their errand, had them closely watched. But, owing to the inefficiency of two agents employed to follow these men, he had lost sight of them. While the police was making every exertion to discover traces of them, these villains had buried themselves in profound obscurity. Without declaiming, like the Jacobins, or communicating their secret to any one, they prepared for an atrocious deed, which has been equalled but once, and in our own times. Chevalier's machine had suggested to them the idea of destroying the First Consul by means of a barrel of powder charged with langrage. They resolved to put this barrel into a small cart, and to place it in one of the narrow streets which then led to the Carrousel, and through which the First Consul very frequently passed in his carriage. They bought a horse and a cart, and hired a cart-house, passing themselves off for foreign traders. St. Réjant, who, as we have just said, was a naval officer and artilleryman, made the necessary experiments, went several times to the Carrousel, to see the First Consul's carriage leave the Tuileries, to calculate how long it took to reach the neighbouring streets, and to arrange every thing in such a manner that the barrel should explode at the right time. These three men chose, for the accomplishment of their plan, a day when the First Consul was to go to the Opera to hear Haydn's oratorio of "The Creation," which was to be performed for the first time. It was the 3d Nivôse—December 24th, 1800. They selected for the theatre of the crime the Rue St. Nicaise, which ran from the Carrousel to the Rue de Richelieu, and through which the First Consul was in the habit of passing very often. Several successive windings in this street must necessarily slacken the progress of the most expert driver. The day having arrived, Carbon, St. Réjant, and Limoëlan, drove their cart to the Rue St. Nicaise, and then separated. When St. Réjant was to set fire to the barrel of powder, the two others were to place themselves within sight of the Tuileries, and to come and give notice the moment they saw the First Consul's carriage make its appearance. St. Réjant had the barbarity to get a girl of fifteen to hold the horse harnessed to this horrible machine. For his part he kept himself in readiness to set fire to it.

At this very moment, the First Consul, fatigued with business, was hesitating about going to the Opera, but he suffered himself to be persuaded by the earnest solicitations of those about him, and set out from the Tuileries at a quarter past eight o'clock. He was accompanied by Generals Lannes, Berthier, and Lauriston, and escorted by a detachment of mounted grenadiers. Most fortunately these grenadiers followed, instead of preceding, the carriage. It arrived in the narrow part of the Rue St. Nicaise, without having been announced either by the detachment or by the accomplices. The latter never came to apprise St. Réjant. Fear had prevented their doing so, or perhaps they had not recognised the First Consul's carriage. St. Réjant himself did not perceive it till it was a little past the machine. He was violently jostled by one of the horseguards, but, not disconcerted, he set fire, and instantly took to flight. The First Consul's coachman, who was a capital whip, and usually drove his master with extreme rapidity, had had time to pass one of the turnings of the street, when the explosion was suddenly heard. The shock was tremendous: the carriage was nearly overturned: all the windows were broken, and the fronts of the neighbouring houses were shattered by the discharge. One of the horse-grenadiers was slightly wounded, and all the surrounding streets were instantly strewn with a great number of persons dead or dying. The First Consul and those who accompanied him, at first conceived that they had been fired at with grape; they stopped for a moment, soon learned the real state of the case, and pursued their way. The First Consul insisted on going to the opera. He appeared calm, unmoved, amidst the extraordinary agitation that prevailed in all parts of the house. It was reported that, in order to despatch him, banditti had blown up a whole quarter of Paris.

He stayed but a few moments at the opera, and returned immediately to the Tuileries, where, on the report of the attempt, an immense concourse had collected. His anger, which he had before repressed, then burst forth. "It is the Jacobins, the Terrorists," he exclaimed; "it is those wretches in permanent revolt, in bataillon carré against every government, it is the cut-throats of the 2d and 3d of September, the ringleaders of the 31st of May, the conspirators of Prairial; it is those villains who, to assassinate me, have not scrupled to sacrifice thousands of lives. I will do signal justice upon them." There was no need for an impulsion from so high a quarter to inflame the public opinion against the Revolutionists. Their exaggerated reputation, and their attempts for two or three months past, were such as to cause every possible crime to be attributed to them. In that saloon, thronged more especially by those who were anxious that their attachment should be remarked, there was soon but one cry against the Terrorists, as they were called. The numerous enemies of M. Fouché hastened to profit by the occasion, and to launch forth into invectives against him. His police, said they, sees nothing, allows any thing to be done; it shows a criminal indulgence towards the revolutionary party. This is owing to M. Fouché's fellow-feeling for his old accomplices. The life of the First Consul would no longer be safe in his hands. In a moment the animosity against that minister was at its height; that very evening it was asserted that he had been dismissed. As for M. Fouché, retiring into a corner of the saloon of the Tuileries, with a few persons who did not share the general excitement, he listened to the accusations preferred against him with the utmost composure. His air of incredulity inflamed still more the anger of his enemies. Still he would not disclose what he knew, for fear of marring the success of the researches that were on foot. But, recollecting the agents of Georges, dogged for some time by the police, and afterwards lost sight of, he did not hesitate in his own mind to impute the crime to them. Certain members of the Council of State would have addressed some observations to the First Consul, and expressed their doubts as to the real authors of the attempt in the Rue St. Nicaise: he flew into a violent passion. "I am not to be bamboozled," he exclaimed. "This is no attempt of Chouans or emigrants, or ci-devant nobles and priests. I know the authors; I shall be sure to get at them, and to inflict on them an exemplary punishment." While uttering these words, his speech was vehement, his gesture threatening. His flatterers applauded and excited that anger which should have been soothed, not inflamed, after the horrible events which had just agitated all around.

On the following day, the same scenes were repeated. According to a custom recently introduced, the Senate, the Legislative Body, the Tribunal, the Council of State, the judges, the administrative authorities, the staffs, waited upon the First Consul, to express their grief and indignation, sentiments sincerely and universally felt. Never, indeed, had such a thing been seen. The Revolution had familiarized men's minds with the cruelties of dominant factions, but not yet with the dark plots of vanquished parties. People were filled with surprise and dismay: they dreaded the repetition of these atrocious attempts, and asked each other in consternation what would become of France if the man who alone curbed these wretches were to be cut off. All the bodies of the state, admitted into the Tuileries, expressed ardent attachment to the hero-pacifier, who had promised to restore, and who was actually restoring, peace to the world. The terms of these addresses were common-place, but the sentiment which pervaded them all was not less genuine than profound. The First Consul replied to the municipal council: "I have been touched by the proofs of affection which the people of Paris have shown me on this occasion. I deserve them, because the only aim of my thoughts, of my actions, is to augment the prosperity and the glory of France. While those banditti confined themselves to direct attacks upon me, I could leave to the laws the task of punishing them; but, since they have just endangered part of the population of the capital by a crime unexampled in history, the punishment shall be equally speedy and terrible. Assure the people of Paris, in my name, that that handful of villains, whose crimes have gone far to dishonour liberty, shall soon be deprived of the power to do mischief."

Every one applauded these words of vengeance, for there was not a person but, for his own part, made use of similar expressions. Men of reflection anticipated with pain that the enraged lion might, perhaps, overleap the barrier of the laws; but the multitude called for punishment. In Paris, the agitation was extreme. The Royalists threw the guilt on the Revolutionists, and the Revolutionists on the Royalists. Both were equally sincere, for the crime remained a profound secret to all but its authors. Every one descended on the subject, and, according to his inclination to condemn one party rather than another, found reasons equally plausible for accusing the Royalists or the Revolutionists. The enemies of the Revolution, both old and new, said that the Terrorists alone could have devised so atrocious a scheme, and adduced, as a conclusive proof of their opinion, the machine of Chevalier, the gunsmith, recently discovered. Sagacious persons, on the contrary, who had steadfastly clung to the Revolution, asked why those highway robbers, those Chauffeurs, who committed so many crimes, who daily displayed an unparalleled refinement in cruelty, and who, in particular, had just carried off the senator Clement De Ris, why these men might not be the authors of the horrible explosion in the Rue St. Nicaise as well as the so-called Terrorists. It should moreover be borne in mind that persons of sedate minds could scarcely obtain a hearing at that moment, so deeply was public opinion agitated, and so strong was the tendency to condemn the revolutionary party. But, will it be believed? amidst the conflict of diverse imputations, there were men of both parties inconsiderate or perverse enough to hold a totally different language. Certain factious Royalists longed for the destruction of the First Consul at any rate, and adopting the general opinion which attributed the crime to the Terrorists, admired the atrocious energy, the profound secrecy, which had been required for the commission of such a deed. The Revolutionists, on the contrary, seemed almost to claim the merit for their party; and there were among them braggarts of crime, who had the culpable folly of being almost proud of the execrable act that was imputed to them. It is only in times of civil war that we meet with such levity and such unprincipled language, among men who would themselves be incapable of perpetrating the deeds which they dare to approve.

We may further add, that all who talked of this event were totally wrong. The minister Fouché alone suspected who were the real culprits.

While he was engaged in searching after them, everybody was asking what was to be done to prevent future attempts of the same kind. People were, at that time, so accustomed to violent measures, that they thought it almost natural to seize the men known to have been formerly Terrorists, and to treat them as they had treated their victims in '93. The two sections of the Council of State, to whose province this subject more particularly belonged, the sections of legislation and of the interior, assembled two days after the event, on the 26th of December,—5th Nivôse,—to inquire which of the various plans proposed was most admissible. As the bill (projet de loi) to institute special tribunals was then under discussion, it was suggested that two clauses should be added to it. The first instituting a military commission for the trial of crimes committed against the members of the government; the second investing the First Consul with authority to remove from Paris men whose presence in the capital should be deemed dangerous, and to punish them with transportation, if they should attempt to disregard such first exile.

After the preliminary investigation of this subject in the two sections of legislation and of the interior, the whole Council of State met under the presidency of the First Consul. M. Portalis¹ reported what had passed in the morning in the two sections, and submitted their propositions to the Council. The First Consul, out of temper, thought these propositions defective. A mere change of jurisdiction appeared to him totally inadequate to the circumstances. He was for apprehending the Jacobins en masse, shooting those who should be convicted of having had a hand in the crime, and transporting the others. But it was his wish to accomplish this by means of an extraordinary measure, in order to be more sure of the result. "The proceedings of a special tribunal," said he, "will be slow, and not reach the real criminals. Our business now is not to frame a system of judicial metaphysics. Metaphysical minds have ruined every thing in France for the last ten years. We must judge of the situation like statesmen, and apply a remedy to it like resolute men. What is the evil that annoys us? There are in France 10,000 scoundrels, spread over the whole country, who have persecuted all the honest people, and who are steeped in blood. All are not guilty in the same degree, far from it. Many are still open to repentance, and are not incorrigible criminals; but, while they see the head-quarters established in Paris, and the chiefs concocting plots with impunity, they retain hope, and keep up their spirits. Strike the chiefs boldly, and the soldiers will disperse. They will return to those occupations from which they were driven by a violent revolution; they will forget that stormy passage in their lives, and again become peaceable citizens. Honest men, who are now in constant fear, will take courage, and attach themselves to a government which has known how to protect them. There is no middle course; either we must pardon all, like Augustus, or vengeance, prompt, terrible, and proportionate to the crime must overtake them. As many of the guilty must be sacrificed as there have been victims. Fifteen or twenty of these villains must be shot, and 200 of them transported. By these means we shall rid the Republic of agitators who convulse it; we shall clear it of such sanguinary scum." At each suc-

J. E. M. PORTALIS, born at Beausset, minister of divine worship, grand officer of the Legion of Honour, &c. He was a lawyer before the Revolution, and was deputed by the department of Seine to the Council of Ancients in March, 1795, from which period he was in active public life.—Biographie Moderne N cessive sentence, the First Consul became more and more animated; and, nettled at the disapprobation even which he perceived in certain countenances, "I am," he exclaimed, "I am so convinced of the necessity and justice of a strong measure, to purify, and, at the same time, to quiet France, that I am ready to constitute myself sole judge, to have the culprits brought before me, to examine them, to try them, and to order sentence of condemnation to be executed. All France will applaud me, for it is not my own person that I here seek to avenge. My fortune, which has preserved me so often on the field of battle, will continue to preserve me. I think not of myself; I think of social order, which it is my mission to re-establish, and of the national honour, which it is my duty to purge from an abominable stain."

This scene petrified part of the Council of State with surprise and terror. Some members, sympathizing with the sincere but intemperate feelings of the First Consul, applauded his speech. A very decided majority discerned, with regret, in his words, the language which the Revolutionists had themselves held, when they proscribed thousands of victims. They, too, had said that the aristocrats endangered the Republic, that it was necessary to get rid of them by the most speedy and by the surest means, and that the public safety was worth a few sacrifices. The difference, to be sure, was great; for, instead of a bloodthirsty rabble, who, in their blind fury, at length took each other for aristocrats, and slaughtered one another, here was a man of genius, proceeding, with consistency and vigour, towards a noble aim, that of setting convulsed society to rights. Unfortunately, he endeavoured to succeed, not by the slow observance of rules, but by prompt and extraordinary means, like those which had been employed to overturn it. His good sense, his generous heart, and the horror of shedding blood, then prevalent, were guarantees against sanguinary executions; but, with the exception of actual bloodshed, he was disposed to resort to every severity towards those who were then denominated Jacobins and Terrorists.

Objections were raised in the Council of State, timidly, it is true, for the indignation universally excited by the crime of the Rue St. Nicaise, checked the courage of those who would fain have made some resistance to arbitrary proceedings. However, one individual, who was not afraid to oppose the First Consul, and who did so bluntly, and in a straightforward way, Admiral Truguet,¹ seeing that the intention was to strike the Revolutionists en masse, raised doubts respecting the real authors of the crime. "Government," said he, "is desirous to get rid of the villains who disturb the Republic; well and good; but there are villains of more than one kind. The returned emigrants threaten the purchasers of the national domains; the Chouans infest the high roads; the re-instated priests inflame the passions of the people in the South; the public mind is poisoned by pamphlets" This last expression of Admiral Truguet had reference to the famous pamphlet of M. de Fontanes, to which we have before adverted. At these words, the First Consul, stung to the quick, and, advancing directly to the speaker, asked, "What pamphlets do you allude to?" "Pamphlets that are publicly circulated," replied Admiral Truguet. "Specify them," rejoined the First Consul. "You know them as well as I do," retorted this courageous man, who thus dared defy such indignation.

A scene like this had never yet been witnessed within the walls of the Council of State. The circumstances produced an outburst of the impetuous temper of the man who then held in his hands the destinies of France. He thereupon gave vent to his passion, and displayed all the eloquence of wrath. "Do people take us for children?" he exclaimed. "Do they think to hurry us away with these declamations against the emigrants, the Chouans, the priests? Because there are still some partial attempts in La Vendée, are we to be required, as formerly, to declare the country en danger? . . . Has France ever been in a more brilliant situation? have the finances ever been in a better state, the armies more victorious? has general peace ever been nearer at hand? If the Chouans commit crimes I will have them shot. But must I begin again by proscribing on account of the appellations of nobles, priests, or royalists? Must I send into exile ten thousand old men, who only desire to live peaceably, while paying respect to the established laws? Have you not seen poor ecclesiastics put to death in Bretagne, at the instigation of Georges himself, because he saw that they were gradually becoming reconciled to the government? Must I again proscribe on account of rank or title? Must I strike some because they are priests, others because they were formerly nobles? Do you not know, gentlemen, members of the Council, that, with the exception of two or three, you are all reputed Royalists? You, citizen Defermon, are you not taken for a partisan of the Bourbons? Must I send citizen Portalis to Sinnamary, citizen Devaisne to Madagascar, and then constitute myself a council à la Babouf? No, citizen Truguet, I am not to be deceived: we have none who threaten our quiet but the Septemberists. They would not spare even you, in vain you might tell them, that you had defended them to-day in the Council of State—they would sacrifice both you and me, as well as all your colleagues."

There was only one word to be said in reply to this vehement apostrophe, that it was not right to proscribe any person for a mere title, neither one party because they were styled Royalists, nor another party because they were Revolutionists. The First Consul had no which induced a request that he should be recalled. In 1799 he returned to Paris, and entered the Council of State in the section of Marine; and in 1803 he was appointed to the Brest squadron, in which he remained till Napoleon became Emperor, after which time he was without public employment.—Biographie Moderne.

¹ Son of a captain of the port of Toulon. Was first in the naval guard; in 1792 was rear-admiral at Toulon; and subsequently commanded a squadron which sacked the city of Onelle. Having survived the Reign of Terror, he was in 1793 appointed, by the Directory, minister of the Marine. In 1797 he went as ambassador to Madrid, where he was engaged in various intrigues.

sooner uttered his concluding words, than he rose abruptly, and put an end to the sitting.

Cambacérés, the consul, always calm, possessed infinite skill in obtaining, by gentleness, what his imperious colleague would fain extort by the sole power of his will. He assembled the two sections on the following day at his residence; he endeavoured, in a few words, to excuse the warmth of the First Consul, affirming, what was true, that he had no dislike to contradiction, when it was free from acrimony and personality; and he endeavoured to reconcile their minds to the idea of some extraordinary measure. This was not worthy of his accustomed moderation; but, though in the habit of giving prudent advice to the First Consul, he gave way when he saw that he was absolutely resolved, and especially when the point in discussion related to the curbing of the Terrorists. M. Portalis, who had the merit of being averse to proscribe any one, though he had been proscribed himself, adhered to the plan of the two sections, proposing to add two clauses to the law instituting the special tribunals. Cambacérés, however, insisted, and obtained a majority in favour of the adoption of an extraordinary measure, upon the understanding that it should be discussed afresh before the united sections. In this sort of meeting with closed doors, words again ran very high. M. Röderer inveighed vehemently against the Jacobins, imputed their crimes to the indulgence of M. Fouché, and went so far as to move that the Council of State should join in an address, praying for the dismissal of that minister.

M. Cambacérés repressed all these ebullitions of zeal, and convoked the sections at the apartments of General Bonaparte, in whose presence was held a sort of privy council, composed of the consuls, the two sections of the Interior and Legislation, and the ministers of Foreign affairs, of the Interior, and of Justice. So strong were the prejudices against M. Fouché, that he was not even summoned to these conferences.

The proposal of an extraordinary measure was again presented and discussed at great length. Several sittings of this same privy council were held before the members could agree. At length, it was resolved that a general measure should be adopted against those who were called the Terrorists. But a serious question yet remained to be settled; that was the form of that measure. The point to be decided was, whether that measure should be carried into execution by a spontaneous act of the government, or by means of a law. The First Consul, generally so bold, was in favour of a law. He was averse to compromise the great bodies of the state on this occasion, and this he declared openly. "The Consuls are irresponsible," said he, "but the ministers are not so, and any of them who sign such a resolution may some day be called to account. Not a single individual must be compromised; the Legislative Body must share in the responsibility of the proposed measure. The Consuls themselves," he added, "know not what may happen. As for myself, while I live, I am not afraid that any one will dare to call me to account for my actions. But I may be killed, and then I cannot answer for the safety of my two colleagues. It would be your turn to govern," said he, laughing, to the second consul Cambacérés, "and you are not very firm in the stirrups. It will be better to have a law for the present, as well as for the future."

A singular scene was passing at this moment. They who were averse to the measure, wished that it might be adopted, not by means of a law, but through a spontaneous resolution of the government. They were desirous to throw upon the government the entire responsibility, without perceiving that they were thus suffering it to acquire the mischievous habit of acting alone, and on its arbitrary authority. It was said, in support of this opinion, that the law would not pass, that opinions began to be divided respecting the real authors of the crime, that the Legislative Body would recoil from a proscription-list, and that the government would run the risk of incurring a most signal defeat. Messrs. Röderer and Regnault de St. Jean d'Angely expressed themselves to this effect. To the latter, the First Consul made this reply: "Since the Tribunate has rejected one or two laws, you are panic-struck. There are, it is true, some Jacobins in the Legislative Body, but not above ten or twelve at most. They frighten the others, who know that, but for me, but for the 18th of Brumaire, they would have been massacred. These latter will stand by me on this occasion; the law will pass."

The advocates of the other course persisted in their sentiments, and M. de Talleyrand, siding with those who were afraid of the bill being thrown out, suggested an argument most likely to make an impression on the First Consul, namely, that abroad the measure would have a more salutary effect. "Foreigners," he said, "would recognise in it the act of a government that dared, and was able to defend itself against the anarchists." The First Consul yielded to this argument, but he devised a middle course, which was adopted: this was, to refer it to the Senate, that this body might examine whether the act was, or was not, an infringement of the Constitution. The reader will, no doubt, recollect that, according to the Constitution of the year VIII., the Senate did not vote the laws, but was empowered to rescind them, if it deemed them contrary to the Constitution. It had not the same power with regard to the measures of the government. The suggestion of the First Consul was therefore approved, and M. Fouché was directed to make out a list of the principal Terrorists, with a view to their being transported to the deserts of the New World. The two sections of the Council of State were charged to draw up a declaration of the reasons for this act. The First Consul was to sign the decree, and the Senate to declare whether it was, or was not, contrary to the Constitution.

This measure against the Terrorists, illegal and arbitrary in itself, had not even the justice which an arbitrary act may sometimes carry with it, when it punishes those who are really guilty; for the Terrorists were not the authors of the crime. By this time, the truth began to be suspected. Fouché, the minister, and Dubois, prefect of police, had been incessantly engaged in the most active search, and this search had not been fruitless. The violence of the explosion had destroyed almost all the instruments of the crime. The girl, whom St. Réjant had employed to hold the horse, had been blown to pieces; nothing was left of the unfortunate creature, but her legs and feet. The iron tires of the cart-wheels had been thrown to a great distance. Fragments of the articles employed in the commission of the crime, and which were likely to lead to the discovery of the authors, had been found, at a great distance apart, in every direction. There were also left some remains of the cart, and the horse. These remains were collected, a description of them was drawn up, and made public through the newspapers, and all the horse-dealers in Paris were invited to inspect them. By a lucky chance, the original owner of the horse at once identified him, and gave the name of the seedsman to whom he had sold him. This seedsman, being summoned, declared with the utmost frankness all that he knew about the matter. He had sold the horse to two men, who represented themselves as foreign traders. He had had two or three interviews with them, and described them very minutely. A man who kept carriages for hire, and who had let for a few days the cart-house, in which the cart was deposited, made also a very circumstantial deposition. He described the same persons, and furnished particulars perfectly corresponding with those which had been received from the seedsman. The cooper who had sold the barrel, and who had put on the iron hoops, gave information agreeing entirely with the preceding accounts. All these depositions perfectly tallied as to the stature, features, dress, and appearance of the suspected individuals.

When all these witnesses had been heard, recourse was had to a decisive proof. Upwards of two hundred Revolutionists, apprehended on this occasion, were taken from prison and brought before them. These examinations lasted during the 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th of January—11th, 12th, 13th, and 14th Nivôse—and led to the conviction that not one of the Revolutionists was concerned in the crime, as not one was recognised. And no doubt could be entertained of the veracity of the witnesses who furnished these descriptions, for almost all of them had come forward spontaneously to give evidence, and manifested great zeal in seconding the efforts of the police. Thus, it was proved almost to a certainty that the Revolutionists were innocent. The fact, however, could not be perfectly established, unless by the discovery of the real authors. But an important circumstance pointed to the agents of Georges, who had been sent upwards of a month before to Paris, and who had always been considered by M. Fouché as really the guilty parties. Though all trace of them had been lost, yet down to the 3d Nivôse they had been seen, sometimes in one place, sometimes in another, though the police had not been able to apprehend them. But since the 3d Nivôse, they had entirely disappeared, so that one would almost have thought that they had concealed themselves under ground. This disappearance, so sudden and so complete, ever since the day of the crime, was a striking circumstance. Add to this, that one of the descriptions given by all the witnesses, corresponded in every point to that of Carbon. M. Fouché, more convinced than ever by all these indications, that the real authors were the Chouans, lost no time in despatching an emissary to watch Georges' motions, and to obtain information relative to Carbon, St. Réjant, and Limoëlan. In the mean time he had collected sufficient evidence to shake the conviction of many, and even that of the First Consul, who, nevertheless, would not relinquish his first opinion but upon the production of actual proof.

Such was the state of the proceedings on the 4th of January—24th Nivôse—the day on which the act that condemned so many men under the designation of Terrorists was definitively decreed.¹

The Council of State had successively come to an agreement upon all the points; it had never thought seriously of a tribunal which should try in a summary manner, and sentence the Terrorists to be shot; it had always stopped short at the idea of transporting a certain number of them; and, after many discussions, it was agreed that they should be transported, by virtue of an act of the Consuls, submitted to the approbation of the Senate. The affair having been arranged with the principal members of the Council and the Senate, the rest could be nothing but an empty formality.

M. Fouché, who, without knowing the whole truth, was nevertheless acquainted with it in part, and buffeted on all sides, had the weakness to lend himself to a measure, directed, it is true, against men stained with blood, but not the authors of the crime, which it was intended to punish at the moment. Of all those who participated in this act of proscription, he was therefore the most inexcusable; but he was attacked in all quarters; he was accused of complaisance towards the Revolutionists; and he had not the courage to resist. He himself drew up the report for the Council of State, on which the decree of the consuls was founded.

In this report, presented to the Council of State on the 1st of January, 1801—11th Nivôse—a class of men was denounced, who for ten years had steeped themselves in crime of every kind; who had shed the blood of the prisoners in the Abbaye, invaded and outraged the Convention, threatened the Directory, and who now, driven to despair, had recourse to the dagger, to strike the Republic in the person of the First Consul. "All these men," it was said, "have not taken up the dagger, but all are universally known to be capable of pointing and of using it." It was added that the protective forms of justice were not made for them; it was therefore proposed to seize, and to transport them from the territory of the Republic.

¹ I have compared the dates of all the documents in the case with the dates of the measures passed against the revolutionary party, and the result is, that between the 11th and the 14th Nivôse—the 1st and the 4th of January—only one thing was known, namely, that the personal examinations of the so-called Terrorists had not led to the identification of any one of them. Consequently, there were strong reasons for believing that the revolutionary party was not concerned in the crime of the Rue St. Nicolas; but this was not positively ascertained till much later, that is to say, till the 28th Nivôse—

18th of January—the day of the apprehension, and complete identification of Carbon by the sellers of the horse, cart, and barrel. The act against the Revolutionists is dated the 14th Nivôse—4th of January:—it is not true, therefore, as it has been sometimes asserted, that the proscription took place in spite of a perfect knowledge of the real authors of the crime, and that the government punished the Revolutionists, knowing them to be innocent. The procedure was at all events highly arbitrary; but it is our duty to state the facts as they occurred, without exaggeration or extenuation.

The examination of the report gave rise to the question, whether the Jacobins ought not to be denounced in it as the contrivers of the 3d Nivôse. The First Consul took great pains to oppose this. "We believe so," said he, "but we do not know it;"—(he began, in fact, to be shaken in his conviction)—"they are transported for the deeds of the 2d of September, of the 31st of May, of the days of Prairial, for Babœuf's conspiracy, for all that they have done, for all that they might yet do."

A list of 130 persons doomed to transportation was annexed to this report. The government did not confine itself to transporting them; but, what was perhaps more cruel, there was added to the names of several of them the appellation Septembriser, without any other ground for thus stigmatizing them than public notoriety.

The Council of State manifested a visible repugnance on hearing these 130 names; for it might be said that it was called upon to draw up a proscription list. Thibaudeau, the councillor, said that such a list could not be prepared by the Council. "I am not so silly," replied the First Consul, angrily, "as to make you pass sentence upon individuals; I merely submit to you the principle of the measure." The principle was approved, but not without some dissentient votes.

The question was then proposed, whether the measure should be an act of state police, on the part of the government, or a law passed in the accustomed forms. This point had been previously arranged: the resolutions already secretly adopted were confirmed, and it was decided that the measure should be a spontaneous act of the government, but referred to the Senate, which should pronounce upon the question of constitutionality.

On the 4th of January—14th Nivôse—the First Consul, having had the definitive list prepared, drew up a decree, by which he banished from the territory of the Republic the persons included in that list, and without hesitation affixed his signature.

On the 6th of January—15th Nivôse—the assembled Senate, proceeding a step further than the decision of the Council of State, declared that the resolution of the First Consul was a measure essential to the preservation of the Constitution.

These unfortunate persons were collected on the following day, and despatched to Nantes to be shipped and transported to distant countries. There were among them some deputies of the Convention, several members of the old Commune, all that remained of the murderers of September, and the notorious Rossignol, who had been general of the revolutionary army. Assuredly these men, at least most of them, deserved no sympathy; but all the forms of justice were violated in regard to them, and that which proves the danger of the violation of those sacred forms is, that many of the denunciations made by the police were disputed, and with a strong appearance of truth. It required some moral courage at the moment, to intercede on behalf of these proscripts; still there was some who, on the recommendation of bold men, were properly erased from the list of proscription, and spared at Nantes from the fatal embarkation. That an individual should be able to obtain, or fail in obtaining, the favour of government, according as he can command, or is unable to command, an influential recommendation, is a point to which I shall not advert; but that his exclusion from a proscription list should depend upon the accidental circumstance, whether he can or cannot find a courageous influential friend to interfere on his behalf, must shock every feeling of justice, and prove that when forms are violated, society is exposed to all the horrors of arbitrary rule. And yet this period was resplendent with glory; it was distinguished by a love of order, by an antipathy to blood. But the nation was emerging from the revolutionary chaos; it had no respect for rules; it found them inconvenient and insupportable. If ever this arbitrary act were canvassed, a single word was sufficient to justify it. Those wretches, it was said, were steeped in blood; they would wallow in it again, if they were allowed free scope; they are treated much better than they had treated their victims. And, certainly, if this act had many previous precedents at anterior epochs, in regard to the violation of forms, it was marked by two peculiar distinct features from the past: punishment fell mostly upon villains, and their blood was not shed. A miserable excuse, we admit, but which we must nevertheless urge in extenuation, to show that the year 1800 had nothing in common with the year '93.

While these unfortunate persons were on the road to Nantes, it was with the greatest difficulty that they were saved from the fury of the populace in all the towns through which they passed, so strongly was public feeling expressed against them. Under the dominion of this feeling, something still more deplorable occurred; this was the condemnation of Ceracchi, Arena, Demerville, and Topino Lebrun. It will be recollected that in the preceding October—Vendémiaire—these hot-headed men had entered into a plot for the assassination of the First Consul at the opera. But none of them had had the courage, nor perhaps even any decided intention, to assist in the execution of the plot. The police agents, sent in as spies amongst them, and to whom they gave daggers, urged them on to a degree of guilt, which before, perhaps, they had not contemplated. But at any rate, they did not make their appearance at the place fixed for the execution of their plot; and Ceracchi, the only one apprehended, in the opera-house, was not even armed with one of the daggers which had been distributed amongst them. They were declaimers, who certainly wished for the destruction of the First Consul, but would never have dared to consummate it. They were tried on the 9th of January—19th Nivôse—at the very moment when the events just related were occurring. Their counsel, aware of the fatal influence exercised upon the minds of the jury by the catastrophe of the 3d Nivôse, strove in vain to weaken it. That influence was irresistible upon the jury, which, of all tribunals, is that most swayed by public opinion, and which has the advantages and the inconveniences of that bias. Sentence of death was passed on four of these wretched men: these were Ceracchi, Arena, Demerville, and Topino Lebrun. The latter deserved some sympathy, and became a striking example of the cruel mutability of fortune during revolutions. This young Topino Lebrun was a painter of some talent, and a pupil of David. Participating in the extravagant ideas of the artists of the time, he had been a jurymen at the revolutionary tribunal, but had there shown himself far more merciful than his colleagues. He brought forward the advocate Chaveau Lagarde, the respectable defender of the victims of that time, who in vain gave evidence in favour of his humanity. Extraordinary change of fortune! the former jurymen of the revolutionary tribunal, now accused in his turn, calls to his assistance the former defender of the victims of that sanguinary tribunal! But this assistance, generously afforded, could not save him. The whole four, condemned on the 9th of January—19th Nivôse—were, after an unavailing appeal to the court of Cassation, executed on the 31st of the same month of January.

Meanwhile, the horrible mystery of the infernal machine was being gradually brought to light. M. Fouché had set agents to work about Georges, to make inquiries concerning Carbon, what had become of him, and where he lived. He had learned through this channel that Carbon had sisters residing in Paris, and he had also discovered their abode. The police searched it, and found a barrel of powder. They obtained, moreover, from Carbon's youngest sister, the address of the new lodging in which he had secreted himself. He was residing with very respectable persons, the Demoiselles de Cicé, sisters of M. de Cicé, formerly Archbishop of Bordeaux, and minister of justice. These ladies, taking him for a returned emigrant, whose passport was not in order, had procured him an asylum amongst a number of females, formerly nuns, who lived together in a remote quarter of Paris. These innocent women, who every day returned thanks to Heaven for the preservation of the First Consul, as they would have given themselves up for lost if he had fallen, had afforded a retreat, unconsciously, to one of his assassins. The police repaired thither on the 18th of January—28th Nivôse—and apprehended Carbon, together with all the persons who had admitted him into the house. He was confronted the same day with the witnesses previously examined, and fully identified. At first, he denied every thing, but at length confessed his participation in the crime, but an innocent participation, according to his account, for he asserted that he was not aware of the purpose for which the cart and the barrel were intended. He denounced Limodan and St. Réjant. Limodan had had time to make his escape to a foreign country, but St. Réjant, thrown down by the explosion, and half dead for some minutes, had only time and strength to change his lodging. An agent of Georges employed to attend on him, and who had been left at liberty, in hopes by tracking him to find St. Réjant, served to indicate his abode. On proceeding thither, the police found that he was still very ill from the effects of his wounds. He was soon confronted, identified, and convicted upon abundance of evidence, which left no room for doubt. Under his bed was found a letter to Georges, in which he related, with some ambiguity, the principal circumstances of the crime, and justified himself to his chief for his miscarriage. Carbon and St. Réjant were sent to the criminal tribunal, which soon sentenced these execrable assassins to the death they deserved.

When all these particulars were published, the obstinate accusers of the revolutionary party, and the complaisant defenders of the royalist party, were alike surprised and confounded. The enemies of M. Fouché, also, were disconcerted. The soundness of his judgment was acknowledged, and he was re-established in the favour of the First Consul. But he had furnished a weapon of which his enemies, with justice, took advantage. Since he was so sure of his point, said they, why did he suffer the Revolutionists to be proscribed? He deserved, indeed, this keen reproach. The First Consul, who was unconcerned about violated forms, and cared for nothing but the results obtained, manifested no regret. He thought that what was done, was well done in every respect; that he was rid of what he called "the staff of the Jacobins," and that the 3d Nivôse proved merely one thing—the necessity of watching the Royalists, as well as the Terrorists. "Fouché's opinion," said he, "was, after all, the only correct one; he is right: we must keep an eye on the returned emigrants, the Chonans, and all the members of that party."

This event greatly diminished the sympathy which had been felt for the Royalists, who had been complaisantly called the victims of terror; and likewise greatly diminished the animosity against the Revolutionists. M. Fouché had gained in credit, but not in esteem.

The painful feelings created by the employment of the machine, since named infernal, were soon dispelled by the joy produced by the peace of Lunéville. All days are not auspicious, even under the most prosperous governments. That of the Consulate had the unexampled advantage, that, if sad impressions took possession of the public mind one moment, they were dissipated the next, by some grand, new, unforeseen result. Occasional brief but mournful scenes, in which the First Consul was conspicuous as the saviour of France, which each faction was striving to undo, and these scenes followed by victories, treaties, and acts of reparation, which healed deep wounds, or restored public prosperity—such was the spectacle which was incessantly exhibited. General Bonaparte always emerged from them greater, dearer to France, more clearly destined for the supreme power.

The second session of the Legislative Body had commenced. It was engaged, at this moment, in the discussion and adoption of several laws, the principal of which—that of the special tribunals—was of no real importance, after what had just been done. But the opposition in the Tribunal opposed these laws against the government; this was sufficient to induce the latter to persevere in them. The first of them related to the archives of the Republic. It had become necessary, since the abolition of the ancient provinces had given up to neglect a great number of old title-deeds and documents, still either very useful, or very curious, to decide in what place these and other ancient records, such as laws, treaties, &c., should be deposited. This was a measure of order, devoid of all political bearing. The Tribunal voted against the law, and having, as usual, sent its three orators to the Legislative Body, obtained its rejection by a great majority. The Legislative Body, although strongly attached to the government, was, like assemblies thus devoted, sometimes jealous of showing its independence in measures of detail; and it could certainly do this without danger, in the discussion of a law, the object of which was to determine in what place, or places, certain ancient records and papers should be deposited.

The two assemblies had under their consideration, at the moment, a law more important than the preceding, but equally foreign to politics. It related to justices of peace, whose number had been found too great. Six thousand having been appointed at the time of their first institution, they had not answered the purpose for which they were created. In many districts, men capable of duly performing such functions were not to be found. They had failed in another point. It had been resolved to assign to them the judicial police; they had performed this duty very indifferently, and besides, the paternal and benevolent character of their jurisdiction had been, in a certain degree, impaired by it. The new plan of the government proposed two modifications relative to the justices of peace; in the first place, their reduction from 6000 to 2600; and, in the next, the transfer of the judicial police to other magistrates. The project was a reasonable one, and presented with excellent intentions; but it met with violent opposition in the Tribunal. Several members spoke against it, especially M. Benjamin Constant. It was, nevertheless, carried in the Tribunal by 59 votes against 32; and in the Legislative Body by 218 against 41.

Another law, more calculated to produce discussion, and of an entirely political nature, was presented at this period: this was the law which had for its object the institution of special tribunals. But this had lost its chief utility since the First Consul had appointed military commissions, to accompany the movable columns employed in the suppression of robbery; and especially since he had not hesi-tated to proscribe arbitrarily such Revolutionists as were deemed dangerous. These military commissions had already produced salutary effects. The judges in military uniform, who composed them, were not afraid of the accused: they encouraged the witnesses who were to give evidence, and frequently these witnesses were the very soldiers who had seized the banditti, and surprised them with arms in their hands. Prompt and vigorous justice, following the very active employment of force, had singularly contributed to re-establish safety on the roads. The deadly conflicts which had ensued with the escorts placed on the impériaux of the diligences soon intimidated the robbers. Attacks became less frequent, and security began again to prevail, thanks to the vigour of the government and of the tribunal, thanks also to the conclusion of the winter. The proposed law, therefore, was introduced when the evil was already abated; but it was beneficial, inasmuch as it imparted regularity to the military tribunals established on the high roads, and applied to highway robbery a permanent and perfectly legal measure of punishment. The projected organization was this:—

The special tribunals were to be composed of three ordinary judges, all of them members of the criminal tribunal, of three military officers, with two assessors, the latter chosen by the government, and duly qualified, by their standing at the bar, to act as judges. Thus the military members could not have a majority. The government was empowered to establish these tribunals in those departments where they might be thought useful. They were authorized to take cognisance of all crimes committed by armed bands on the high roads and in the country, of all outrages against the purchasers of national domains, and lastly, of murders attempted with premeditation against the heads of the government. This last clause comprehended such crimes as the infernal machine, the plot of Ceracchi, Arena, &c. The court of Cassation was empowered to decide in every case of disputed jurisdiction, all other business before the court being suspended. This institution was to be abolished, as a matter of right, two years after the general peace.

These tribunals were obnoxious to every objection which can attach to exceptional justice. But there was this to be urged in their favour, that never had society, convulsed to the very centre, required more prompt and more extraordinary measures for tranquillizing it. Under the pretext of an adherence to the Constitution, recourse was had to that article of it, which permitted the Legislative Body to suspend its provisions in the departments where that might be deemed necessary. The case of extraordinary jurisdictions was evidently comprehended in this clause; as the suspension of the Constitution necessarily led to the immediate establishment of martial law. Moreover, the discussion was altogether superfluous in a country, and at a time when 130 persons had just been proscribed without trial, and military commissions had been established in several departments, without eliciting the lightest murmur from public opinion. It must even be confessed that, as compared with these acts, the proposed law was a return to constitutional government. But it was vehemently, acrimoniously attacked by the usual opponents, Messrs. Daunou, Constant, Ginguéné, and others. In the Tribunal it passed by a majority of only 49 votes to 41. In the Legislative Body, the majority was much greater, for the bill obtained 192 votes against 88. But a minority of 88 votes exceeded the usual strength of the minority in that assembly, wholly devoted to the government. This great number of dissentient votes was attributed to a speech of M. Français, of Nantes, who addressed language perhaps a little too intemperate to the Legislative Body. "M. Français, of Nantes, has done right," said the First Consul to his colleagues, Cambacérés and Lebrun, who seemed to disapprove that speech; "it is better to have fewer votes, and to show that we feel insults and are determined not to put up with them."

The First Consul made use of still stronger language to a deputation of the Senate, which presented to him a resolution of that body. He expressed himself in the boldest manner, and on several occasions he plainly declared, that, if he was too much annoyed, that if people would endeavour to prevent him from restoring peace and order to France, he would rely upon the opinion which the country had of him, and govern by consular ordinances. His ascendancy increased every moment with success, his boldness with his ascendancy, and he was no longer at the pains of dissembling the extent of his designs.

He met with still stronger opposition on the questions of finance, which were the last discussed during this session. This was, nevertheless, the most meritorious work of the government, and more particularly owing to the personal intervention of the First Consul.

We have several times explained the means employed to insure the collection, and the regular payment into the treasury, of the revenues of the state. These means had been completely successful. In the year VIII. (1799—1800), there had been received 518,000,000,¹ which equalled the amount of the taxes for a whole year; for, in the budget, the expenditure and the receipts did not at that period exceed 500,000,000. Of these 518,000,000, a sum of 172,000,000 belonged to years V., VI., and VII., and 346,000,000 to the year VIII. Some items were still owing for those four years; it was necessary that they should be completely liquidated, in order that the year IX. (1800—1801), which was the current year, might at length proceed with perfect regularity. The income of the year IX. was sure to be adequate to the expenses, as the taxes would produce from 500,000,000 to 520,000,000; and this was sufficient to cover the expenses of the peace establishment. A system of annual accounts, distinguishing the income and expenditure for each twelve months had been introduced, and thenceforth the receipts of the year IX. were to be exclusively applied to the expenses of the year IX., and the receipts of the year X. to the expenses of the year X., and so on; provision was thus made for the future. But for the past, that is to say, for the years V., VI., VII., and VIII., there was a deficit to be made good. To this purpose, the daily receipts derived from the arrears of the contributions of those respective years were appropriated. But these arrears, which were chiefly owing by the landed proprietors, reduced them to a state of great depression. At the meeting of the councils-general of the departments, a meeting then held for the first time, eighty-seven councils-general out of one hundred and six complained of the excessive burden of the direct contributions. Government, therefore, had no alternative, as we have before observed, but to remit a part of the outstanding arrears, if it persevered in requiring, in future, the punctual payment of the whole tax. A law was proposed to authorize the local administrations to relieve the tax-payers who were too heavily assessed. This bill passed without opposition. But this would occasion a considerable deficiency appertaining to the years V., VI., VII., and VIII. This deficiency was estimated for the three years V., VI., VII., at 90,000,000, and for the year VIII., separately, at 30,000,000. The year VIII. (1799—1800) was kept distinct from the years V., VI., and VII., because the year VIII. belonged to the consulate.

It was necessary to decide how these deficits were to be met. There were national domains still undisposed of, to the extent of about 400,000,000; and it was here that the sound sense of the First Consul exercised the happiest influence on our financial system, and caused the best possible employment to be made of the public resources.

As the national domains were not always marketable, their value had repeatedly been received in anticipation, by means of a government paper, which had been issued under different denominations, and which was receivable in payment of these domains. Since the extinction of the assignats, this kind of paper was known by the name of rescriptions. In the course of the year VIII., some of these rescriptions had been negotiated at less ruinous rates than before, but still at too great a sacrifice to render it prudent to have recourse to them. These notes were negotiated at a loss from the very first day they were issued, soon fell into discredit, then passed into the hands of speculators, who, in this manner purchased the national domains for next to nothing. In this way a valuable resource had been wasted, to the great detriment of the state, and to the great advantage of stockjobbers. The remaining 400,000,000, if they could be saved from the disorder, by which so many other millions had been swallowed up, to this day, would soon acquire, with time and peace, a three or fourfold value. The First Consul was resolved not to squander them in the same way that several thousand millions had already been thrown away.

¹ These figures express francs, five of which are nearly equivalent to one dollar.

Immediate funds were nevertheless required. The First Consul endeavoured to obtain them by the emission of rentes (stock), which, since his accession, had already advanced considerably in value. They had risen from the price of ten and twelve, to that of twenty-five and thirty after Marengo, and above that of fifty, since the peace of Lunéville; it was asserted that they would rise as high as sixty at the general peace. At this rate, the government could begin to negotiate them, as there was less loss in selling rentes, than national domains. The First Consul, unwilling to open a loan, proposed to pay with rentes, certain creditors of the state, and to appropriate to the Sinking Fund an equivalent sum in landed property, which that fund would sell by and by, slowly and at its full value, so as to compensate in this manner for the augmentation about to be made to the public debt. Such was the principle of the laws of finance proposed this year.

The debts yet unpaid for the last three years of the Directory, V., VI., and VII., passed for bad debts. They were the remnant of the disgraceful contracts, to the amount of 600,000,000, made under the Directory. Upon commencing a new system, the government resolved to respect these debts, notwithstanding their origin and their nature. They amounted to a sum of about 90,000,000, but almost the whole being in the hands of speculators, they were at a discount of seventy-five per cent. in the market. It was proposed to pay them off by means of a stock bearing interest at the rate of three per cent. The total of these debts amounting to 90,000,000, it would require, at three per cent., 2,700,000 francs to meet the dividends. This stock, at the current price of the public funds, (say 30 to 33½) represented a real value of 27,000,000 or 30,000,000, and could not fail to represent one of 40,000,000 at least, in the eight or ten months which must elapse before the operation was completed. The debts intended to be paid, being at a discount of seventy-five per cent., and the capital of 90,000,000, of which they were composed, being thus reduced in reality to 22,000,000 or 23,000,000, much more would be paid for them than they were worth, if government granted a rente of 2,700,000 francs for them, since that rente, sold immediately, would have produced 27,000,000 or 30,000,000, and soon was likely to produce 40,000,000.

The debts of the year VIII. to be still liquidated, were of a totally different nature. They were contracted for services performed during the first year of the consular government, when order already prevailed in the administration. These services, rendered at a time when the distress was still great, had, it is true, been paid for at a very high rate; but it would have been derogatory to the honour of the consular government not to have faithfully kept these engagements, which were recently contracted, which had not been classed, like those of the Directory, among discredited paper, nor negotiated as such, and to have treated them in the same manner as those which belonged to the years V., VI., and VII. Government, therefore, did not hesitate to pay in full, and at its nominal value, the excess of the expenditure of the year VIII. It was now estimated at 60,000,000, but the receipt of arrears of the contributions of the year VIII. would reduce it to 30,000,000. It was resolved to pay a portion of it, 20,000,000, with a stock bearing interest at five per cent., which made 1,000,000 interest. We shall explain, presently, in what way the balance of 10,000,000 was provided for.

The income of the year IX. (1800—1801) seemed likely to meet the expenses, on the nearly certain hypothesis of a speedy termination of the war; for the continental peace concluded at Lunéville must soon lead to a maritime peace. The budget was not at that time voted a year in advance; it was voted in the same year, while the expenses were being incurred. The budget of the year IX., for instance, was presented and discussed in Ventôse, year IX., that is to say, the budget of 1801 in March, 1801. The expenditure and the receipts of this year were estimated at the moment at 415,000,000 (exclusively of the expenses of collection and various local services, which may be taken at 100,000,000 more, so that 415,000,000 must be taken at 515,000,000.) But the estimate of 415,000,000 for the expenditure and the receipts fell short of the truth, for then, as now, the real charges always exceeded the estimates. We shall even show, by and by, that the sum of 415,000,000, was increased to 500,000,000. Fortunately, the produce of the taxes exceeded the sum estimated, as well as the expenditure. This excess on both sides was certainly calculated upon; but fearing, erroneously by-the-by, that the surplus receipts would not cover the excess of the expenditure, government determined to secure a supplementary resource. Ten millions yet remained to be provided for, as we have just said, to complete the payments of the year VIII.; it was supposed that 20,000,000 would be required for the balance of the year IX.; thus 30,000,000 would have to be raised in two years. It was resolved to have recourse to a sale of national domains to that extent only. The sale of fifteen millions' worth of these domains might be effected with advantage and without confusion, in the course of each year. By placing this business in the hand of the commissioners of the Sinking Fund, who had already performed this duty with great ability, the government was sure to dispose of this portion of the domains of the state on advantageous terms. In this manner the previous accounts would be liquidated, and the present balanced. There was but one more operation requisite to render the organization of the finances of the state complete, and that was, the definitive regulation of the public debt.

The moment was come, in fact, for fixing its amount, for adjusting the resources of the Sinking Fund to the amount of the entire capital of the debt, and for applying to this object the 400,000,000 of national domains, which were still at the disposal of the state.

The public debt was just as it had been left

* "Rentes" signifies the annual dividend payable on stock: thus, 350 five per cent "rentes" (perpetual annuity of 350 francs) represents 5000 francs capital stock.—Translator.

by the bankruptcy declared by the Directory, but attributable to the Convention and the Constituent Assembly. One-third of this debt had been placed upon the Great Book: it was this portion which was called, in the language of the time, the Consolidated Third. Interest at five per cent. had been allowed on this third, saved from the bankruptcy. The amount of it inscribed in the Great Book was 37,000,000 (interest and not capital). A very considerable sum had still to be inscribed. Two-thirds had been mobilized, another expression of the time, that is to say, struck out of the Great Book, and declared receivable in payment of the national domains, so that, in point of fact, they were clearly assignats. A subsequent law had completed their depreciation, by restricting them to a single purpose, that of being received in payment exclusively for the buildings, and not for the lands or the woods, constituting part of the national possessions.

It was necessary to put an end to this state of things, and for that purpose to carry to the Great Book the remainder of the Consolidated Third, which the preceding government had deferred inscribing, that it might be dispensed from paying interest upon it. Justice and regularity in the finances demanded that an end should be put to this state of things. It was proposed to enter in the Great Book Consolidated Third to the extent of 1,500,000, but to bear interest only from the commencement of the year XII. This part of the debt, though the enjoyment of the income from it was postponed for two years, yet acquired immediately, from the mere circumstance of the inscription, a value nearly equal to the portions already inscribed; and a very high value was moreover conferred on all that remained of the Consolidated Third by this earnest of punctuality. There was a considerable amount left uninscribed, either in Consolidated Thirds, properly so called, or in debts of the emigrants, which the state had taken upon itself, in confiscating their property, or in debts of Belgium, which had been a condition of the conquest. Lastly, there were the mobilized two-thirds, now extremely depreciated, and which it was but just to afford the holders the means of realizing. An offer was made to convert them into Consolidated Third, funded at the rate of five francs stock for one hundred francs nominal capital. It was probable that the holders would eagerly accept this offer. It was proposed to create for this purpose 1,000,000 rentes, and if this first trial succeeded, it was anticipated that the entire value of the mobilized two-thirds would be soon absorbed. A fixed period was also appointed, after which the two-third bonds should no longer be receivable in payment of the national domains. At the expiration of this term, the domains purchased and not paid for were to revert unconditionally to the state.

It was calculated that the addition of the sum of 20,000,000 of rentes to the 37,000,000 of Consolidated Third already inscribed in the Great Book, would suffice to meet the balance of Consolidated Third still uninscribed, the mobilized two-thirds, the conversion of which was contemplated, and lastly, the debts of the emigrants and of Belgium. The national debt would accordingly comprise 57,000,000 perpetual rentes. In addition to that permanent charge there existed, however, 20,000,000 of life annuities, 19,000,000 of civil and religious pensions, (the latter paid to the clergy who had been dispossessed of their property,) and lastly, 30,000,000 of military pensions; thus, in all, 69,000,000 of terminable annuities, of which about 3,000,000 would annually fall in. There was reason, therefore, to hope, that in a few years, as the annuitants, pensioners, and others, died off, the saving under the head of life annuities would compensate for the successive augmentations which the perpetual debt would receive in consequence of new inscriptions in the Great Book. Consequently, the entire annual charge for interest on both branches of the debt, supposing provision to be made for all old claims, could not possibly exceed the sum of 100,000,000, about one-half of which consisted of perpetual rentes, and the other of terminable rentes. Our financial position then was this: a debt bearing 100,000,000 annual interest, and a budget exhibiting a total expenditure (interest on the debt included) of 500,000,000, with a clear net revenue of a like amount, after deduction of 100,000,000 for the costs of collection. This position was certainly far superior to that of England, which had an annual debt of nearly 500,000,000, with a revenue of 1,000,000,000 or 1,100,000,000. Add to this, that France still had left the resource of the indirect contributions, that is to say, taxes on liquors, tobacco, salt, &c., not yet re-established, and which were destined to furnish at a future period an immense revenue.

The First Consul was desirous of augmenting the resources of the Sinking Fund in proportion to the increase of the debt. He had decided upon the creation of rentes to the amount of 2,700,000 francs to wipe off the deficit of the years V., VI., and VII., of 1,000,000 for the deficit of the year VIII., and of several more millions for the inscription of the balance of the Consolidated Third, and for the conversion of the mobilized two-thirds, &c. He caused a capital of 90,000,000 in national domains, saleable at discretion, and applicable to the redemption of rentes to be assigned to the Sinking Fund. At the suggestion of the First Consul, there was moreover transferred to the Commissioners a rente of 5,400,000 francs belonging to the fund for public instruction; we shall presently see how this sum was made good.

By this arrangement, the national domains were preserved from being frittered away; for the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, disposing of them slowly, and at seasonable times, or keeping them, if it suited them, thus avoided the deplorable dilapidations which had formerly taken place. To secure the remainder with a greater degree of certainty, the First Consul resolved to apply a considerable portion of them to various other branches of service, in which he took great interest, such as public instruction and the maintenance of the invalids. Public instruction appeared to him the most important service of the state, that, in particular, for which an enlightened government like his, having a new society to found, ought to lose no time in providing. As for the invalid, that is to say, wounded soldiers, they formed, as it were, his family; they were the props of his power, the instruments of his glory: all his attention was due to them; he owed them at least some instalment of the thousand millions formerly promised by the Republic to the defenders of the country.

The First Consul did not like to see these important services dependent on the budget, on its fluctuations and contingencies. In consequence, he caused 120,000,000 worth of national domains to be allotted to public instruction, and 40,000,000 to the support of the Hospitals for the Invalids. Here was sufficient amply to endow the noble institution which he intended one day to devote to the education of the French youth, and wherewithal to endow also several similar hospitals upon the same footing as that which owes its origin to Louis XIV. Whether these assignments were or were not afterwards respected, it was for the moment 160,000,000 rescued from the improvident sales of public lands, and an annual relief for the budget. Thus of the 400,000,000 worth of national domains left, 10,000,000 were granted towards the expenditure of the year VIII., 20,000,000 for that of the year IX., 90,000,000 to the Sinking Fund, 120,000,000 to public instruction, 40,000,000 to the invalids. These formed a total sum of 280,000,000 out of 400,000,000, for which a useful employment was immediately found, without having recourse to the system of public sales. Out of this sum of 280,000,000, 10,000,000 only for the year VIII., and 20,000,000 for the year IX., were to be disposed of in the course of two years, which should not be attended with any inconvenience; the 90,000,000 assigned to the Sinking Fund were to be sold, but very slowly, when the fund should be in absolute want of money, perhaps not at all. The 120,000,000 for public instruction, the 40,000,000 for the invalids, were never to be offered for sale. Out of the total of 400,000,000, there would remain 120,000,000 disposable and unappropriated. In reality, only 30,000,000 out of the 400,000,000 were to be sold; the rest remained in trust for different branches of the services, or as a disposable reserve, with a certainty of soon increasing at least double or treble in value for the advantage of the state.

To sum up: the government availed itself of the revival of credit to substitute the expedient of the creation of rentes to that of the alienation of the national domains; it discharged by a very small portion of these domains, and by a creation of rentes, the deficiencies left unpaid in the years V., VI., VII., and VIII.; it completed the liquidation of the floating public debt, and insured the payment of the interest in a certain and regular manner. After having thus regulated old accounts, saved the remnant of the domains of the state, and fixed the amount of the debt, there would be an annual interest of 100,000,000, an ample Sinking Fund; and finally, a budget, with an equal income and expenditure of 500,000,000, exclusive of the costs of collection, or of 600,000,000, including those costs.

Such a distribution of the public property, conceived with not less equity than sound sense, ought to have met with general approbation. A violent opposition was nevertheless raised in the Tribunal. The 415,000,000 demanded for the current year, the year IX., were granted without difficulty; but the opposition complained that the budget was not voted a year in advance; an unfair reproach, for nothing was at that time arranged for such a mode of proceeding. It was not yet practised in England, and it was even a disputed point among financiers. The same opposition members complained of the regulation of the arrears being an act of bankruptcy towards the creditors of the years V., VI., and VII., whose debts were to be consolidated at three per cent. only, instead of five, as was the case with those of the year VIII. They found fault with the regulation of the debt for depriving the holders of the Consolidated Third of the interest of their stock for two years, since that interest was to commence only with the year XII. For these two complaints there was very little foundation; for, as we have seen, the creditors of the years V., VI., and VII., in obtaining a permanent rente of three per cent., received more than their debts were worth; and as for the portion of the Consolidated Third, the inscription of which was resolved upon, a great service was rendered to the holders by the mere circumstance of that inscription. If, in fact, that inscription had been deferred a year or two longer, as had been done by the preceding government, the holders would have been deprived, not only of the interest, but of the benefit of the definitive consolidation. To resume the process of that consolidation so long deferred, was of itself to place them in a much better position.

The Tribunal grew warm upon these trivial objections; paid no regard to the answers that were addressed to it; and rejected the plan of finance by a majority of fifty-six votes to thirty, in the sitting of the 19th of March—28th Ventôse. Some cries of "Vive la République!" were even raised in the tribunes, a circumstance which had not happened for a long time, and revived the remembrance of the tumultuous days of the Convention. On the motion of Messrs. Riouffe and Chauvelin, the president caused the tribunes to be cleared.

Two days later, on the 21st of March—30th Ventôse—the last day of the session of the year IX., the Legislative Body heard the discussion of the bill. Three tribunes were to attack, and three Councillors of State to defend it. M. Benjamin Constant was one of the three tribunes. He urged in a brilliant manner, the objections raised against the plan of the government. The Legislative Body, nevertheless, voted its adoption by a majority of 227 to 58. The First Consul ought to have been satisfied. But he knew not, neither did those about him know, that we ought to do good without being surprised, without being ruffled, by the injustice with which we are frequently repaid. And what man ever had so much glory as the First Consul, to compensate him for these attacks, so frivolous, so indiscreet! Besides, notwithstanding these attacks, the arrangements were excellent on the part of the government. The majority in the Legislative Body was five-sixths at least; and in the Tribunate, the vote of which decided nothing, it was two-thirds. There was nothing to be astonished at, little to cause alarm in such inconsiderable minorities. But, although the object of universal admiration, the man who then governed France could not endure the petty censures passed upon his administration. The time for a real representative government had not yet arrived: the opposition had not its principles, or its manners any more than the government itself. That which will completely portray the oppositionists of the Tribunate is, that the odious procedure against the Revolutionists did not elicit from them a single observation. They took advantage of the circumstance, of the act not having been referred to the Legislature, to remain silent on the subject. They declaimed on things that were of little importance or unobjectionable, and winked at the unpardonable infringement of all the rules of justice. Such, in almost all times, is the conduct of men, and of parties.

After all, the barren agitation of a few systematic oppositionists, mistaking the general movement of minds, and the exigencies of the time, produced little sensation. The public was wholly engrossed by the spectacle of the immense efforts which had achieved victory and a continental peace for France, and which were soon to procure for her a maritime peace also.

As we have observed several times, the First Consul, amidst his military and political occupations, never ceased to give his attention to roads, canals, bridges, to manufactures, and to commerce.

We have already described the wretched state of the roads, and the means employed by the First Consul to supply the insufficiency of the produce of the tolls. He had given orders for a thorough inquiry into this subject, but, as is mostly the case, the difficulty consisted much more in the want of money, than in the choice of a good system. He proceeded direct to the point, and in the budget of the year IX. he appropriated fresh sums out of the general funds of the treasury, for prosecuting the extraordinary repairs already begun. Canals were also the subject of conversation. Men's minds, disgusted with political agitations, gladly turned towards every thing that concerned industry and commerce. The canal now known by the name of the canal of St. Quentin, connecting the navigation of the Seine, and of the Oise, with that of the Somme and the Scheld, that is to say, connecting Belgium with France, had been abandoned. It had been found impossible to agree upon the mode of executing the cutting, which was to afford a passage, from the valley of the Oise, into those of the Somme and the Scheld. The engineers were divided in opinion. The First Consul went thither himself, heard what each had to say, decided the question, and decided it well. The cutting was determined upon, and continued in the best direction, the identical one which has succeeded. The population of St. Quentin received him with transport, and no sooner had he returned to Paris, than the inhabitants of the Seine Inferieure sent a deputation, to solicit him to grant them in their turn forty-eight hours of his time. He promised a speedy visit to Normandy. At his instigation, the erection of three new bridges in Paris over the Seine was decided upon, and intrusted to companies: these were, that fronting the Jardin des Plantes, and called the bridge of Austerlitz; that which unites the isle of the City, with the isle St. Louis; lastly, that which connects the Louvre with the palace of the Institute. He directed his attention, at the same time, to the road of the Simplon, the first project of his youth—a project ever dearest to his heart, most worthy to rank, in future, beside the exploits of Rivoli and Marengo. It will be recollected, that the First Consul, as soon as he had founded the Cisalpine Republic, was desirous to connect it with France by a road, which, running from Lyons or Dijon, passing through Geneva, traversing the Valais, descending to the Lago Maggiore and Milan, should enable an army of 50,000 men with 100 pieces of cannon to debouch at any time, in the heart of Upper Italy. For want of such a road, he had been obliged to cross the St. Bernard. Now that the Cisalpine Republic had been reconstituted at the congress of Lunéville, it was more than ever expedient to form a great military communication between Lombardy and France. The First Consul had immediately issued orders for the necessary works. General Turreau, whom we have seen descending the Little St. Bernard, with the legions of conscripts, while General Bonaparte was descending the Great St. Bernard with his seasoned troops, received orders to fix his head-quarters at Domo d'Ossola, at the very foot of the Simplon. This general was to protect the workmen, and his soldiers were to assist in the completion of the undertaking.

To this magnificent work the First Consul resolved to add another, in commemoration of the passage of the Alps. The monks of the Great St. Bernard had rendered important services to the French army. Supplied with some money, they had during ten days supported the strength of our soldiers with food and wine. The First Consul retained a deeply grateful recollection of those services. He resolved upon the establishment of two similar hospices, one on Mount Cenis, the other on the Simplon, both auxiliary to the convent of the Great St. Bernard. They were each to contain fifteen monks, and to receive from the Cisalpine Republic a considerable endowment in lands. That Republic could refuse nothing to its founder. But as that founder liked prompt execution in all things, he had the works necessary for the first establishment performed at the expense of France, that these useful undertakings might experience no delay. Thus magnificent roads and institutions, founded with a beneficence truly noble, were to attest to future ages the passage of the Alps by the modern Hannibal.

Concurrently with these grand and beneficent views, a subject of another kind engaged his attention, which was no less useful to the nation; that is the compilation of the Civil Code. The task of digesting this code, the First Consul had confided to several eminent lawyers, Messrs. Portalis, Tronchet,¹ and Bigot de Préameneu. Their labours were concluded, and the result had been communicated to the Court of Cassation, as well as to the twenty-nine tribunals of appeal, since called Royal courts. The opinions of the whole of the magistracy were thus collected, and the work was now about to be submitted to the Council of State, and gravely discussed under the presidency of the First Consul. It was proposed, that it should then be presented to the Legislative Body in the course of the ensuing session, that of the year X.

Ever ready to undertake great works, and at the same time to reward their authors munificently, the First Consul had just used his influence to raise M. Tronchet to the Senate. By this means, he conferred a distinction upon an eminent juriconsult, one of the compilers of the Civil Code, and, what was not a matter of indifference to him in a political point of view, the courageous defender of Louis XVI.

All things, therefore, were being organized at the same time, with the harmony which a comprehensive mind is capable of introducing into its works, with the rapidity which a resolute energy, an authority already punctually obeyed, is capable of imparting to them. The genius which accomplished these things was without doubt extraordinary; but, it must be confessed, the situation was as extraordinary as the genius. General Bonaparte had France and Europe to move, and victory for a lever; he had to digest all the codes of the French nation, but then at the same time all ranks were disposed to submit to his laws with implicit obedience; he had roads, canals, bridges to construct, and the necessary resources for these objects, at his undisputed disposal; he had even nations ready to furnish him with their treasures, the Italians, for example, who cheerfully contributed to the expense of opening the Simplon, and to the endowment of the Hospices raised on the summits of the Alps. Providence does nothing by halves. For every mighty task, she furnishes a great genius, and to every great genius, she assigns a mighty task.

BOOK IX.

NEUTRAL POWERS.

Sequel of the Negotiations with the Powers of Europe—Treaty with the Court of Naples—Exclusion of the English from the ports of the Two Sicilies, and Engagement entered into by the Neapolitan Government to receive a French Division at Otranto—Spain pledges herself to coöperate the Portuguese, to put an end to the English Trade on the Coasts of Portugal—Vast Naval Projects of the First Consul, for combining the Naval Forces of Spain, Holland, and France, to enable them to act in Concert—Means contemplated to assist Egypt—Admiral Ganteaume, at the Head of a Division, leaves Brest during a Gale of Wind, and proceeds to the Straits of Gibraltar on his Way to the Mouth of the Nile—General Coalition of all the Maritime Nations against England—Preparations of the Neutral Powers in the Baltic—Warlike Ardour of Paul I.—Distress in England—She is visited by a frightful Famine—Her Financial and Commercial Position before and since the War—Her Income and Expenditure both doubled—Unpopularity of Mr. Pitt—His Differences with George III., and Retirement from Office—The Addington Administration—England, in spite of her Embarrassments, faces the Storm, and despatches Admirals Nelson and Parker to the Baltic, to break up the Confederacy of the Neutral Powers—Plan conceived by Nelson and Parker—They determine upon forcing the Passage of the Sound—The Swedish Coast being badly defended, the English Fleet passes the Sound almost without difficulty, and appears before Copenhagen—Nelson's views are to attack the Danes, before proceeding to the Baltic—Description of the Position of Copenhagen, and Measures adopted to defend this important Maritime Position—Nelson executes a bold Manoeuvre, and succeeds in anchoring in the King's Channel, Broadside on to the Danish Fleet—Bloody Engagement—Gallantry of the Danes, and danger of Nelson—He sends a Flag of Truce to the Crown Prince of Denmark, and thereby obtains the Advantage of a Victory—Suspension of Hostilities for fourteen Weeks, during which the Death of Paul I. becomes known—Events which have taken place in Russia—Exasperation of the Russian Nobility against the Emperor Paul, and their Resolution to get rid of this Prince by any Means, even by Crime—Count Pahlen—His Character and Projects—His Conduct towards the Grand-Duke Alexander—The scheme of a forced Abdication made to conceal their Project of Assassination—Frightful Scene at the Palace (Michael) on the Night of the 23d of March—Tragic Death of Paul I.—Accession of Alexander—The Confederacy of the Neutral Powers dissolved by the Death of the Emperor Paul—Virtual Armistice in the Baltic—The First Consul endeavours, by offering Hanover to Prussia, to retain her in the League of the Neutrals—England, satisfied with having broken up this Confederacy by the Battle of Copenhagen, and with being rid of Paul I., seeks to improve the Opportunity offered, by treating with France, and redeeming the Errors of Mr. Pitt—The Addington Administration proposes Peace to the First Consul, through the Medium of Mr. Otto—This proposal accepted, and Opening of Negotiations between France and England at London—Peace becomes general both by Sea and Land—Progress of France since the 18th Brumaire.

Peace between the Emperor and the Empire having been concluded at Lunéville in February, 1801, the First Consul was impatient to secure the results of his policy. These were to conclude a peace with those continental states which had not yet been reconciled to the Republic, and to compel them to close their ports against England; to direct against the latter the combined strength of the neutral powers, and, in conjunction with them, to strike some decisive blow against the British trade and territory; and by this combination of means attain a maritime peace, without which the peace of the continent would be incomplete. Every thing proclaimed that these happy results could not long be delayed.

The Germanic diet had ratified the signature affixed by the emperor to the treaty of Luné-

¹ FR. DENIS TRONCHET, considered before the Revolution one of the luminaries of the Paris bar. In the States-General he was distinguished for his moderation. In the trial of Louis XVI. he was one of the defenders of the king. In 1800 he became a member of the Court of Cassation; in 1801 was called into the Conservative Senate; in 1803 was created a grand officer of the Legion of Honour; and died in 1806.

vile. There were no grounds for supposing that there would be any demur, as Austria possessed the power of influencing the Ecclesiastical States, the only dissidents opposed to the treaty. With respect to the secular princes as they were to be indemnified for their losses, from the territories proposed to be secularized, they had a strong interest in accelerating the acceptance of the condition stipulated between Austria and France. They were, moreover, under the influence of Prussia, which power France had induced to view favourably the proceedings at Lunéville. Besides all this, every one was anxious for peace, and was ready to contribute to promote it, even by sacrifices. Prussia alone, in ratifying the signature of the emperor, which he had granted without the authority of the Diet, appeared desirous to qualify her consent, in such a form as rather to assume the semblance of toleration, than that of approbation, thereby reserving for the future the rights of the empire. But this proposition of Prussia, which, at the same time that it ratified the treaty, implied an indirect censure on the emperor, was not supported by the majority. The treaty was ratified unconditionally in its original form, by a convocation of the 9th of March, 1801—18th Ventôse, year IX. The ratifications were exchanged at Paris on the 16th of March—25th Ventôse. There only remained to settle a plan of indemnifications, which was to be the subject of ulterior negotiations.

Peace was thus concluded with the greater part of Europe. It was, indeed, not yet signed with Russia, but we were, as will soon appear, engaged with her, and with the northern courts, in one great maritime coalition. There were, at the same moment, two Russian ministers at Paris: M. de Sprengporten, on the subject of the prisoners; M. de Kalitscheff for the adjustment of general affairs. The latter had just arrived in the early part of March—middle of Ventôse.

There still remained the courts of Naples and Portugal to coerce, in order to close the entire continent completely against England.

Murat was advancing towards Southern Italy with a chosen body of troops, which had been drawn from the camp at Amiens. Reinforced by several detachments supplied from the army of General Brune, he had proceeded as far as Foligno, with a view to compel the Court of Naples to yield to the will of France. Had it not been for the interest evinced by the Emperor of Russia in favour of this court, the First Consul would probably at once have granted to the House of Parma the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, with the view of depriving a hostile family of this fine territory. But the disposition manifested by the Emperor Paul, would not allow him to carry this idea into effect. He was desirous, moreover, to conciliate general opinion throughout Europe, and for this reason it was expedient to avoid, as much as possible, the overthrowing of the ancient kingdoms. He was then willing to grant peace to the Court of Naples, on the condition that she should come to a rupture with England. But to influence her to take this step was in the highest degree difficult of accomplishment. Murat advanced to the frontiers of the kingdom, taking care to avoid Rome, and lavishing upon the Pope the greatest demonstration of respect. The Court of Naples no longer resisted, but signed an armistice which contained a stipulation agreeable to the wishes of the First Consul, for the exclusion of the English from the ports of the Two Sicilies. Nevertheless, the armistice was only for the short term of thirty days; at the expiration of which, a definitive treaty of peace was to be signed.

The Marquis de Gallo, one of the negotiators at Campo-Formio, who boasted of his intimacy with the First Consul, and of having as much influence over him as M. de Cobentzel, had repaired to Paris. Confiding on these personal recommendations, he flattered himself that, under the protection of the Russian embassy, and at the instances of Austria, he should obtain the conditions desired by the Court of Naples, which were confined to a simple neutrality. These pretensions were ridiculous, inasmuch as this court, which had given the signal for the second coalition, which had waged against us an obstinate war, which had, in short, treated the French with great indignity, could not expect, now that we held her at our discretion, to escape upon the condition of a plain and simple separation from England. The least we could do, was to compel her, either willingly or by force, to act as hostilely against England as she had done against France.

M. de Gallo having betrayed considerable self-sufficiency at Paris, having even appeared to depend more than was becoming upon the Russian embassy, a prompt termination was put to his negotiation. M. de Talleyrand notified to him, that a French plenipotentiary had set out for Florence, that the negotiation was consequently transferred to that city, and that, moreover, he could not treat with a negotiator who had not the power to consent to the sole condition deemed indispensable, namely, the expulsion of the English from the ports of the Two Sicilies—a condition which the Emperor Paul had as much at heart as the First Consul himself. Consequently, M. de Gallo found it necessary to quit Paris without delay. We had, in fact, just despatched to Florence M. Alquier, who had been recalled from Madrid, at the period when Lucien Bonaparte was sent to Spain. M. Alquier was invested with full instructions and powers to negotiate.

This plenipotentiary repaired to Florence with the utmost haste, and found there Chevalier Micheroux, the same minister who signed the armistice with Murat, who had just received full powers from his court. The negotiations, transferred to that city, and carried on under the bayonets of the French army, no longer experienced the same difficulties as at Paris. A treaty of peace was signed on the 18th of March, 1801—27th Ventôse, year IX. The conditions may be pronounced moderate, if the situation of the court of Naples be compared with that of the French Republic. We permitted that branch of the house of Bourbon to retain the whole of its dominions, which were preserved to them in their full integrity

We only exacted an insignificant portion of territory which it possessed in the island of Elba. This was Porto Longone, and the surrounding district. The island of Elba, at that time, belonged partly to Tuscany, and partly to the Two Sicilies. The intention of the French Consul was to annex it entirely to France. An historian of these treaties has loudly inveighed against this alleged act of spoliation, as if it were not plainly the natural right of the victor. With the exception of this insignificant sacrifice, the court of Naples lost nothing. She bound herself to close her ports against the English, and to furnish France with three frigates, to be delivered over, ready armed, at Ancona. The First Consul destined these for Egypt; but the most important article of the treaty was secret. It stipulated that the Neapolitan government should receive a division of 12,000 to 15,000 French troops in the Gulf of Tarentum, and should victual them during the whole term of their occupying that station. The real intention of the French Consul, without any reservation, was to transport them to that spot, with a view to succour Egypt. At that station they would be half way on the route to Alexandria; a last article required the restitution of all the objects of art, which had been selected at Rome by the French, which were all packed up in cases, when the Neapolitan army penetrated into the Papal States in 1799, and which the court of Naples had seized, and appropriated to itself. An indemnity of 500,000 francs was granted to the French who had been pillaged or harassed by the marauding bands of Neapolitans.

Such were the terms of the treaty of Florence, which must be viewed as an act of clemency, when the previous conduct of the court of Naples is taken into consideration; but which was perfectly in accordance with the intentions of the First Consul, who was aiming exclusively at procuring the ports of the continent to be closed against England, and at securing advantageous positions, to enable him to keep up communications with Egypt.

Nothing was yet agreed upon with the Pope, whose plenipotentiary was still negotiating at Paris, upon the most important of all, the religious question. He was dissatisfied with the King of Piedmont, who had yielded up Sardinia to the English, and also with the Piedmontese, who had manifested dispositions but little friendly towards our troops. He was desirous, therefore, of freeing himself from any engagement respecting that important part of Italy.

Let us now turn to Spain and Portugal. Every thing proceeded favourably in that quarter. The court of Spain, delighted with the stipulations agreed upon at Lunéville, which secured Tuscany to the young Infant of Parma, with the title of king, appeared every day more and more devoted to the First Consul, and to his views. An unexpected event, the fall of M. d'Urquijo, far from injuring our relations, had only served to strengthen them. This was not at first anticipated, as M. d'Urquijo was in Spain a sort of revolutionist, from whom a greater degree of favour was expected towards France, than from any other individual. But the result proved this to be a misapprehension. M. d'Urquijo had been at the head of affairs but a short time. Desirous of correcting certain abuses, he had induced his royal master, King Charles IV., to send an autograph letter to the Pope, recommending a series of propositions for the reform of the Spanish clergy. The Pope, alarmed at perceiving a reforming spirit arising in Spain, appealed to the old Duke of Parma, brother to the queen, complaining of M. d'Urquijo, whom he stigmatized as a bad Catholic. This was sufficient to ruin M. d'Urquijo in the mind of the king. The Prince of Peace, an avowed enemy of M. d'Urquijo, availed himself of the opportunity, and struck the last blow during a royal progress. Through these combined influences, M. d'Urquijo was stripped of power, and treated with an unexampled degree of harshness and severity. He was seized in his own house, and banished from Madrid, like a criminal of state. M. de Cevallos, a relative and creature of the Prince of Peace, was appointed his successor. This prince thus again became, from that moment, the real prime minister of the court of Spain. As he had sometimes shown some sort of opposition to an intimate alliance with France, probably in order to have an opportunity of thus throwing blame upon the Spanish ministry, it was feared that this change of ministers might be prejudicial to the designs of the First Consul. But Lucien Bonaparte, recently arrived at Madrid, forming at once a correct opinion of the actual state of things, neglected M. de Cevallos, a powerless subordinate, and put himself in direct relations with the Prince of Peace. He gave this prince to understand, that it was he who was considered at Paris as in reality prime minister of Charles IV., that to him would be ascribed all the difficulties which French policy might encounter in Spain, and that upon his own conduct would depend, whether we should regard him as a friend, or as an enemy. The Prince of Peace, who had provoked numberless animosities, and, above all, that of the heir-presumptive, deeply irritated with the state of oppression in which he was condemned to live, and conscious that his ruin was inevitable if the king and queen chanced to die, regarded the friendship of the Bonapartes as most precious, and promptly preferred their alliance to their hostility.

From that moment, business was conducted between the Prince of Peace and Lucien directly. M. d'Urquijo, finding himself too weak to bring this question of Portugal to a solution, had from time to time postponed any positive explanation on the subject. He had made France a thousand promises, unattended by any substantial results. The Prince of Peace admitted, in his interviews with Lucien, that up to that time they had not been inclined to act, that M. d'Urquijo had cajoled France with fine words; but he declared that he was ready, as far as regarded himself, to concert measures with the First Consul to act effectually against Portugal, provided they could come to an understanding upon certain points. He demanded first, the co-operation of a French division of 25,000 men, as Spain had it not in her power to raise a larger force than 20,000, to such a point of depression had that splendid monarchy been reduced. As the presence of a French force might alarm the king and queen, it would be necessary, therefore, in order to reassure them both, that this force should be placed under the command of a Spanish general. This general was to be the Prince of Peace himself. Finally, the provinces of Portugal, of which they were to take possession, were to remain as security in the hands of the king of Spain until a general peace: in the mean time, the ports of Portugal should be closed against England.

These proposals were accepted by the First Consul with the greatest eagerness, and returned in order to receive the sanction of king Charles IV. This prince, governed by his queen, who, in her turn, was under the influence of the Prince of Peace, consented to the war against his son-in-law, on condition that the latter should not be deprived of any portion of his territories; that he should be forced only to break with the English, and to enter into an alliance with France and Spain. These views did not coincide with those of the Prince of Peace, who was desirous, it was alleged at Madrid, to secure for himself a principality in Portugal. However this may be, he was obliged to submit, and he received accordingly the rank of generalissimo. A summons was sent to the court of Lisbon, to come to an explanation within a fortnight, and to make election between England and Spain, the latter supported by France. In the mean time, the preparations for war were commenced on both sides the Pyrenees. The Prince of Peace, now created generalissimo of the Spanish and French troops, carried off even the king's own guards, to enable him to complete his army. He amused the court with reviews, with warlike spectacles, and indulged in the wildest dreams of military glory. The First Consul, on his part, hastened to direct towards Spain a portion of the troops which were returning to France. He formed a division of 25,000 men, well armed and equipped. General Leclerc was appointed to the command of the advanced-guard. General Gouvion St. Cyr, whom he justly regarded as one of the most able generals of the time, was appointed to the command of the entire army, in order to compensate for the utter incapacity of the prince generalissimo.

It was arranged that these troops, set in motion in the month of March, should be ready to enter Spain in the course of the ensuing month of April.

The whole of Europe thus co-operated to aid our designs. Under the influence of the First Consul, the states of the south closed their ports against England, and the Northern States entered into an armed league against her. Under these circumstances, this power was under the necessity of having troops everywhere; in the Mediterranean, in order to blockade Egypt; in the straits of Gibraltar, to check the movements of the French fleets passing from one sea to the other; upon the coast of Portugal, to succour their threatened ally; before Rochfort and Brest, in order to blockade the great French and Spanish squadron which was ready to set sail; in the north, to keep the Baltic under control, and prevent the rising of the neutral powers; they were also necessary in India to maintain their authority and conquests in that quarter.

The First Consul was desirous of seizing this peculiar moment, when the British forces, required in all places at the same time, had their strength necessarily widely scattered, to attempt some great expedition. The principal object he had in view, that which he the most cherished, was to succour Egypt. He owed a great duty to the army led beyond the sea, and subsequently abandoned by him, in order to return to the assistance of France. He also considered the colony founded on the banks of the Nile as the most glorious of his works. It was of importance to prove to the world, that in transporting 36,000 men to the East, he had not yielded to the inspirations of a young and ardent imagination, but had attempted a serious enterprise, susceptible of being brought to a successful conclusion. We have seen the endeavours made to negotiate a naval armistice, the object of which was to permit six frigates to enter into the port of Alexandria. This armistice, it will be recollected, had not been concluded. Not having sufficient financial resources for the equipment of armaments by sea and land, the First Consul had not yet been able to undertake the vast operation which he had in contemplation to succour Egypt. But now, relieved from the continental contest, being able to direct all his resources towards naval warfare, having almost entirely the coasts of Europe at his disposal, he meditated, in order to preserve Egypt, projects as extensive, and as bold as those which he had executed to achieve its conquest. The winter season contributed to the success of his plans, by rendering the presence of the English cruisers on the coasts quite impossible.

In the mean time, vessels of every description, trading vessels, and ships of war from the smallest despatch-boat up to frigates, sailed from the various ports of Holland, France, Spain, Italy, and even from the coast of Barbary, carrying to Egypt, with news from France, provisions, European goods, wines, and munitions of war. Some of these vessels were captured, but the greater part reached Alexandria, and not a week elapsed without news from the government at home being received at Cairo, together with signal proofs of the interest which it took in the colony.

The First Consul also prepared a fleet adapted for the inland navigation of Egypt. He had executed a model of a seventy-four gun ship, which would combine great strength with the advantage of being able to navigate the shallow channels of Alexandria without discharging her guns.¹ Orders were given to build a certain number after this model.

Whilst he bestowed all this sedulous care to sustain the spirits of the army of Egypt, transmitting to it frequently news, with partial relief, the First Consul was, at the same time, preparing a vast expedition in order to convey thither, by one mighty effort, a powerful reinforcement of troops and materials of war. The armies returned to the soil of France were about to add a pressure on our finances; but, on the other hand, they supplied the government with great means to disquiet, perhaps to strike a blow at England. Thirty thousand men remaining in the Cisalpine; 10,000 in Piedmont; 6000 in Switzerland; 15,000 were proceeding to the gulf of Tarentum; 25,000 were directing their march towards Portugal; 25,000 were stationed in Holland: thus 111,000 men were to be supported by foreign powers. The remainder were about to be thrown on the French treasury, but nevertheless entirely at the disposal of the First Consul. A camp was forming in Holland; another in French Flanders; a third at Brest; a fourth was already collected in the Gironde, either destined for Portugal, or to furnish troops for embarkation at Rochefort. The corps returning from Italy assembled between Marseilles and Toulon. The division of 15,000 men appointed to the station in the gulf of Tarentum, was to occupy Otranto, in virtue of a secret article of the treaty of Naples, to cover the surrounding roadsteads by numerous batteries, to prepare a place of anchorage, where a fleet might approach and embark a division of 10,000 to 12,000 men in order to transport them to Egypt. Admiral Villeneuve had already set out to give the necessary orders on the spot for such embarkation.

¹ Letter dated 1st Nivôse, year IX.—Actes du Papier Officié.

The naval forces of Holland, France, and Spain, with some remains of the Italian navy, stationed near these several assemblages of troops, gave England reason to apprehend descents contemplated upon different points at the same time; upon Ireland, upon Portugal, upon Egypt, or upon the East Indies.

The First Consul had concerted measures with Spain and Holland, relating to the employment of their respective navies. By collecting the wrecks of the ancient Dutch navy, five ships of-the-line and a few frigates might be armed. Thirty vessels were lying at Brest, fifteen French, and as many Spanish, which had been detained two years in that harbour. The First Consul had made the following arrangements with Spain. Five Dutch ships combined with five French vessels, and five of the Spanish vessels lying at Brest, were to be despatched to Brazil, in order to protect that fine kingdom, and to prevent England from indemnifying herself for the enterprise set on foot against Portugal, by seizing on the Portuguese colonies. Twenty Spanish and French ships, according to the convention, were to remain at Brest, to be ready at any moment to throw an army into Ireland. A French division was preparing under Admiral Gauteaume, in the same port of Brest, destined, it was said, for St Domingo, there to re-establish the French and Spanish authority. Another French division was being equipped at Rochefort, and a Spanish division of five vessels at Ferrol, for the purpose of carrying troops to the West India Islands, and recovering Trinidad for instance, or Martinique. Spain, by the treaty which secured Tuscany to her in exchange for Louisiana, had engaged to furnish France with six vessels fully equipped, placed in the harbour of Cadiz, and to employ the resources of that ancient arsenal to reorganize a portion of the forces which she formerly possessed at that station.

The First Consul, in forming these arrangements, did not communicate to the Spanish government his real intentions, as he feared the indiscretion of that cabinet. He was desirous to send a portion of the combined fleets to Brazil, and to the West India Islands, to accomplish the avowed designs, and to attract thither the English fleets; but at Brest his paramount object was the expedition under Gauteaume, ostensibly destined for St. Domingo, but intended in reality for Egypt. He gave orders for the selection of seven of the fastest sailing ships of the squadron, with two frigates and a brig; and these vessels were to transport 5000 men to effect a landing, with an ample supply of warlike stores of all kinds, timber, iron, medicines, and a selection of European commodities most wanted in Egypt. The First Consul gave orders to re-land the cargoes of those vessels which were already in a very advanced state of loading, and to re-load them in conformity with the fresh arrangements which he had determined upon. He was anxious, in short, that each vessel should contain a complete assortment of every individual article prepared for the colony, and not an entire cargo of one single description of articles; so that in the case of one of the vessels being captured, the expedition would not be totally deficient of the precise article which the captured vessel might contain. This arrangement being contrary to the usage of the navy, rendered the stowage of these vessels more difficult, but the absolute will of the First Consul overcame all these obstacles. His aide-de-camp, Lauriston, was at Brest, seconding the written instructions of which he was the bearer by the influence of his presence, and by his urgent endeavours to expedite their departure. The expedition from Rochefort, ostensibly announced for the West India Islands, was also destined for Egypt. Its equipment was proceeding as rapidly as possible. The aide-de-camp Savary urged its departure, and drew thither a body of troops detached from the army of Portugal. The division of 25,000 men, which was about to pass the Pyrenees, being assembled in the Gironde, furnished convenient means for disguising the real object of the Rochefort expedition. Without exciting the least suspicion, a few battalions had been borrowed from this force with the intention of embarking them in this squadron. The expedition was to be confided to Admiral Bruix, perhaps the most distinguished naval commander whom France at that time possessed. This admiral united to a superior understanding, seldom found amongst either civil or military men, a perfect knowledge of naval affairs, and had distinguished himself by his successful and well-known cruise of 1799 in the Mediterranean. When, at the last moment, General Bonaparte should disclose his secret to the cabinet at Madrid, Admiral Bruix was to proceed to Ferrol, and, reinforced by the squadron lying at that place, repair to Cadiz, there to be joined by the division furnished by Spain, and then proceed onwards to Otranto, embark the troops collected at that point, and from thence set sail for Egypt. This division at Cadiz, furnished by Spain, was composed of six fine vessels which were being prepared in the greatest haste. Admiral Dumanoir had just set out post to Cadiz, in order to urge on their equipment. Companies of sailors were proceeding by, and towards this port. Small vessels, filled with seamen, were sent also at the same time, and these men, when transferred, helped to complete the crews of the vessels of war.

These numerous expeditions would inevitably attract the attention of England to all points at once, divide her forces, cause her infinite confusion, and some of them taking advantage of this confusion would be almost certain to reach Egypt. Desirous of availing himself of the bad season, which rendered the enemy's cruising off Brest both difficult and interrupted, the First Consul intended to make Admiral Ganteaume sail before spring. His orders to this effect were very precise; but it was not easy for him to inspire his naval commanders with the same spirit that animated the generals of his land forces. Admiral Ganteaume had seemed to him bold and successful, as it was he who had brought him almost miraculously from Alexandria to Fréjus. But in this opinion he was mistaken. This officer, an experienced seaman, perfectly acquainted with the navigation of the Levant, of undaunted bravery, was, nevertheless, of irresolute character, and incapable of sustaining the burden of a heavy responsibility. The expedition was ready for sea: several families of workmen were embarked, under the impression instilled into them, that they were bound to St. Domingo, but still they hesitated to put to sea. Savary, armed with the orders of the First Consul, overcame all the obstacles which presented themselves, and compelled Ganteaume to set sail. The enemy's cruisers descried them, and made signals to the blockading squadron that the French fleet was leaving the port, so that Ganteaume was under the necessity of returning to the anchorage in the outer road of Bertheaume. He then feigned to re-enter the inner roads, in order to induce the English to believe that his only object was to exercise his crews by performing these evolutions.

At last, on the 28d of January—3d Pluviôse—the enemy's cruisers being dispersed by a dreadful gale of wind, he set sail, and, in spite of the greatest dangers, happily succeeded in getting out of the port of Brest, and proceeded towards the straits of Gibraltar. The success of Ganteaume's enterprise was the more desirable, as the famous expedition consisting of 15,000 or 18,000 English, destined one day for Ferrol, and another day for Cadiz, or it might be the south of France, was at that moment on its way to Egypt. It was lying in the road of Macri, opposite the island of Rhodes, waiting the season for landing, and the completion of the preparations of the Turks.

Orders were issued to the journals of the capital to make no mention of the naval movements which might be remarked in the ports of France, unless the intelligence was derived from the Moniteur.*

Before we trace the operations of our squadrons in the south, we must revert to the north, and see what was passing between England and the neutral powers.

Great Britain was, at this moment, menaced by an accumulation of the greatest dangers. War had at length broken out between that government and the Baltic powers. The declaration of the neutrals, similar to that issued in 1780, being only a simple declaration of their rights, England might still have dissembled with them without construing this declaration, which was directed in a general manner to all the belligerent parties, as addressed especially to herself, and might have endeavoured, for the moment, to avoid any collision, by taking care to respect the Danish, Swedish, Prussian, and Russian flags. England had, in fact, much greater interest in maintaining peace with the northern powers of Europe, than in harassing the commerce of the smaller maritime powers trading with France. Moreover, her immediate want of foreign corn rendered even the freedom of the neutrals temporarily expedient. Strictly considered, she was only justified in making reprisals against Russia; inasmuch, as amongst all the members of the neutral league, the Emperor Paul was the only one who had added to the declaration the hostile act of an embargo on her vessels. Besides, the question of Malta was much more the motive of this measure, than were any of the contested points concerning maritime rights.

But England, in her pride, had met a simple exposition of principles by an act of violence, and had placed under embargo all the Russian, Swedish, and Danish vessels. She had only excepted from these rigorous proceedings the commerce of Prussia, towards which power she showed more moderation, in the hopes of detaching her from the confederacy, and moreover, because Hanover was at her mercy.

England, then, was actually at war at the same time with France and Spain, her ancient enemies, and with the courts of Russia, Sweden, and Prussia, her ancient allies; she had been abandoned by Austria, since the peace of Lunéville, and by the court of Naples since the treaty of Florence. Portugal, her last foothold on the continent, was about to be wrested from her. Her situation was precisely similar to that in which France was placed in 1793. She was reduced to struggle alone against all Europe, exposed, however, it is true, to fewer dangers than France, and entitled to less mercy for being able to defend herself, inasmuch as her insular position protected her from the peril of an invasion. But to render the parallel of their respective positions more remarkable and complete, England was a prey to a frightful famine. The people were in want of the enemy the slightest clue to the different movements which are taking place in our squadrons, unless the intelligence be derived from the official journal.

* Paris, 1st Ventôse, year IX.—(State Paper Office.)

† The following is a curious letter on this subject:—
“The First Consul to the Minister of General Police.
“Have the goodness, Citizen Minister, to address a short circular to the editors of the fourteen journals, forbidding the insertion of any article calculated to afford food of primary necessity. This state of things was entirely brought about by the obstinacy of Mr. Pitt, and by the genius of General Bonaparte. Mr. Pitt having refused to treat before Marengo, and General Bonaparte having disarmed one portion of Europe by his victories, and turned the other against England by means of his policy, were both incontestably the authors of this prodigious change of fortune.

The position of England was unquestionably most alarming, and we must acknowledge that at this critical juncture she did not give way to despondency. The harvest of the preceding year having been less by one-third than an average crop, all the preceding stock on hand had been consumed. The harvest of the year 1800 having again been deficient by one-fourth, the present scarcity had followed. This scarcity was doubly aggravated by the general war, and especially by the war with the maritime powers, since the supplies of grain were usually derived from the Baltic. If, therefore, the bad harvest was the primary cause of the famine, it is true that the war greatly tended to aggravate the calamity. Had it only raised the price of grain, by interposing impediments in the way of the Baltic trade, even then its influence upon the general distress must have been truly disastrous. The revenue presented this year the most alarming deficit. The income tax, customs, and excise gave apprehensions that there would be a deficiency in the revenue of 3,000,000*l.* to 4,000,000*l.* sterling. The expenditure of the year was enormous. To meet this it became necessary to borrow 25,000,000*l.* to 26,000,000*l.* sterling. The total expenses of the year for the three kingdoms, (Ireland having just become united by the act of union,) including the interest of the debt created by Mr. Pitt, were estimated at 69,000,000*l.* sterling, an enormous amount at any time, but the more so in 1800, as at that period the revenue had not been augmented to that considerable amount to which a subsequent interval of forty years has raised it in England and in all the countries of Europe. France, as we have stated, had only to support a burden of 600,000,000 francs (24,000,000*l.* sterling). The exact total of the English debt was, as usually, stoutly disputed; but, in taking only the statement of the government,¹ it amounted in capital to 484,365,474*l.* sterling. To meet the interest of the debt and the sinking fund, there was required annually a sum of 20,144,000*l.* sterling, without taking into account the debt of Ireland, or the loans guaranteed to the Emperor of Germany. Mr. Pitt was accused of having increased the debt, on account of the war of the Revolution, more than 300,000,000*l.* sterling. On the showing of the government the increase was 298,000,000*l.*

But we must say that England presented a most surprising improvement in every branch, and that her riches had augmented in the same proportion as her burdens. Besides the conquest of India, consummated by the destruction of Tippoo Saib; besides the conquest of a portion of the French, Spanish, and Dutch colonies, to which was just added the acquisition of the island of Malta, England had monopolized the commerce of the whole world. According to the official returns, the imports which had been in 1781, towards the close of the American war, 12,724,000*l.* sterling, and which, in 1792, at the breaking out of the war of the Revolution, were 19,659,000*l.* sterling, increased, in 1799, to 29,945,000*l.* The exports of English manufactured goods, which, in 1781, were 7,633,000*l.*, in 1792 were 42,905,000*l.*, and rose, in 1799, to 33,991,000*l.* Thus her foreign trade had tripled since the termination of the American war, and had nearly doubled since the war of the Revolution. In 1788, the English trade employed 13,827 vessels, and 107,925 seamen; it now, in 1801, employed 18,877 vessels, and 143,661 seamen. The excise and customs had risen from 7,320,000*l.* to 15,587,000*l.* The Sinking Fund, which was, in 1784, 1,000,000*l.*, had also increased, in 1800, to 5,500,000*l.*

The resources of the British empire had, then, all doubled or trebled during the preceding twenty years; and, if the pressure at the moment was great, there existed enormous wealth to meet it. England, it is true, was encumbered by a debt of more than 480,000,000*l.* with an annual charge of 20,000,000*l.* to meet the accruing interest; she had to meet, this year, an expenditure of 68,000,000*l.*, and to raise, by loan, 24,000,000*l.*, to meet her exigencies. All this was enormous, no doubt, if we, moreover, consider the value of money at the time; but England possessed resources within herself, proportionate to these demands. Although not a continental power, she had an army of 193,000 regular troops, 109,000 militia and fencibles, making a total of 302,000 men. She possessed 814 vessels of war, of all sizes, either in course of building or repairing, advance ships, or in commission at sea. In this number were included 100 ships of the line, and 200 frigates, under sail, in all quarters of the world; twenty ships of the line, and forty frigates in reserve, ready for sea. Her effective force then could not be estimated at less than 120 line-of-battle ships, and 250 frigates, manned by 120,000 seamen. In addition to this stupendous force, England possessed a number of naval officers of great merit, and, at their head, a renowned seaman in the person of Nelson. He was an eccentric, violent man, not fit to be intrusted with authority, in cases where diplomatic services were combined with his duties as a naval commander; and he had but recently given a proof of this at Naples, by allowing his name to be tarnished by the intrigues of women, during the bloody executions ordered by the Neapolitan government; but in the midst of danger he was a hero; and he displayed as much genius as courage; his country was justly proud of his glory.

England and France have filled the present age with the fame of their formidable rival exploits. The period at which we have now arrived in this recital, is one of the most remarkable during the struggle which they maintained against each other. They both had waged war during eight years. France, with financial resources far less vast, but perhaps more solid, inasmuch as they were founded upon a territorial revenue, with a population nearly double, with all the enthusiasm which a good cause inspires, had successfully resisted all Europe, had extended her territory to the Rhine, and to the Alps, had acquired the dominion over Italy, and a decisive influence on the continent. England, with the profits arising from the commerce of the whole world, with a powerful navy, had acquired a preponderance on the ocean, equal to that which France had acquired on land. England, by subsidizing the European powers, had incited them against her rival, had urged them to fight, even to their destruction. But whilst she exposed them to be crushed in her service, at the same time she seized upon the colonies of all nations, oppressed the powers which remained neutral, taking revenge, for the success of France on land, by an oppressive tyranny on the ocean; and, although victorious upon this element, she could not prevent France from creating a magnificent maritime station in Egypt, threatening even the British dominions in the East Indies.

¹ These amounts are taken from the budget presented to Parliament in June, 1801, by Mr. Adlington, successor to Mr. Pitt.

A strange revulsion of public opinion, as we have said elsewhere, resulted from this concatenation of events. France, admirably governed, appeared, in the eyes of the world, humane, wise, tranquil, evincing moderation in her victories—a combination of meritorious qualities as rare as they are admirable. Whilst the various cabinets were becoming reconciled to her, they perceived at once how they had all, till then, been the dupes of England's policy. Austria had been urged on to fight for the cause of England, as if she were struggling for her own existence. For this same England the Germanic empire had been dismembered. The powers of the north, with Russia at their head, discovered, at length, that under pretext of prosecuting a moral purpose, and contending against the French revolution, they had only contributed to procure for England the commerce of the whole universe. Thus the whole world at this moment turned against the mistress of the seas. Paul I. had given the signal with the accustomed impetuosity of his character. Sweden imitated his example without hesitation. Denmark and Prussia followed in the same steps, although with a less degree of resolution. Austria conquered, and now recovered from her delusions, digested her spleen in silence, and, for the moment, at least, gave signs of resisting, for a long period to come, the baneful influence of the British subsidies.

England reaped the fruits of the policy she had pursued; she had doubled her colonies, her commerce, her revenue, her navy; but she had also doubled her debt, her expenditure, her burdens, her enemies, and she presented a spectacle of immense wealth, with all the frightful misery attending a people dying from hunger. France, Spain, Russia, Prussia, Denmark, and Sweden, were leagued against her. France, Spain, and Holland united, possessed eighty ships, fully equipped, and were capable of arming a greater number. Sweden had twenty-eight, Russia thirty-five, Denmark twenty-three making a total together of 166 ships of the line—a force superior to that of the British navy. But England, on her side, enjoyed one great advantage, in having to contend with a coalition; moreover, her armaments surpassed, in effectiveness, those of the coalition. The French and Danish vessels were the only ones which could cope with theirs; and these found it difficult, when fighting in large squadrons, as the manœuvres of the English navy excelled all others in the world. Nevertheless, the danger was becoming imminent, for, if the struggle were prolonged, General Bonaparte was capable of undertaking some formidable expedition, and, if he succeeded in crossing the English channel with an invading army, England was lost.

The long-continued good fortune of Mr. Pitt, like that of M. de Thugut, was now on the wane, before the rising star of young General Bonaparte. Mr. Pitt had enjoyed the most brilliant destiny of his time, after that of the Great Frederick; he was only forty-three years of age, and had already held the reins of power, during seventeen years, a power almost absolute in a free country. But his fortune was declining with years, and that of General Bonaparte, on the contrary, was rising—it was just dawning. The fortunes of men succeed each other in the history of the world; like beings in the universe, they have their youth, their decrepitude, and their death. The incomparably more brilliant fortune of General Bonaparte was also destined one day to decline, but meanwhile it was reserved for it to witness the fall of the greatest statesman England ever had, sinking beneath its bright ascendant.

Great Britain seemed menaced by a sort of internal convulsion. The people, suffering from a frightful scarcity, were rising in different parts of the kingdom, pillaging the magnificent country seats of the English aristocracy and in the cities, plundering the bakers' shops and the provision warehouses. There were in London in 1801, as in Paris in 1792, misguided friends of the people, who incited proceedings against the alleged monopolists, and, in fact, insisted upon a measure which differed only in name from a maximum in the price of bread. Nevertheless, neither the government, nor the parliament appeared in the least degree disposed to yield to these senseless demands. The masses reproached Mr. Pitt with being the cause of all their present distresses; they alleged it was he, who, by loading the country with taxes, by doubling the debt, had raised the prices of articles of primary necessity to an exorbitant degree; that it was he, who, in persisting in prosecuting a mad war, in refusing to treat with France, had ended by turning all the maritime nations against England, and by depriving the English people of a supply of foreign grain from the Baltic, now become indispensable. The opposition, seeing, for the first time for seventeen years, Mr. Pitt's power shaken, redoubled their energy. Mr. Fox, who had so long absented himself from parliament, again resumed his seat. Sheridan, Tierney, Lords Grey and Holland, renewed their attacks, and (that which rarely happens in excited parties of an opposition) on this occasion, when contending with their political adversaries, they had right on their side. Mr. Pitt, in spite of his accustomed self-possession, had little in fact to urge in reply, when the question was asked, why he had not treated with France when the First Consul proposed peace before the battle of Marengo! Why, and that recently before Hohenlinden, why had he not consented, if not to a naval armistice which might have given the French a chance of maintaining themselves in Egypt, at least to the separate negotiation which they had proposed! Why had he so untowardly let slip the opportunity of securing the evacuation of Egypt, by refusing to ratify the convention of El Arisch? Why had he not temporized with the neutral powers in order to gain time with them? Why had he not imitated Lord North, who, in 1780, avoided answering a manifesto of maritime powers, by a declaration of war? Why had he thus drawn all Europe in array against England on account of doubtful questions of the law of nations upon which all countries entertained conflicting opinions, and which at the moment did not materially affect the interests of England? Why, with the view of preventing France from obtaining for her dockyards, timber, iron, and hemp, which were not sufficient to recruit its navy, why had he exposed England to be wholly deprived of foreign corn? Why, in short, had an English army been uselessly transported from Mahon to Ferrol, and from Ferrol to Cadiz, without any practical result? The opposition, contrasting the management of the affairs of England with that of the affairs of France, inquired of Mr. Pitt, with bitter irony, what he had to say of this young Bonaparte, of this rash youth, who, according to the ministerial language, was only doomed to enjoy a brief existence like his predecessors, so ephemeral that it did not entitle him to be treated with!

Mr. Pitt had great difficulty in maintaining his ground against Fox, Sheridan, and Tierney, Lords Grey and Holland, when, in the face of all England, he was pressed by these urgent questions, but became alarmed at the number of his enemies, and disconcerted at the clamour of a famished people, in vain demanding bread.

Mr. Pitt made but a feeble defence to all these reproaches. He constantly repeated his favourite argument, that if he had not made war, the English constitution would have perished; and he cited as examples, Venice, Naples, Piedmont, Switzerland, Holland, and the Ecclesiastical States of Germany, as if it could be believed that what had occurred to some third-rate Italian, or German powers, must necessarily have happened to powerful England, and to her liberal constitution. He replied, and on this occasion with more truth, that if France had greatly increased her territory by land, England had equally augmented her power by sea; that her navy was crowned with glory, that if her debts and her taxes had doubled, her riches had also doubled, and that all circumstances considered, England was more powerful at that moment than before the war. All this could not be disputed. Mr. Pitt added, moreover, that as the First Consul appeared to be more permanently established in authority, they were about to treat with him. But on the question of neutral rights he remained inflexible. "If England," said he, "subscribed to the doctrines laid down by the neutral powers, a small armed sloop would suffice to convoy the trade of the whole world. England would be precluded from taking any steps against the trade of her enemies, and she could no longer prevent Spain from receiving the precious metals of the New World, nor France from obtaining the naval munitions of war supplied by the North. We must," he exclaimed, "envelop ourselves in our own flag, and proudly find our grave in the deep, rather than admit the validity of such principles in the maritime code of nations."

Two sessions of parliament succeeded each other without any interval of repose. In November, 1800, the last meeting took place of what was called the Parliament of England and Scotland; in January, 1801, the united parliament of the three kingdoms assembled for the first time in virtue of the act which united Ireland with Great Britain. During these two sessions the most vehement discussions had been carried on without intermission. Mr. Pitt was visibly weakened, not as respected his numerical majority in the parliament, but as regarded his popular influence, and moral power out of doors. Every one felt that in persisting in making war against France, he had overshot the mark, and had missed, on the eve of Marengo as on that of Hohenlinden, the favourable opportunity of treating advantageously. To miss an opportunity is for a statesman, as well as for a military man, an irreparable misfortune. The moment for making peace once past, fortune turned against Mr. Pitt. He felt himself, and the people perceived that he was vanquished by the talents of young General Bonaparte.

We must, however, do him, and also England, the justice to acknowledge, that the measures adopted during this frightful scarcity were marked by great moderation. The proposal of a maximum was rejected. They went no further than to grant considerable bounties upon the importation of corn, to prohibit the use of grain in the distilleries, and to discontinue all parochial relief in money, lest it might raise the price of bread, affording, however, that relief in food, such as salted provisions, vegetables, &c. A royal proclamation was addressed to all classes in easy circumstances, and who had it in their power to vary their diet, urging them to use the utmost economy in the consumption of bread in their respective families. In addition to this they despatched numerous fleets to obtain rice in the East Indies, corn in America, and in the Mediterranean. They even endeavoured to procure it from France, by a contraband trade on the coast of Brittany and La Vendée.

Nevertheless, in the midst of this distress, which was borne with great fortitude, Mr. Pitt did not neglect the prosecution of the war, and he had made every arrangement for a bold expedition into the Baltic as soon as the season would permit. He was desirous to aim a blow first at Denmark and then at Sweden, and proceed even to the extremity of the gulf of Finland, with a view of menacing Russia. But it is not known even in his own country, whether he seriously wished to continue at the head of affairs in England. Two questions were constantly agitated by him in the cabinet, one of which, most inopportune at such a moment, led to his retirement. It has been seen, that after strenuous exertions made in the preceding year, he had obtained what is called the act of union with Ireland, that is to say the union of the parliaments of England, Scotland, and Ireland into one imperial legislature. This measure had appeared like a sort of party victory, especially in the face of the reiterated attempts of the French Republic to stir up an insurrection in Ireland. But they had only succeeded in stripping Ireland of her independence, by giving the Catholics a formal pledge that emancipation should be granted to them. The Catholics were told, that they never would obtain their enfranchisement, from the prejudices of the Irish parliament, which was undoubtedly true; but it appears that promises were actually made, amounting to a positive pledge, which must be considered as a serious political error, if it be true, that Mr. Pitt was bound, by the tenor of these engagements, to grant emancipation, or to retire. It was a pledge at that time impossible of performance. Be this as it may, in the month of February, 1801, at the opening of the first united parliament, Mr. Pitt asked the consent of George III. to an emancipation bill. The king, a staunch Protestant, conceived this to be an infringement of his coronation oath, and obstinately refused it. Mr. Pitt made another request, which was a most reasonable one, viz.: not to consider the occupation of Hanover, by Prussia, as an act of hostility, but to keep on terms with that power, in order to preserve at least one friendly relation on the continent. The sacrifice was too great for a prince of the house of Hanover. The dispute between the king and the minister grew warm, and on the 8th of February, 1801, Mr. Pitt, together with the majority of his colleagues, Messrs. Dundas and Windham, Lord Grenville, and others, tendered their resignation.

This resignation, after an administration of seventeen years, under circumstances so extraordinary, caused the greatest sensation. The people could not view it as arising out of natural circumstances, but ascribed secret motives to Mr. Pitt; and an opinion at that time took possession of the public mind, which historians have zealously perpetuated ever since, that Mr. Pitt, perceiving the necessity of a temporary peace, consented to stand aloof during a few months, in order to allow this peace to be brought about by others, rather than by himself, and then afterwards to return to the helm of affairs, when the political exigency of the moment should have been provided for. Such are the motives which the multitude generally ascribe to public men, and which ill-informed writers repeat as they have heard them. Mr. Pitt neither foresaw the peace of Amiens, nor its short duration, nor did he conceive, moreover, that peace was in compatible with his continuance in the ministry, as he had consented to the famed negotiations at Lille in 1797, and even recently he had selected Mr. Thomas Grenville to represent England at Lunéville. But Mr. Pitt had gone to great lengths with the Catholics; he had committed a blunder, of which public men are often guilty, that of sacrificing the interest of the future, to secure the advantages of the moment. Having promised too much, he felt all the embarrassment of not fulfilling those promises, and that in a critical state of parties, when a small accession of strength to his adversaries would suffice to overwhelm him. It is true that, subsequently, he denied positively, that he had ever given any distinct pledge respecting Catholic emancipation, and this denial was indeed wanting to defend him from such a charge of imprudence. Whatever opinion may be entertained on this point, there never was a period when the dangers of any country justified to the same degree, or even required, the postponement of solemn engagements; for in 1801, England was a prey to a famine within, while abroad, she was at war with the whole of Europe. Nevertheless, Mr. Pitt withdrew from office, and his retirement can only be regarded as the weakness of a superior mind. It is evident that, everywhere surrounded by fearful embarrassments, Mr. Pitt was not sorry to be relieved from his situation, under the honourable pretext of an inviolable fidelity to his own engagements. He sent in his resignation, to the great grief of the king, to the great dissatisfaction of the ministerial party, and to the great apprehension of all England, which viewed with alarming anxiety, a set of new and inexperienced men seize the helm of affairs at this critical juncture. Mr. Pitt caused himself to be succeeded by Mr. Addington, who was his creature, and had for many years past held the speakership of the House of Commons. Lord Hawkesbury, afterwards Lord Liverpool, succeeded Mr. Grenville at the Foreign office. They were moderate, prudent men, but of second-rate ability, both friends of Mr. Pitt, and for some time followed his advice. This it was which contributed, more than any other cause, to give currency to the report that the retirement of Mr. Pitt was ostensible rather than real.

The feeble intellect of George III. was unequal to bear the violence of the political crisis. He was seized with a fresh attack of insanity, and during a month was incapable of fulfilling the functions of royalty. Mr. Pitt had sent in his resignation. Mr. Addington and Lord Hawkesbury were the ministers appointed to succeed him, but had not yet received the seals of office. Mr. Pitt, although he had ceased to be minister, was still, in fact, King of England, during this crisis of nearly a month's duration, and was so by the consent of the whole nation. Explanations took place upon the subject in the House of Commons. They were of a very delicate nature; they were demanded by Mr. Sheridan, and given in noble, statesmanlike language by Mr. Pitt. The various motions, usually made in the English parliament, upon the state of the country, were postponed, and it perhaps occurred to some distrustful minds that Mr. Pitt prolonged, without reluctance, the sort of royal authority which he enjoyed. He trusted it would be believed, to use his own language at the time, that in the event of ministers being no longer able to receive the commands of his majesty from his own mouth, they would propose measures to which it was unnecessary to allude more distinctly, but which they should not delay for one single day. They found themselves placed by their duty in an unprecedented situation, which they should not wish, on any account, to prolong one instant more than strict necessity required. Mr. Sheridan replied to this, by expressing the utmost confidence, that neither Mr. Pitt, nor any other minister would ever presume to take advantage of the unhappy condition of the king's health, to prolong, for one moment, a power equal to that of the sovereign himself.

* I am indebted for the above details to several contemporaries of Mr. Pitt, who were on the most intimate terms with him; who were engaged in the ministerial

negotiations of that period, and who fill, even at the present day, some of the highest offices in England.

The most delicate reserve was observed. The word which characterized the real condition of the king, that of madness, did not escape the lips of any one; and the nation waited with anxiety, but with perfect composure, the issue of this extraordinary crisis. During this period, Mr. Pitt induced subsidies to be voted, which no one opposed; the English fleets were got ready for sea, and Admirals Parker and Nelson left Yarmouth with forty-seven sail, and proceeded towards the Baltic.

In the middle of March, the king's health was restored. Mr. Pitt transferred the reins of government to Mr. Addington and Lord Hawkesbury. The new ministers, when giving explanations, as usual, on assuming office, did not omit to state, from their seats in parliament, that they entertained the highest sentiments of esteem for their predecessors; that they considered the course of policy they had adopted as highly salutary, and that it had, in fact, saved England; they consequently declared, that they should be guided by the same principles, and follow in the same steps. "Why, then, have you come into power?" asked Messrs. Sheridan, Grey, and Fox. "If you mean to pursue the same line of policy as your predecessors, the ministers who have retired were much more capable than yourselves of carrying on the affairs of the kingdom."

Impartial men, members of parliament, censured Mr. Pitt for having relinquished the government of the nation, at such a critical moment, and for retiring without valid and sufficient reasons. Even the opposition was so far in the wrong, as to reproach him with retiring at the expense of the king's popularity, by giving out, that the king refused to grant emancipation, which measure was generally acceptable to the country. This reproach was both unreasonable, and at variance with true constitutional principles. Mr. Pitt, in resigning, was under the necessity of publicly stating the reasons for his withdrawal from office; and if the king did really refuse his sanction to an emancipation bill, Mr. Pitt had a perfect right to proclaim it. He made it known, however, in language eminently suitable to the occasion. But it plainly appeared, that this refusal was rather a pretext than a real motive, and that Mr. Pitt yielded to a state of things with which he was unequal to contend. The lustre of his star faded before one that was now rising, and which was destined to diffuse a far brighter splendour than his own. Although he afterwards appeared at the head of affairs, and actually died in office, the expiration of his political existence may be dated at this period. Mr. Pitt, after having continued seventeen years in power, left his country loaded at once with increased riches and increased debt, with greater burdens, and with greater resources. He was an accomplished orator, if viewed as an organ of the government; an able and powerful leader, but with little enlightened views as a statesman. He had committed grievous errors, and was ever warped by all the prejudices of his countrymen. No Englishman ever entertained a more deadly hatred towards France; but we must guard against being unjust towards him on this account, and evince our impartiality, by honouring patriotism, even when engaged in a contest with our own.

Although Mr. Addington and Lord Hawkesbury were not to be compared, in talent, to Mr. Pitt, the impulse had been given, and the vessel of the state was borne onwards, for a time, by the momentum imparted to it by the fallen minister. The subsidies had been asked and voted; the English fleets were launched towards the Baltic, in order to settle the question of the rights of neutrals; and an army, transported on board the fleet of Admiral Keith, was on its way to the East, in order to dispute the possession of Egypt with the French.

Admiral Parker, an old experienced officer, whose judgment can be relied upon in critical emergencies, commanded the Baltic fleet. Nelson was next in command, ready to act whenever battle was necessary; the latter, in fact, was only qualified to fight, but nature had endowed him with a happy instinct for warfare, and he reasoned ably upon subjects connected with his profession. He proposed, that without waiting for the second division of the English fleet, they should pass the Sound, proceed direct to Copenhagen, and there, by some act of vigour, detach Denmark from the coalition; then afterwards repair to the Baltic, throw themselves into the midst of the combined fleets, prevent their junction, and thus, from that time, dictate terms at discretion. This plan was well conceived, for it was now the month of March, the northern waters were still covered with ice, and this alone was sufficient to prevent the fleets of the neutrals from effecting their junction; which, indeed, Nelson had good reason to fear, as it must greatly have endangered the British squadron.

This squadron, consisting of seventeen ships of the line, and thirty frigates, or smaller vessels, appeared on the 30th of March, in the Cattegat. The Cattegat is the first gulf formed by the northern extremity of Denmark, when it approaches the opposite coast of Sweden.

The neutral powers were proceeding with extreme activity in their preparations. The Emperor Paul, animated by his accustomed ardour, had urged and incited on Sweden, Denmark, and Prussia, and threatened with his enmity those who did not manifest the same zeal as himself. Denmark and Prussia would have preferred negotiating in the first instance; but the menaces of Paul, and the stern, but no ways menacing admonitions of the First Consul, accompanied with a formal promise of assistance from France, had prevailed with these two cabinets. Denmark, besides, seeing the English respond to a simple declaration of principles, by a declaration of war, did not consider herself at liberty to recede, and accordingly took energetic measures to repel the enemy. Prussia, perplexed in the extreme by the intimidation of Russia on the one side, and France on the other, having ceased any longer to play the part of mediatrix, now that Paul I. and the First Consul were upon amicable terms; instead of taking the lead as before, was now reduced to the position of an obsequious follower, and from that time could rely upon their friendly dispositions alone, for a share of the Germanic indemnities advantageous to her interests, and was therefore anxious to please those powers by her consistent firmness. She accordingly declared against England, and replied to her overtures by protestations of fidelity to the cause of the neutrals. She prohibited the English from entering any of the northern ports situated between Holland and Denmark; she closed the mouths of the Ems, the Weser, and the Elbe, and stationed troops, and raised batteries at the principal points of the entrances to these rivers. To crown all, she marched a body of troops, and took possession of Hanover. This proceeding was of all the rest the most serious and decisive. The First Consul required it by the warmest proofs of his satisfaction, and by the most positive pledge to her of an advantageous participation in the Germanic indemnities.

Denmark, on her part, took possession of Hamburg and Lubeck; the small port of Cuxhaven, which belonged to Hamburg, and which was the only place to which the English could have access, had been already occupied by Prussia. Thus, then, the English were left nothing but the sea and their vessels. They had not a place where they could cast an anchor. They now had the task to procure by force a readmittance for their ships into the continental ports.

It is necessary, in order to reach the Baltic from the Cattegat, to pass through the celebrated straits of the Sound. These straits are formed by the contiguity of the coasts of Denmark and Sweden. Between Elsinore and Helsingborg it is about three miles in width. The guns placed on the batteries of the two opposite banks, can just reach a vessel passing in the middle of the channel, but without being able to do much damage to a fleet of ships. Nevertheless, as the channel is deeper on the Swedish side, ships of war of a large size are obliged to approach nearer to this coast, and by fortifying it with batteries the passage could have been rendered more difficult to the English. But the Swedish coast had at that time no batteries, and, indeed, had never had any at any previous period; in fact it has no port which merchant vessels could be tempted to frequent. There is no other port in the Sound, except that of Elsinore, belonging to Denmark, and on this account batteries have been erected for the defence of the Danish coast only, with scarcely any on the Swedish side. On the Danish side stands the fortress of Cronenberg, regularly fortified. For these reasons the usage has originated of paying to the Danes, and not to the Swedes, the dues levied in the Sound. In such a state of things, it would have been requisite to construct works on the coast of Sweden, of which they were deficient. King Gustavus Adolphus,¹ who, next to Paul, was the most violent of the members of the league, had consulted the czar on the subject, when he was at St. Petersburg, on his recent visit, but they were aware of the impossibility of executing the least work during the present winter season, when the soil, indurated by the frost, would resist the pickaxe and the spade, to such a degree as to render any labour upon it wholly impracticable. Gustavus Adolphus had also just had an interview with the Crown-Prince of Denmark, at that time regent of the kingdom, the same who died some years ago, in 1841, after a long and glorious reign. They conferred together upon this subject, and the Crown-Prince, from private reasons by which Denmark was influenced, did not seem to attach much importance to the fortifying of the Swedish coast.² The Sound then was but feebly defended on the Swedish side. There was only an old battery of eight pieces of cannon, constructed a long time ago upon the most salient point of the shore. Although this neglect has been greatly blamed since, it is certain that the Sound, even if it had been strongly fortified on both sides, would not have presented any serious dangers to the English, as the width of the channel being about three miles, vessels passing in the midst of the straits would be at a distance of a mile and a half

¹ GUSTAVUS IV. ADOLPHUS. Born Nov. 1, 1778, and proclaimed King of Sweden on the death of his father Gustavus III. in 1793. He remained 44 years under the guardianship of Charles Duke of Sudermannland, his uncle. In his 18th year he was betrothed to a princess of Mecklenberg. This he broke off to marry Alexandra Pavlovna, granddaughter of the Empress Catharine of Russia. This match he again broke off at the last moment and married Frederica princess of Baden. He quarrelled successively with Russia, France, Prussia, and England, without any cause but his own absurd whims, and after proving himself clearly to be a fool at least, if not a madman, was deposed in 1809.—Encyclopedia Americana.

² Very erroneous assertions have been made on this subject. I have had recourse to the highest and most authentic authorities. The archives of France, Sweden, and Denmark, contain the proofs of what I here advance. Those who have written to the contrary, Napoleon amongst others, have only repeated the allegations made at the time. The second passage of the Sound, which took place in 1807, at a period when Sweden was at war with Denmark, and viewed with pleasure the triumph of the English, has contributed to confirm the idea, that the Swedes had acted perfidiously. But on the first occasion, that is, in 1801, Sweden acted with perfect good faith; she was anxious for the general success, and would have done every thing in her power to secure it.

from the variations, and would therefore, being almost out of the range of their guns, escape with only perhaps some damage to their sails and rigging.

There is also another approach to the Baltic besides that of the Sound, which is formed by the two arms of the sea which separate, the one the Island of Zealand from the Island of Funen, the other the Island of Funen from the coast of Jutland, passages well known by the names of the Great and Little Belt. The English would be but little inclined to sail by this passage, in which they would be exposed to the fire of more than one Danish fort; but still more to the shoals, which rendered the navigation extremely dangerous for ships of the line; they were, therefore, most likely to decide upon going through the passage of the Sound.

The Danes concentrated all their defences, not exactly at the Sound, but lower down, in the channel which forms the continuation of the Sound, that is to say before Copenhagen. The two coasts of Denmark and of Sweden, after having approximated to each other at the Sound, now stretch out to an extent varying in width from three to twelve leagues, forming a strait about twenty leagues in length, abounding with reefs and shoals, through which a vessel can only navigate, by steering through the narrow channels, carefully ascertaining the depth of water by incessant soundings. The city of Copenhagen is situated on the most important of these channels, about twenty leagues from the Sound, in a direction towards the south. It was at this spot that the Danes had made immense preparations, waiting for the approach of the enemy. The post which they occupied did not exactly close the entrance to the Baltic, as we shall presently explain, but it compelled the English to risk an attack on a well-defended position, strongly fortified beforehand. The Crown-Prince had taken prompt and numerous preliminary measures for defence. He had stationed before Copenhagen a number of vessels, cut down so as to form formidable floating batteries, and he had armed besides ten line-of-battle ships, which were only waiting for seamen from Norway to complete their crews. It is well known that the Danish navy is the best in the whole north.

Sweden and Russia, on their parts, had also made preparations for resistance. Sweden had placed troops on the coasts from Gottenburg to the Sound, and fortified Carlscrona, in the Baltic, as well as all the other accessible points on that coast. King Gustavus Adolphus was urging on Admiral Cronstedt to complete the equipment of the Swedish fleet. This fleet already consisted of seven ships of the line, and two frigates, ready to set sail, the moment the sea was disencumbered of the winter ice. The Russians had twelve ships of the line already at Revel, and which, like the Swedish vessels, were only detained by the ice. The coalitionists had not accomplished, doubtless, all that would have been possible, if they had had at their head an energetic government, like France at that period, but, by assembling, in time, the seven Swedish, the twelve Russian, and ten Danish ships before Copenhagen, there would have been formed a fleet of thirty ships of the line, and of from ten to twelve frigates, stationed in a formidable position, where the English could not have come to an engagement without danger, and still less could have passed by and disregarded. To have passed it, without attacking it, in order to embark in any enterprise in the Baltic, would have been to incur the danger of leaving an imposing force in their rear, capable of closing up the sole outlet of this sea, and of preventing their egress therefrom, in case of reverses. But to collect together these naval divisions, in proper time, required a celerity of movements of which these three neutral governments were hardly capable. They used every despatch, doubtless, but relying too much upon the continuance of severe weather, they had not commenced their preparations sufficiently early, and the energetic promptitude of the English greatly surpassed theirs.

On the 21st of March, an English frigate touched at Elsinore, bringing Mr. Vansittart, who was commissioned to make a last application to the Danish government. Mr. Vansittart delivered to Mr. Drummond, the English chargé d'affaires, the ultimatum of the British cabinet. The terms of this ultimatum required the Danes to withdraw from the naval confederacy of the neutral powers; to open their ports to the English; and adhere to the provisional arrangement of the preceding August, by virtue of which, they had engaged no longer to convoy their merchant vessels. The Crown-Prince of Denmark promptly refused to entertain the idea of such a defection, and replied that Denmark, and her allies, had not made a declaration of war, and that they had confined themselves to the publication of their principles of maritime law: that the English were the aggressors, as they had retaliated to a mere assertion of a dogma in the law of nations, by an embargo; that Denmark would not commence hostilities, but she would energetically repel force by force. The gallant people of Copenhagen nobly seconded, by their steady allegiance, the prince who represented them with so much dignity. The whole population took up arms; and, at the call of their noble leader, formed themselves into corps of militia and volunteers. Eight hundred students rushed to arms; every one who could handle a pickaxe assisted the engineers in completing the defensive works: redoubts were thrown up in every direction. Mr. Drummond and Mr. Vansittart abruptly left Copenhagen, threatening this unhappy city with all the thunders of England.

On the 24th, they rejoined the admirals of the fleet, who, from that moment, began to arrange their plan for immediate hostilities.

Nelson and the commander-in-chief, Parker, held a council of war, on board the fleet. The plan of operation was discussed. Some proposed to pass by way of the Sound, and others by way of the Great Belt. Nelson maintained that it was of little consequence by which strait the fleet should pass, only that not an hour should be lost in getting into the Baltic, and bearing up to Copenhagen, in order to prevent the junction of the coalitionists. Once in the Baltic, a part of the English fleet should be directed against Copenhagen, to strike a blow against the Danes, and a part against Sweden and Russia, to destroy the northern fleets. They had twenty sail of the line, twenty-five or thirty frigates, and vessels of all descriptions. He would undertake, with twelve ships, to destroy all the Swedish and Russian fleets; the remainder must attack and bombard Copenhagen. As to which of the passages they should navigate, Nelson preferred braving some of the cannon-shot to which they might be exposed in passing the Sound, to encountering the dangerous shoals of the Great and Little Belt.

Admiral Parker, less enterprising, made an attempt, by the Great Belt, on the 26th of March. Several light vessels of the flotilla having grounded, the commander-in-chief recalled the squadron, and determined to force the Sound. Early on the morning of the 30th of March, they commenced this arduous passage. At the time it blew a topsail breeze from the north-west, favourable for navigating this strait, which runs in a direction from north-west to south-east, as far as Elsinore, after which it continues almost due north and south. The squadron, favoured by the wind, advanced boldly, at an equal distance from the two opposite shores. Nelson led the van, Parker took the command of the centre, and admiral Graves brought up the rear. The line-of-battle ships formed a single column in the middle of the channel. On each side a flotilla of gun and bomb vessels approached nearer to the coast of Denmark and Sweden, in order to engage the enemy's batteries at a shorter range. As soon as this squadron came in sight of Elsinore, the fortress of Kronenberg immediately opened a fire upon them. One hundred pieces of heavy cannon vomited forth a volley of shells and red-hot balls. But the English admiral perceiving that the fire on the Swedish side did little or no execution, as the old battery of eight guns scarcely fired, immediately approached nearer to that side of the coast, and passed the straits amidst the jeers of the English sailors at the Danes, whose shells and balls fell 600 yards short of the enemy's ships. The flotilla of bomb and gun vessels, which had approached quite close to the Danish coast, poured forth, and received an immense quantity of shells, but little bloodshed ensued, as four men only were wounded on the side of the Danes, two of whom were severely wounded, and two died. In Elsinore, only one house suffered from the fire of the English, and that was, singularly enough, the house of the English consul.

The whole fleet anchored, towards noon, in the middle of the gulf, off the island of Huen.

The gulf, as we have just said, runs from north to south, for the distance of about twenty leagues, varying in width, as the shores advance or recede, from three to twelve leagues, and has only a few channels that are navigable. At about twenty leagues towards the south, stands Copenhagen, situated on the west side of the gulf, on the coast of Denmark, at a small elevation above the level of the sea, and forming a slightly inclined plane, from which a cannon ball would just skim over the surface of the sea. The gulf is very wide at this spot, and divided by the low island of Saltholm, into two navigable channels: the one called the passage of Malmo, runs along the Swedish coast, and is scarcely accessible for large vessels: the other, called Drogden, skirts along the coast of Denmark, and is generally preferred by navigators. The latter is again divided by a sand bank, which is called the Middle Ground, into two passages; one called the King's Channel, forms the entrance to Copenhagen: the other, called the Dutch Channel, runs on the outer side of the Middle Ground. The Danes had taken up a position in the King's Channel, leaving the other open to the English, having in view rather the defence of Copenhagen, than to prevent the enemy entering into the Baltic. But it was very certain that Parker and Nelson would not venture into the Baltic, without first destroying the defences of Copenhagen, together with the maritime forces, that the neutrals might have assembled there.

The means of defence, on the side of the Danes, consisted of land batteries, constructed on the right and left of the harbour, and of a line of razéed vessels, or floating batteries, moored in the middle of the King's Channel, the whole length of Copenhagen, with the view of keeping the enemy's fire at a distance. Commencing at the northern position, was a battery called the Three Crowns, constructed of stone work, almost completely closed at the gorge, commanding even the entrance to the port, and connecting its fire with the citadel of Copenhagen. It was fortified with seventy pieces of cannon of the largest calibre. Four ships of the line, of which two were under sail, and two at anchor, besides a frigate under way, completely blocked up the entrance to the stream which led to the port. In proceeding from this fort, that is, the Three Crowns, towards the south, twenty hulks of large ships, armed with guns, and strongly moored, filled up the passage of the King's Channel, and was thus connected with the batteries on land, placed on the island of Amak. Thus the line of defence of the Danes was supported on the left by the Three Crowns battery, and on the right by the island of Amak; its length occupying, and completely blocking up, the middle of the passage of the King's Channel. The works of the Three Crowns could not be forced, defended as they were by seventy yawning cannon mouths; and also by five vessels, three of which were under sail. The line of defence, consisting of the rafts and stationary hulks, on the contrary, was of too great length, not sufficiently close, and incapable of manœuvring; and, owing to the object they had in view, of obstructing the middle of the passage, was placed too much in advance of the point of support on the right, that is to say, the fixed batteries on the island of Amak. This island is but a continuation of the coast on which Copenhagen is seated. The line of floating batteries could, therefore, be attacked on the right. If it had been formed of a division of vessels, under sail, capable of shifting their position, or even if it had been more concentrated, more strongly supported on the bank the English would not have come out of this attack altogether safe and sound. But the Danes set great value upon their naval squadron, which they had not the means of replacing, if it was destroyed; and not having, besides, received all the seamen from Norway, to man it completely, they kept it protected in the inner basin of the harbour, thinking that old unserviceable vessels were sufficient to answer the purpose of floating batteries against the English fleet.

Their bravest seamen, commanded by intrepid officers, worked the guns, mounted on these old hulks, which were strongly moored and chained together.

The English having arrived off Copenhagen, long before the junction of all the neutral maritime powers at this point, might have passed to the eastward of the Middle Ground, disregarding the Danes stationed in the King's Channel, and have proceeded by the before-mentioned Dutch Channel into the Baltic. They might have accomplished this beyond the reach of the guns of Copenhagen; but they would have left in their rear an imposing force, capable of cutting off their retreat, in case any untoward event should force them back, weakened, and in want of shelter, through the passage of the Sound. It was better to take advantage of the isolated position of the Danes, and, by striking a decisive blow, detach them from the confederacy, and, after having, by this means, seized the keys of the Baltic, proceed, with all expedition, against the Swedes and the Russians. This plan was, at the same time, bold and prudent; and it received that which rarely occurred—the concurrent approbation of both Parker and Nelson.

The entire days of the 31st of March and 1st of April were occupied in examining the Danish line, in sounding the channel, and in concerting the plan of attack. Nelson and Parker, accompanied by the oldest officers of the fleet, with the chief officer of engineers, reconnoitred, in person, in the midst of the ice, the position of the enemy, being sometimes within reach of the enemy's shot. Nelson maintained that, with ten ships, he would undertake to attack, and break the right line of the Danes. His plan was to proceed down the whole length of the Middle Ground, by passing through the Dutch Channel, doubling round the farther extremity, and reascending by way of the King's Channel, and then take his station, ship against ship, about a cable's length from the enemy. He arranged, moreover, that a division of the fleet, under a brave officer, Captain Riou, should attack the land battery of the Three Crowns, and, after having silenced their guns, disembark 1000 men, and take it by storm. The commander-in-chief, Admiral Parker, with the remainder of the fleet under him, was not to engage in this bold manœuvre; it was agreed that he should remain in the rear, to cannonade the citadel, and cover the disabled vessels as they retired from the action.

This manœuvre, as daring as that of Aboukir, could only succeed through great ability and good fortune. Admiral Parker gave his assent to it, on condition that it should not be carried too far, if the difficulties should be found insurmountable; and placed at Nelson's disposal twelve ships, instead of ten, for which he had applied. On the evening of the 1st of April, Nelson dropped through the Dutch Channel, and came to an anchor, considerably below Copenhagen, at a place on the island of Amak, called Draco. In order to get into the King's Channel, and traverse its entire length, a totally different wind was wanting to that which had brought him down the Dutch Channel. The next morning, the wind having opportunely shifted from its direction on the night before he ascended the King's Channel, steering his fleet between the Danish line and the shoals of the Middle Ground. The whole channel had been sounded, but, notwithstanding this precaution, three ships struck on the Middle Ground, and Nelson took up his position with the remaining nine only. He was not disheartened, but anchored broadside on, within half a cable's length of the Danish line, a distance which must render the effect of the cannonading most terrific. The want of the three vessels agra and was greatly felt, more particularly for the attack of the Three Crowns battery, which thus was obliged to be attempted by frigates.

At ten o'clock in the morning, the whole English squadron had taken up its position, and received and poured forth a frightful volley of artillery. A division of bomb and gunships, drawing but little water, was placed upon the shoal of the Middle Ground, and discharged their shells upon Copenhagen, over the masts of the two squadrons. The fire from the Danish batteries, consisting of 800 guns, inflicted considerable damage on the English. The officers in command of the rafts displayed great intrepidity, and their gunners exhibited the most heroic courage. The commander of the Provesten, in particular, who occupied the extremity of the line towards the south, conducted himself with the most distinguished gallantry. Nelson, perceiving the importance of at once depriving the Danish line of the support which it received from the batteries of the island of Amak, directed four vessels against the Provesten alone. M. de Lassen, captain of the Provesten, defended himself until he had lost 500 out of his 600 gunners; he then threw himself into the sea, with the 100 remaining, and swam on shore from his vessel, which he left in flames. He thus had the glory of not striking his flag. Nelson then directed all his efforts against the other rafts and floating batteries, and succeeded in silencing several. In the mean time, at the other end of the line, Captain Riou suffered severely. Three English vessels being fast on the Middle Ground, he had only frigates to oppose to the Three Crown batteries, and he was exposed to a frightful and destructive fire from their guns, without any hope of silencing them, or of being able to take them by storm. Parker, perceiving the resistance of the Danes, and fearing that the English ships, too much injured in their rigging, would be exposed to be run aground, gave orders to discontinue action. Nelson perceiving this signal thrown out at Admiral Parker's mast-head, gave way to a noble expression of indignation. He had lost the use of one eye, and, taking up the glass, and placing it to his blind eye, he said, sarcastically, "I really don't see Parker's signal for leaving off action," and he kept his signal for closer battle still flying. This was a noble act of imprudence, and was followed, as it often happens to audacious boldness, by a successful result.

The floating batteries of the Danes, not being able to move, or seek shelter under the land batteries, were exposed to a most destructive fire. The Danebrog blew up with a terrific explosion; several others were disabled, and drifted from their moorings, after having suffered an enormous loss of men. But the English, on the other side, did not suffer less severely, and were placed in the greatest peril. Nelson, in endeavouring to take possession of the Danish vessels which had struck, received, as he neared the batteries on the island of Amak, a deadly discharge from their guns. At this moment, three or four of his vessels were so completely shattered, as to be almost unmanageable; and, on the side of the Three Crown batteries, Captain Riou, compelled to draw off his vessels to a distance, was cut in two by a chain-shot. Nelson, almost beaten, was not disconcerted, and conceived the idea of sending a flag of truce to the Prince of Denmark, who was present, on one of the batteries, at this horrible scene. He told him that, if he did not stop the firing, which prevented him taking possession of his prizes, which, by right, belonged to him, since they had struck their flags, he should be obliged to blow them up, with all their crews; that the English were the brothers of the Danes, that both had fought sufficiently to attest their valour, and ought to avoid the further effusion of blood.

The prince, moved by this appalling spectacle, fearing also for the city of Copenhagen, now deprived of the protection of the floating batteries, gave orders for the firing to cease. This was a mistake; for a few moments longer, and Nelson's fleet, almost disabled, would have been obliged to retire half destroyed. A sort of negotiation ensued, and Nelson took advantage of it to quit his place of anchorage. Whilst he was in the act of retiring, three of his vessels, considerably damaged, being no longer manageable, struck on the Middle Ground. If, at this moment, the fire had still continued, these three vessels must have been lost.

The next day, Nelson and Parker, after great efforts, got afloat the three vessels which had grounded, and opened a negotiation with the Danes for the purpose of obtaining a suspension of hostilities. They stood as much in need of this as the Danes, as they had 1200 men killed and wounded, and the havoc in six of their vessels was horrible. The loss of the Danes was not much greater, but they had relied too much upon the line of their floating batteries, and now that these batteries were destroyed, the lower part of the city, which is open to the sea, was exposed to a bombardment. They were also apprehensive for their vessels of war, which, half equipped, immovable, and locked in the basin, might have been set fire to, and totally consumed. This apprehension was to them most alarming. They, in fact, clung to their squadron, as to their very maritime existence: and this squadron once destroyed, they were not in a position to replace it. At this instant, under the momentary irritation of suffering and danger, they complained of their allies, without reflecting upon the difficulties which had prevented them from repairing to the walls of Copenhagen. The contrary winds, the ice, and the shortness of time, had detained the Swedes and the Russians, without any blame being fairly attributable to them. It is true, that had they arrived with their twenty ships and joined the Danish fleet in the straits, where the engagement took place, Nelson would have failed in his daring enterprise, and the cause of the maritime neutral confederacy would have triumphed on that day. But there had not been time for any of them to get ready, and the promptitude of the English changed the fortune of the war. Admiral Parker, who was greatly alarmed at the temerity of Nelson, during the battle of the second, formed now a correct opinion of the position of the Danes, and knew how to derive every advantage from the battle which had been fought. He required the Danes to withdraw from the confederacy of the neutral powers, to open their ports to the English, and to receive, moreover, an English force, under the pretence of protecting them against the resentment of their allies. Nelson had the courage to land on the third of April to carry these proposals to the Crown-Prince. He went in a boat to Copenhagen, heard the murmurs of this brave people, who were filled with indignation at seeing him, but found the Crown-Prince inflexible. This Prince, more alarmed, the evening before, than the actual danger of Copenhagen justified, would not, nevertheless, consent to the ignominious defection proposed to him. He replied, that he would sooner be buried in the ashes of his city than betray the common cause. Nelson returned on board the flag-ship without having obtained any concession.

During this interval, the Danes, seeing themselves exposed to the dangers of a second conflict, set to work, and added new defences to those which before existed. They rendered the battery of the Three Crowns more formidable, covered the island of Amak with guns, as well as the lower part of the city. They transported their vessels of war, the paramount objects of their solicitude, into the innermost basins of the harbour, the farthest from the sea, carefully covering them with dung and blindness, so as to protect them against fire; and were at length reassured, when they perceived the hesitation of the English, who did not evince much eagerness to renew this terrific struggle. The whole of the available population lent their aid; one part was placed under arms, and the other part employed in preparing the means for extinguishing the conflagration. At length, after waiting five days, Nelson returned to Copenhagen, notwithstanding the threatening aspect of the preparations of the Danes. The discussion was animated, and he took upon himself to make concessions, which Admiral Parker had not authorized.

He agreed upon an armistice which amounted virtually to a status quo. The Danes did not withdraw from the confederacy, but all hostilities were suspended between them and the English for fourteen weeks; at the expiration of which period, they were to return to the same position as on the day on which this suspension of hostilities was signed. The terms of the armistice embraced only the Danish islands and Jutland, but not Holstein, so that hostilities might be continued in the Elbe, and from that time the English were prohibited the navigation of that river. The English were to keep at a cannon-shot distance from all the Danish ports and vessels, with the exception of the King's Channel, which they were free to navigate, in order to reach the Baltic. They were forbidden, consequently, to establish themselves upon any points of the Danish territory, and they were only allowed to put into any port for the purpose of refreshment, or to take in a supply of provisions.

These terms were all Nelson could obtain, and they were, we must confess, all that his victory entitled him to demand. But, as he was on the point of leaving Copenhagen, a very untoward report obtained currency, and the Crown-Prince, who had been influenced thereby to enter into negotiations, succeeded in keeping the knowledge of it from him. The report was in truth, at that moment, that Paul I. had just died suddenly. Nelson left the place without being aware of this intelligence, which would doubtless have greatly increased his pretensions. The armistice was immediately ratified by Admiral Parker. The Crown-Prince also intimated to the Swedes, that it was useless to expose themselves unavailingly to the attacks of the English, which they would be unequal to resist. This advice was not uncalculated for, inasmuch as, after great efforts, Gustavus Adolphus had succeeded in getting his fleet ready to sail. He had, in the earnestness of his zeal, dismissed one rear-admiral the service, and sent another admiral before a court-martial, in order to punish them for an alleged dilatoriness, which could not justly be laid to their charge.

All these efforts were however superfluous. Paul I., in fact, had breathed his last, at St. Petersburg, on the night between the 23d and 24th of March. This event put an end much more effectually than the incomplete victory of Nelson, to the maritime confederacy of the northern powers. Paul I. had been the chief promoter of that confederacy; he had applied all the impetuous energy of his character to secure its success, and assuredly he would have exerted himself to the utmost to repair the disaster, in other respects pretty equally shared, of the battle of Copenhagen. He would have sent his land forces to Denmark, despatched the whole of the neutral fleet to the Sound, and probably have made the English rue their barbarous enterprise against the capital of the Danes. But this prince had driven the patience of his subjects to the last extremity, and he had just been put to death, a wretched victim of a tragical revolution at the palace.

Paul I. was of a lively disposition, but all his opinions were carried to the extreme, and as usual, with persons of his temperament, capable of good or evil actions, according to the temporary impulse of his weak, excitable, ill-regulated mind. If the temper of private individuals so constituted is fatal, it becomes still more so in the case of princes, especially when they are invested with absolute power. With them it often borders on madness, assuming sometimes even symptoms of a sanguinary character. Thus, at St. Petersburg, every man trembled for his own fate; even the favourites of Paul, who were treated with the greatest kindness, were not certain but that the favour they at present enjoyed might terminate in an exile to Siberia.

This prince, both sensitive and chivalrous, felt a lively sympathy for the victims of the French Revolution, and a vehement hatred against the Revolution itself. Thus, whereas the able Catharine had wisely, during her reign, confined herself to exciting all Europe against France, without setting a single soldier in motion, Paul, on his accession to the throne, had sent Suwarrow with 100,000 Russians into Italy. In the warmth of his zeal, he had interdicted, from his dominions, every article which came from France, books, fashions, and dress. This more than sufficed to give umbrage to the Russian nobility, who, like the whole of the aristocracy of Europe, delighted in reviling France, but nevertheless with the reservation of enjoying her wit, her manners, and her highly advanced civilization. They found this anti-revolutionary zeal intolerable, when carried to such an excess.

In a short time, however, Paul was seen to change these opinions and go to the very opposite extreme, conceiving a great hatred for his allies, and receiving his enemies into favour, crowding his apartments with the portrait of General Bonaparte, drinking publicly to his health, and carrying the contrast so far as actually to declare war against Great Britain. This step rendered him not only irksome, but actually odious to the Russian nobility, for he not only interfered with their tastes, but injuriously affected their material interests.

The vast extent of his dominions, occupying almost the whole of the northern part of Europe, abounding in grain, timber, hemp, and ores, requires the aid of foreign merchants, who seek these indigenous commodities, and give in exchange either money or manufactured goods. The English, in their trade with Russia, supply her, in return for the raw produce of her soil, with the articles manufactured by their own labour, and thus the Russian farmers are enabled to pay to their landlords the rents of their land. The English then engross the most important branches of trade with St. Petersburg, and this is the tie by which, in some measure, the policy of Russia is fettered to English interests, and that rivalry, which sooner or later must inevitably break out between these two great co-partners in the possession of Asia, is modified.

The Russian aristocracy was accordingly highly exasperated with the newly adopted policy of Paul. If they had blamed, in this prince, an excess of hatred against France—they found still greater fault with an excess of affection towards her, especially when this surprising attachment was carried to such an extent, as to adopt steps ruinous to the interests of the landed proprietors. Besides this obnoxious interference with their tastes and their interests, Paul was still further guilty of cruelties, to which, however, he was not naturally addicted, being rather of a good, than of a mischievous disposition. He had sent a multitude of unhappy wretches to Siberia; afterwards, affected by their sufferings, he recalled them, but without re-instating them in their property. These unfortunate creatures filled all St. Petersburg with their complaints, and with their lamentable misery. Annoyed by these spectacles, he exiled them a second time. Becoming every day more and more distrustful, in proportion as the hatred of his subjects became more apparent to him, he threatened the lives of every one around him. He conceived sinister designs against his ministers, sometimes against his wife and children, and this prince, who was all but mad, assumed habitually the behaviour of a tyrant. He surrounded the palace Michael, which was his usual residence, like a fortress, with bastions and ditches. One would have said, that he seemed to anticipate a sudden attack. At night, he even barricaded the door which separated his apartments from those of the empress, and thus unwittingly predisposed every thing for his tragical end.

Such a state of things could not long continue, and must inevitably terminate in some deed of violence, similar to that which, more than once, had been witnessed in this empire, where, it is true, rapid advances have been made towards civilization, but where actual barbarism was the point of starting. The idea of getting rid of the unhappy Paul, by the accustomed means, that is to say, by a revolution at the palace, there where the palace is the nation, suggested itself to every mind. Let us set a proper value upon the advantages of institutions. At another extremity of Europe, upon one of the greatest thrones of the universe, sat a prince afflicted also with insanity, a headstrong, but pious and good prince, George III. This king, occasionally deprived of his reason, during whole months, had just experienced a relapse of his malady, at one of the most critical moments for England. Nevertheless, the business of the nation proceeded in the most regular and ordinary course. The constitution providing the king with ministers, who conduct the government on his behalf, this aberration of the royal mind did not, in any way, prejudice the affairs of the nation. Mr. Pitt held the government for George III., precisely as he had held it during seventeen years; the thought of an atrocious crime never entered into the imagination of any one! At St. Petersburg, on the contrary, the spectacle of an insane prince on the throne gave rise to the most sinister projects.

There was at that time, at the court of Russia, one of those men, dreaded by all, who never shrink from the perpetration of any audacious deed. In a regular government, such men may rise, perhaps, to the station of eminently good citizens, but in a despotic government, they become criminals, if crime is, in certain cases, one of the expedients not actually sanctioned by the government, but incidental to its administration. Crime must be condemned in every country where it prevails, but we must condemn still more the institutions by which it is engendered.

Count Pahlen had served in the Russian army with distinction. He possessed a commanding person, and concealed beneath the rough, and sometimes familiar manner, of a soldier a deep and acute mind. He was endowed, moreover, with singular audacity, and an imperturbable presence of mind. As governor of St. Petersburg, intrusted with the police of the empire, and initiated, thanks to the confidence of his master, into all the great affairs of state, he was, in point of fact, though not by office, the principal personage in the Russian government. His political opinions respecting the public policy of the country were very decided. The crusade against the French revolution seemed to him as unreasonable as the new-born zeal against England was intemperate. A prudent reserve, a neutrality skilfully maintained in the midst of the formidable contest between France and England, appeared to him the only advantageous policy which Russia could pursue. Entertaining neither English nor French views, but being wholly Russian in his opinions, he was also a Russian in his manners, and a Russian such as existed in the days of Peter the Great. Being persuaded that every thing was hastening towards ruin, unless the reign of Paul were curtailed, having even conceived some alarm for himself personally, from certain indications of dissatisfaction which had escaped the emperor, he boldly formed his resolution, and communicated it confidentially to Count Panin, vice-chancellor, who was at the head of foreign affairs. They both were of opinion, that it was necessary to terminate this state of things, which had become as alarming for the empire, as for individual safety. Count Pahlen took upon himself the execution of the terrible project upon which they had resolved. The heir to the throne was the Grand-duke Alexander,

¹ The following details are the most authentic that can be procured concerning the death of Paul I. This is the source from which they are derived. The court of Prussia, greatly shocked at the news of the death of Paul I., was still more highly indignant at the unparalleled effrontery with which some of the accomplices in the crime dared to boast of it at Berlin. The court obtained, through various channels, and principally from a well-informed person, some curious details, which were collected in a minute, and transmitted to the First Consul. These are the particulars which M. Bignon, at that time secretary of our embassy to the court of Prussia, was enabled to procure, and which he has introduced into his work. But the most private circumstances still remained unknown, when a singular accident placed France in possession of the only account, worthy of credit, concerning the death of Paul I., which perhaps is in existence. A French emigrant, who had passed his life in the service of Russia, and who had acquired some military renown, became the friend of Count Pahlen and General Bennigsen. Being at the country-seat of Count Pahlen, he obtained, from their own lips, a circumstantial detail of every thing which took place in St. Petersburg, on the tragical night between the 23d and 24th of March. As the emigrant was very careful in taking notes of every thing he saw and heard, he immediately committed to paper an account of the particulars given by these principal actors, and inserted it in

of who e reign we have been contemporaries—a young prince, who gave every promise of superior qualities, and who appeared at that time, what he did not prove subsequently, easy to be led. He it was whom Count Pahlen desired to raise to the throne, by some catastrophe brought about suddenly, without disturbance or confusion. It was indispensably necessary to come to some understanding with the heir, the grand-duke, to have his concurrence, in order to avoid, after the deed was perpetrated, being treated like a vulgar assassin, who is sacrificed whilst, at the same time, advantage is taken of his crime. It was embarrassing to him, to break the matter to this prince, who, governed by amiable feelings, was incapable of lending his countenance to an attempt against the life of his father. Count Pahlen, without disclosing his whole mind, without revealing any distinct project, discussed with the grand-duke the affairs of state, and, at each successive extravagance of Paul, endangering the empire, communicated the fact to him, then remained silent, without deducing any consequences therefrom. Alexander, in receiving these communications, cast down his eyes, and also remained silent. These mute but expressive scenes were of frequent occurrence. At length, it was requisite to come to some clearer explanation. Count Pahlen, at last, gave this young prince to understand that such a state of things could not be prolonged, without bringing ruin to the empire; and, taking care to avoid the mention of a crime, to which Alexander would not have listened, he insinuated to him that it was necessary to depose Paul, to provide for him a quiet retreat, but, at all hazards, to wrest from his hands the helm of power, and prevent him from driving the vessel of state to utter destruction.

Alexander shed a flood of tears, disclaimed any wish to dispute the throne with his father, but yielded, by degrees, before fresh proofs of the danger to which Paul exposed the affairs of the country, and even the imperial family itself. Paul, in fact, dissatisfied with the supineness of Prussia, in the affairs of the neutral league, even talked of marching 80,000 men upon Berlin. Besides this, in the delirium of his arrogant pride, he wished the First Consul to take him as his adviser in all things, and that this powerful personage should not make peace with Germany, nor with the cabinets of Piedmont, Rome, Naples, or the Porte, excepting upon terms laid down by Russia; so that it was soon greatly to be feared that he would not remain long on amicable terms with France, whose policy he had so warmly espoused. To these suggestions Count Pahlen added the expression of his uneasiness concerning the safety of the royal family, of whom Paul, it was said, began to harbour suspicions.

the valuable memoirs he has left behind him. These manuscript memoirs are now the property of France. They correct numerous inaccurate or vague statements, and, moreover, do not compromise more than they were previously, the names already involved in this dark event. They furnish, however, more precise and probable details. Instead of the false and exaggerated accounts already known. After comparing this report, emanating from a quarter perfectly well-informed, with the details furnished by the court of Prussia, we have

Alexander acquiesced at length; but, at the same time, exacted from Count Pahlen the most solemn oath, that no attempt should be made against the life of his father; Count Pahlen swore to every thing desired by this inexperienced youth, who imagined that a sceptre could be wrested from the grasp of an emperor, without depriving him of life.

The requisite actors in the scene yet remained to be provided, as Count Pahlen, in conceiving this scheme, deemed it beneath him to take any personal share in its execution. He fixed upon them accordingly, but decided upon only intrusting them, sooner or later, with the part they were destined to perform, according as they, by degrees, acquired his confidence. The brothers Soubow, upstarts raised by the favour of Catherine, were chosen as the chief instruments of the plot. Count Pahlen only revealed it to them at a late period. Plato Soubow, the favourite of Catherine, supple, restless, was worthy of figuring conspicuously in the revolution of a palace. His brother Nicholas, remarkable only for great personal strength, was well qualified to play a subordinate part; Valerien Soubow, a brave and honourable soldier, a friend of the Grand-duke Alexander, deserved, from his merit, to have been excluded from the plot. They had a sister, intimately connected with all the English faction—a friend of Lord Whitworth, the English ambassador—who inflamed them with zeal for the British policy. Count Pahlen engaged many other accomplices, and brought them to St. Petersburg, under various pretences, but still without disclosing any thing to them. There was one other individual whom he had summoned to St. Petersburg, upon whose co-operation he knew he could rely, as well as upon his formidable courage; this was the famous General Benningsen,¹ a Hanoverian, in the service of Russia, the first officer in the Russian service at that time, and who, at a later period, in 1807, had the honour to check, in Poland, the victorious march of Napoleon, and whose hands, worthy, indeed, of wielding a sword, should never have been sullied by a poniard.

Benningsen had retired into the country, dreading the effects of Paul's anger, which he had incurred; Count Pahlen withdrew him from his retreat, initiated him into the plot, but proposed nothing further to him, if General Benningsen can be credited, than the project of deposing the emperor. Benningsen pledged his word, and kept it with an appalling courage.

They resolved to fix upon some day for the execution of their project, when the regiment of Semenourki, wholly devoted to the Grand-duke Alexander, should be on duty at the palace Michael. They were obliged to wait. But time pressed, for Paul's malady made rapid progress, became every day more alarming, and placed the interests of the empire, as well drawn up the historical recital which follows, and which seems to us the only one truly worthy of credit, perhaps the only complete one which posterity will ever obtain of this tragical catastrophe.

¹ Baron Benningsen, Russian commander-in-chief, born in Hanover in 1745. Served in the war against Poland; acted a chief part in the conspiracy against Paul; afterwards fought the murderous battle of Eylau and the battle of Friedland, etc. He died in his native country in 1826.

as the safety of his attendants, in greater jeopardy. One day Paul laid hold of the imperturbable Pahlen, by the arm, and addressed him in these singular terms:—"Were you at St. Petersburg in 1762?" (It was in that year that the emperor, the father of Paul, was assassinated, to transfer the throne to the Great Catharine.) "Yes," answered Count Pahlen, quite coolly, "I was." "What part did you take in the event of that time?" "That of a subaltern cavalry officer in the ranks of his regiment. I was a witness of, but not an actor in, that catastrophe." "Well," continued Paul, casting a look of distrust, and of accusation at his minister, "they want to re-enact to-day the revolution of 1762." "I am aware of it," replied Count Pahlen, without betraying the least emotion. "I know all the plot; I am a party to it." "What!" exclaimed Paul, "are you one of the conspirators?" "Yes! but to be better apprized of it, and that I may be in a position, more effectually to watch over your safety." The calmness of this formidable conspirator quite set all Paul's conjectures at defiance, and disarmed his suspicions respecting him; but he still continued discomposed and excited.

An event of almost public interest, if such a term may be employed with reference to such a crime, concurred to hasten their proceeding. Paul ordered a despatch to be written, on the 23d of March, to M. de Krudener, his minister at Berlin, enjoining him to declare to the court of Prussia, that if she did not promptly act against England, he would order an army of 80,000 men to march upon the Prussian frontiers. Count Pahlen, desirous, without saying too much, to induce M. de Krudener to attach no importance to this declaration, added in his own handwriting the following postscript:—"His Imperial Majesty is labouring under indisposition to-day; the consequences may prove serious."¹

The 23d of March was fixed upon for the execution of the plot; Count Pahlen, under colour of giving a dinner party, assembled at his house the Soubows, Benningsen, and several general officers, upon whom he thought he could rely. Wines of all kinds were served with profusion. Pahlen and Benningsen did not drink any. When dinner was over, they unfolded to the conspirators the project for which they were assembled. The most part were now, for the first time, made acquainted with this terrible plot. They were not told, that they would be required to assassinate Paul, as almost every one would have shrunk with dismay from the perpetration of such a crime. They were told, that they must proceed to the palace, and compel him to abdicate, that thus they would deliver the empire from an imminent danger, and that they would save a multitude of innocent lives, at present threatened by the sanguinary madness of Paul. At last, in order to succeed in persuading them, it was affirmed that the Grand-duke Alexander himself, convinced of the necessity of saving the empire, was acquainted with the project, and approved it. Then these men, already excited with wine, no longer demurred, and for the most part, with only three or four exceptions, set out under the impression, that they were going to depose a mad emperor, and not to shed the blood of an unfortunate master.

The night appearing sufficiently advanced, the conspirators, to the number of about sixty, sallied forth, divided into two bands. Count Pahlen took one under his direction, General Benningsen, the command of the other; both officers, dressed in their full uniform; and wearing their sashes and orders, marched forward, sword in hand. The palace Michael was constructed and guarded like a fortress; but the bridges were lowered, and the gates thrown open to the chiefs of the conspirators. Benningsen's party marched first, and proceeded direct towards the emperor's apartments. Count Pahlen remained behind, with his reserved body of conspirators. This man, who had organized the conspiracy, disdained to assist personally in its execution. He was only there to provide for any unexpected emergencies. Benningsen penetrated into the apartment of the sleeping monarch. Two heyduks were on duty as his body-guard. These brave and faithful attendants attempted to defend their sovereign. One was struck down by a blow from a sabre, the other took flight, crying out for help—cries utterly unavailing in a palace, the guards of which are almost all accomplices in the plot! A valet, who slept in a room adjoining that of the emperor, ran to the scene; they compelled him, by force, to open the door of his master's chamber. The unhappy Paul might have found a refuge in the apartments of the empress; but, in his distrustful suspicions, he had taken the precaution, every night, to barricade the door which led to them. All escape being cut off, he flung himself to the bottom of the bed, and concealed himself behind the folds of a screen. Plato Soubow ran to the imperial bed, and, finding it empty, cried out, in alarm, "The emperor has escaped; we are lost!" But, at the same instant, Benningsen caught sight of the prince, rushed towards him, sword in hand, and presented to him the act of abdication. "You have ceased to reign!" he exclaimed to him; "the Grand-duke Alexander is now emperor. I summon you, in his name, to resign the empire, and to sign this act of abdication. On this condition alone I answer for your life." Plato Soubow repeated the same summons. The emperor, confused and lost in dismay, demanded of them, what he had done to deserve such treatment. "For years past you have never ceased to persecute us," retorted the half-intoxicated assassins. They then pressed upon the unhappy Paul, who struggled hard, expostulated, and implored them in vain. At this moment a noise was heard; it was the footsteps of some of the conspirators who had remained behind: but the assassins, believing that some one was coming to the assistance of the emperor, fled in disorder. Benningsen alone, inflexibly resolute, remained in the presence of the monarch, and, advancing towards him, with his sword pointed at his breast, prevented him stirring from the spot. The conspirators having recognised each other, re-entered the chamber, the theatre of their crime. They again hemmed in the unfortunate monarch, in order to force him to subscribe his abdication. The emperor for an instant tried to defend himself. In the scuffle, the lamp which gave light to the frightful scene was overturned and extinguished; Benningsen ran to procure another, and, on his return, discovered Paul expiring under the blows of two assassins; one had broken in his scull with the pommel of his sword, whilst the other was strangling him with his sash.

¹ This despatch was shown to the French Ambassador, General Beurnonville, who instantly forwarded these particulars to his government.

Whilst this scene was enacting, Count Pahlen had remained outside, with the second band of conspirators. When he was told that all was over, he ordered the body of the emperor to be laid out on the bed, and placed a guard of thirty men at the door of the apartment, with orders not to admit any one, even the members of the imperial family. He then repaired to the grand-duke, to announce to him the terrible occurrence of the night.

The grand-duke, in a state of violent agitation, demanded of him, when he approached, what had become of his father! The silence of Count Pahlen soon dissipated the fatal illusions he had cherished, in imagining that an act of abdication was only contemplated. The grief of the young prince was profound; it continued to be, we are told, the secret remorse of his life, as he was naturally of a good and generous nature. He threw himself upon a chair, and burst into tears; would listen no longer to any thing, but loaded Pahlen with bitter reproaches, which the latter received with an imperturbable composure.

Plato Sbowow went in quest of the Grand-duke Constantine, who was wholly ignorant of what was going on, but who has been unjustly accused of having been implicated in this bloody catastrophe. He came to the spot trembling, believing that all his family were to be sacrificed, found his brother overwhelmed with despair, and then learnt every thing which had taken place. Count Pahlen had desired a lady of the palace, who was very intimate with the empress, to acquaint her with the fact of her tragical widowhood. This princess rushed in haste towards her husband's apartments, and attempted to reach his death-bed; but the guards kept her back. Having for an instant recovered from her first paroxysm of grief, she felt, together with the emotions of sorrow, the rising impulses of ambition awaken in her breast. She thought of the Great Catherine, and wished to reign. She despatched several persons to Alexander, who was about to be proclaimed, telling him that the throne belonged of right to her, and that it was she, and not he, who ought to be proclaimed as successor. This was a new embarrassment; this was increased anguish for the already lacerated heart of the son, who, about to ascend the steps of the throne, had to pass between the corpse of a murdered father, and an agonized mother, in tears, frantically demanding, by turns, her husband, or the sceptre. The night was consumed while these appalling and tragical events were passing; the day approached; it was necessary to leave no time for reflection: it was of importance that the death of Paul and the accession of his successor should be proclaimed at the same time. Count Pahlen approached the young prince: "You have wept sufficiently as a child," said he; "come now and reign." He tore him from this house of mourning, and, followed by Benningsen, hastened to present him to the troops.

The first regiment they met was that of Préobrajesnky. As it was entirely devoted to Paul I., their reception was very cold. But the others, who were attached to the grand-duke, and who, besides, were under the influence of Count Pahlen, who possessed considerable ascendancy over the army, did not hesitate to cry "Long live Alexander." The example was followed, and soon the young emperor was proclaimed, and placed in possession of the throne. He returned, and took up his residence with his wife, the Empress Elizabeth, at the Winter palace.

St. Petersburg was filled with consternation at the news of this bloody catastrophe. The impression it created, proved that the manners of the empire had undergone a change, and that since 1762, Russian manners had become modified by the influence of European civilization. It may be said to the honour of Russia, that if she had already progressed since 1762, she has equally advanced since 1800. The Russians exhibited, on that occasion, feelings which did them honour. They feared Paul I. and his insanity, more than they hated him, as he was not of a sanguinary character. The horrible circumstances of his death were immediately known, and inspired the deepest commiseration. His body lay in state according to usage, but infinite precautions were used to disguise his wounds. Military gloves concealed the mutilation of his hands. A large hat completely covered his head. His face was disfigured by contusions, but it was given out, that he had died of apoplexy.

This barbarous event produced an extraordinary effect throughout Europe. The news spread like lightning to Vienna, Berlin, London, and Paris. It caused the deepest horror and consternation. Some years previously, Paris had terrified all Europe by shedding royal blood; but at present, Paris exhibited a spectacle of order, humanity, and tranquillity; it was now the ancient monarchies, which in their turn scandalized the whole civilized world. A year before, the Neapolitan sovereign had imbrued his hands in the blood of his subjects; now a revolution in the palace, bathed the imperial throne of Russia in blood.

Thus, in this agitated age, every country in succession furnished melancholy examples, and supplied deplorable subjects of animadversion to its enemies! Truly, if nations wish to revile each other, their several histories furnish ample materials for mutual recrimination; but let us avoid recurring to these sad reminiscences for such a purpose. If we relate these horrible details, it is because truth is the first duty of the historian; it is because truth is the most useful, the most powerful of lessons, the most effectual in averting the recurrence of similar scenes; and thus, without offending any nation, let us say again, that the institutions are more to be blamed than the people; and that if, at St Petersburg, an emperor was murdered in order to bring about a change of policy; at London, on the contrary, without any sanguinary crisis, a peace policy followed a war policy, by the mere substitution of Mr. Addington in the place of Mr. Pitt.

The particulars of this catastrophe soon became public, through the indiscretion of the assassins themselves. At Berlin especially, where the court was closely connected with that of St Petersburg, the details of the crime spread with singular rapidity. The sister of the Soubows had taken refuge in that city, and had manifested, it was said, certain symptoms of uneasiness and anxiety, like one who waits some great event. It so happened that her son was the very officer appointed to announce to Prussia the accession of Alexander. This young man, with all the indiscretion of his age, partially divulged the particulars of the assassination, and thus occasioned at Potsdam a scandal which gave great offence to the young and virtuous King of Prussia. The court made this young man feel the impropriety of his conduct; but hence arose a foul calumny. This sister of the Soubows was on terms of intimate friendship with the English ambassador, Lord Whitworth,¹ who figured afterwards at Paris, and played there a very conspicuous part. The death of the Emperor Paul was so highly advantageous to the English, it occurred so opportunely to complete the doubtful victory of Copenhagen, that the vulgar throughout Europe readily ascribed the perpetration of this crime to British policy. The intimacy of the English ambassador with a family so deeply implicated in the assassination of Paul, furnished strong plausible surmises, confirmatory of the calumny, together with fresh arguments for those who can never perceive that events may originate in general and natural causes.

Nevertheless, none of these conjectures were founded in truth. Lord Whitworth was an honourable man, incapable of participating in such a plot. The cabinet by which he was accredited, had committed numerous unpardonable acts during many previous years, and, soon after, was guilty of others still more difficult to justify, but it was as much taken by surprise as the rest of Europe by the death of the Czar. And yet, the First Consul himself, notwithstanding the unquestionable impartiality of his judgment, could not help entertaining some suspicions, and he gave rise to still more, by the terms in which the death of the Emperor Paul was announced in the Moniteur. "It is for history," says this official journal, "to develop the mystery which surrounds this tragical death, and to declare which cabinet in the world was the most deeply interested in bringing about such a catastrophe."

This event delivered England from a relentless enemy, and deprived the First Consul of a powerful ally, but one that latterly was becoming embarrassing, and almost as dangerous as he was serviceable. It is certain that the deceased emperor, in the fulness of his arrogance, believing that the First Consul could no longer refuse him any thing in return for his alliance, had required conditions with regard to Italy, Germany, and Egypt, which France could never have conceded, and these demands must have interposed great obstacles to the re-establishment of peace, a desire for which was now becoming general throughout Europe. The First Consul selected his favourite aide-de-camp, Duroc, who had been previously sent to Berlin and to Vienna, and despatched him to Russia. He ordered him to repair to St Petersburg, with an autograph letter, to congratulate the new emperor on his accession, and to bring to bear all the powers of flattery and persuasion of a great man, in order to instil, if possible, into his mind, sound ideas concerning the relations between France and Russia.

Duroc set out instantly with orders to proceed by way of Berlin. He was to visit Prussia for the second time, collect more correct information respecting the recent events which had occurred in the North, and thus reach St Petersburg better acquainted with the men and the facts with which he would there have to deal.

England was delighted, as well she might be, with receiving at the same time the news of the victory of Copenhagen, and the death of the formidable adversary, who had originated the league of the neutral powers against her. The valour of the British hero, the gallant Nelson, was exalted to the skies, and that with a most natural and legitimate enthusiasm, for nations do well, in the first ecstasies of their joy, to celebrate, and even exaggerate their triumphs. Nevertheless, the first transports of enthusiasm being over, when the nation became more calm, the victory of Copenhagen was more correctly appreciated. The passage of the Sound had been, it was said, not very difficult to force: the attack on Copenhagen in a narrow strait, where the English ships could not manœuvre without great peril, was an adventurous, bold act, worthy of the victor at Aboukir. But the English fleet had been seriously disabled, and if it had not been for the too great eagerness of the Crown-Prince of Denmark to listen to Nelson's flag of truce, the day would probably have been lost. The victory had been very close upon a defeat, and moreover, the results obtained were quite unimportant, since the English had only extorted from the Danes a simple armistice, at the expiration of which the struggle must be renewed. If the emperor Paul had not died, this naval enterprise which the English must have prosecuted, in the midst of an enclosed sea, in which they could not put into any port, and the outlet, from which might be shut against them, must have had many terrible dangerous chances against its success. But the blow struck so opportunely against the power which commanded the entrance to the Baltic, that is to say, the Danes, was decisive;

¹ CHARLES EARL WHITWORTH, born in 1754. In 1786 he was appointed minister to Poland, then the centre of the intrigues which terminated in the dismemberment of that kingdom. In 1788 he proceeded in the same capacity to St. Petersburg, to bring about a coalition against France. In 1800 he was created Baron Whitworth. In 1802 was accredited plenipotentiary to Paris, where his mission terminated on the renewal of hostilities in the spring of 1803. He succeeded the Duke of Richmond as viceroy of Ireland, in 1814, and died in 1823, having in the interval been advanced to an Earldom.

Paul was no longer there to take up the gauntlet, and to continue the contest. This is an additional proof, illustrating the numberless others with which history abounds, that there are in this world many propitious chances in favour of boldness, especially when its efforts are seconded by sufficiently commanding ability.

The English immediately proceeded to take advantage of this fortunate change of sovereigns, by relaxing the rigour of the principles they had laid down respecting the maritime law of nations, so as to arrive at some honourable adjustment with Russia, and, after Russia, with all the remaining powers. They were well aware of the kind and amiable character of the young prince who had ascended the throne of Russia, as at that period it was pronounced to be rather bordering on weakness; and, besides, they flattered themselves with having regained considerable influence at St. Petersburg. They sent Lord St. Helens to that capital, with the necessary powers to effect an arrangement. M. de Woronzoff, ambassador of Russia to the Court of George III., wholly wedded to the cause of British policy, having even incurred the sequestration of his property on account of his not having quitted London, his accustomed place of residence, received an invitation to appear there in his official capacity, which he forthwith accepted. The vessels belonging to the neutral powers, detained in the English ports, were released. Nelson, by order of his government, continued inactive in the Baltic, and was instructed to intimate to the courts of the north, that he should refrain from any act of hostility, unless they determined to put their fleets to sea, in which case he should engage with them; but if, on the contrary, these fleets should remain in their respective ports, and not attempt to make the long-threatened junction with the Danish squadron, he should abstain from any hostile act against the coast of Denmark, of Sweden, and of Russia; that he should allow free passage to all the merchant vessels, and the relations between the countries should be upon the same footing as before the rupture.

The blow struck against Copenhagen had unfortunately produced its effect. The minor neutral powers, such as the Danes and the Swedes, although deeply irritated on their own account against England, had only been forced into the league by the menacing influence of Paul I. Prussia, who regarded her maritime interests as quite secondary compared with her other national interests, and who strongly inclined towards peace, had only engaged in the dispute, when urged on by the twofold influence of Paul I. and the First Consul: she, accordingly, felt overjoyed on finding herself extricated from such an embarrassment. She was, like the rest, eagerly disposed to co-operate in the re-establishment of commercial relations.

In a short time the trading vessels of all nations, English, Swedish, Danish, and Russian, reappeared in the Baltic: and trade and navigation resumed their accustomed activity. Nelson allowed them to pass unmolested, and received in return, along the northern coasts, the refreshments of which he stood in need. This virtual armistice was, therefore, generally acceded to. The Russian cabinet, directed by Count Pahlen, without yielding unbecomingly to British influence, showed a disposition to terminate the maritime dispute, by such an adjustment as would secure, up to a certain point, the rights of the neutrals. It intimated that they would receive Lord St. Helens. Already it had authorized the return of M. de Woronzoff to London, whither M. de Bernstoff also repaired, as the representative of Denmark.

The First Consul, who had ably contrived and elaborated this formidable coalition against Great Britain, a coalition founded moreover upon the interests of all the maritime nations, viewed with regret its dissolution, occasioned as it was by the weakness of the confederates. He tried to make them ashamed of the promptitude with which they receded; but each excused his conduct by the example of his neighbour. Denmark, justly proud of the bloody engagement of Copenhagen, declared that she had done her part, and that it was the duty of the others to perform theirs. Sweden expressed herself ready to fight; but, she added, that as the Danish, Prussian, and, above all, the Russian flags, were freely traversing the seas, she could not see why her subjects alone should be debarred from the benefits of trade. Prussia excused her inaction, by the change which had happened at St. Petersburg, but, at the same time, reiterated to France the warmest assurances of steadfast constancy. She declared that a just estimate would be formed of her perseverance in the cause, when the proper time arrived for concluding an arrangement, and the articles of the maritime law of nations should be definitively settled. Russia affected not to neglect the rights of the neutrals, but avowedly confined her endeavours to the accomplishment of one thing only, which was the cessation of hostilities commenced upon insufficient grounds.

The First Consul, who was desirous of retarding an accommodation between Prussia and England as long as possible, conceived a very ingenious expedient to prolong the dispute. He had offered Malta to Paul, and he now tendered Hanover to Prussia. We have seen that Prussia had occupied that province, so dear to the heart of George III., by way of reprisals for the violent acts which the English government had committed against the neutral flags. Prussia had lent herself with considerable hesitation to this act of aggression, but the secret longing which she has always felt for the possession of that province, the most desirable for her, that which would most conveniently enlarge and round off the frontiers of her territory, prompted her to seize upon it, notwithstanding her anxiety for peace and repose. Other motives also had influenced her. She had, besides, an indemnity to claim in when the French Revolution broke out; and took an active part in Russian diplomacy during the reigns of Catherine, Paul I., and Alexander.

¹ COUNT ALEXANDER WORONZOFF, made chancellor and minister of foreign affairs, in 1802, by Alexander. His brother, S. Woronzoff, was ambassador in London

Germany, as she was amongst the number of the secular princes, who were to be indemnified for their losses on the left bank of the Rhine, by the secularization of the ecclesiastical states. These claims were very large, and in the hope that the First Consul would favour them, she was anxious to propitiate him, by taking possession of Hanover. General Bonaparte declared at once, that if she wished to keep Hanover, and indemnify herself thereby, although this indemnity was of ten times greater value than the amount to which she was entitled, he would willingly consent, without giving way to any jealousy at this great augmentation, conceded to a power whose territory was conterminous with France. This proposal at once delighted, and disturbed the young monarch. The offer was a seductive one, but the chief stumbling-block was, the resentment of England. Nevertheless, without accepting the proposal in a definitive manner, the cabinet of Berlin replied, that the King Frederick William was fully sensible of the friendly dispositions of the First Consul, that he had come to no resolution yet, that it was better to defer the consideration of this territorial question till the negotiations for a general peace throughout Europe; and he added, that grounding his conduct upon the present state of things, which was an armistice tacitly acquiesced in, rather than formally stipulated, he should continue to keep possession of Hanover.

The First Consul did not require more, being content with having thereby involved the courts of London and Berlin in a question of the most complicated solution, and placed in the hands of a power which was devoted to him a precious pledge, which could be most advantageously used in the negotiations with England.

The period of these negotiations at length approached. England had seized with avidity the opportunity of relaxing the rigour of her maritime principles, with a view of quelling the danger which threatened her in the north; she was now anxious to terminate this state of things, and to conclude peace, not only with the neutrals, but with a power still more formidable than they—with France, which during the last ten years had convulsed all Europe, and which began to threaten the British soil with serious dangers. At one period, thanks to the obstinacy of Mr. Pitt, and the talents of General Bonaparte, she found herself alone, contending against all the world; having extricated herself from this position by a successful act of temerity, by a fortuitous stroke of good fortune, she was averse to again incur similar dangers, through a repetition of similar errors. England, moreover, could now treat with honour, and it was expedient, after having lost so many good opportunities, not to miss the one which now presented itself. Why, reasoned the people of England, why prolong the war? We have taken all the colonies worth having: France, at the same time, has vanquished all the allies, to which we have been attached; she has aggrandized herself at their expense, and has become the most formidable power in the universe. Every day added to the struggle renders it more serious, especially through her successive conquest of all the European coasts and harbours. She has reduced Holland and Naples, and at the present moment is marching against Portugal. We must not render her more powerful, by pertinaciously persisting in the prosecution of the war. If it was for the maintenance of the most salutary principles that we contended some years past; if it was for social order menaced by the French revolution; that is now no longer the case, since France affords the brightest example of order and of wisdom. Can we think to re-establish the Bourbons? There, indeed, was Mr. Pitt's grand error, his mistaken policy: and if his great influence, his great talents are lost to us, we must secure the only advantage we can from his retirement, that is to say, we must relinquish that unremitting, malignant spirit of hatred, which dictated the most imprudent and gross personalities between him and General Bonaparte.

All sensible, reflecting men in England were in favour of peace. This feeling had the powerful support of the king and the people. The pious and obstinate King of England, who refused the emancipation of the Catholics to Mr. Pitt, out of fidelity to the Protestant cause, did not the less rejoice at the restoration of Catholicism in France, a re-establishment which was expected soon to take place. He viewed in that, the triumph of religious principles, and was content. He had a great aversion to the French Revolution, and although General Bonaparte had thwarted and seriously counteracted the policy of England, he was greatly pleased with him for the reaction against that revolution, and for reinstating true social principles in public opinion. France, which possesses in such an eminent degree the power of communicating to other nations the feelings she herself experiences, being now calmed down, brought back to sound notions, King George III. regarded the blessings of social order as preserved to mankind. If with Mr. Pitt the war had been one of national ambition, as respected George III. it had been a war of principle. General Bonaparte might, therefore, consider him as a friend, but a friend of a very different stamp from Paul I. Having recovered from the attack which had obscured his reason during several months, he was now decidedly inclined to peace, and pressed his ministers to conclude it. The English people, fond of novelty, looked upon a peace with the French as the greatest of novelties; for they had slaughtered each other, during the last ten years, in every quarter of the world; ascribing also the prevailing scarcity to the sanguinary struggle which desolated both land and sea, they called loudly for a reconciliation with France. Moreover, the new prime minister, Mr. Addington, unfit to aspire to the same glory as Mr. Pitt, to whom he was greatly inferior in talents, in celebrity, and in general administrative capacity, had but one plain intelligible object in view, which was to make peace. He accordingly desired to bring it about, and Mr. Pitt, still powerful in parliament, could not but to this step, as the most expedient. The events in the north, far from swelling the pride of England, disposed her, on the contrary, to seize a very convenient and very honourable opportunity of negotiating. The new minister had determined upon this on the day he assumed office; and he was only confirmed in his resolution, when the intelligence reached him of what had taken place at Copenhagen, and at St. Petersburg. Going still further, he decided upon making a direct overture to the First Consul, which would correspond with the initiative taken by the latter towards England upon his accession to power.

Lord Hawkesbury, who presided over the Foreign office in Mr. Addington's administration, sent for M. Otto. This gentleman transacted in London, as we have already seen, the diplomatic business relative to the prisoners, and had been six months before intrusted with the duties connected with the naval armistice. He was, therefore, the natural medium of fresh communications, which were about to take place between the two governments. Lord Hawkesbury informed M. Otto that the king had confided to him a most agreeable task, the knowledge of which would no doubt cause as much pleasure in France as in England, and this was, to propose peace. He said, that his majesty was even ready to send a plenipotentiary to Paris, if it were so desired, or to any other city more agreeable to the French Consul. Lord Hawkesbury added, that the conditions which it was his intention to propose, were perfectly honourable to both countries, and as a proof of the sincerity of this reconciliation, he declared, that from that day, every design directed against the present government of France, should be discountenanced by the British cabinet. He expected a full reciprocity on the part of the French Republic.

This was disavowing the antecedent policy of Mr. Pitt, who had always pretended to aim at the re-establishment of the Bourbons, and who had unremittingly fomented the attempts of the emigrants and the Vendéans by English gold. The negotiations could not have been opened in a more dignified manner. Lord Hawkesbury, however, required a prompt reply.

The First Consul, who at that time only aimed at keeping faithfully the pledge made to France, to procure for the country peace and tranquillity, was delighted with this solution of the question, which he had, in fact, obtained by his successes, and by the wisdom of his policy. He accepted the overtures of England with as much eagerness as she had shown in proposing them. Nevertheless, a negotiation of formality appeared to him tedious, and not sufficiently efficacious. The remembrance of that of Lord Malmesbury, in 1797, which was but an empty demonstration on the part of Mr. Pitt, had left an unpleasant impression on his mind. He thought that, if they were really sincere at London, as indeed they appeared really to be, it was quite sufficient to confer directly with the Foreign Office, and there discuss, with frankness and candour, the conditions of peace. He considered these easy of arrangement, if a reconciliation were sincerely intended. "For," said he, "England has taken the Indies, and we have taken Egypt; if we mutually agree, each to preserve these rich conquests, the rest is but of little importance. Of what importance are, in fact, a few islands in the West Indies, or elsewhere, which England keeps from us, or our allies, compared with the vast conquests we have made! Can she refuse to restore them when Hanover is in our hands, when Portugal will soon be so, and we offer to evacuate these kingdoms in return for a few islands in America? Peace is therefore easy to be brought about," so ran his despatch to M. Otto, "if the English desire it. I empower you to treat, but directly only with Lord Hawkesbury."

Full powers were sent to M. Otto with a recommendation not to make any thing public, to write as little as possible, to negotiate verbally, and only to exchange written notes upon the most important questions. It was impossible to keep such a negotiation an absolute secret; but the First Consul enjoined M. Otto to require and, on his part, to observe the greatest discretion, relative to those questions which must necessarily on both sides be raised and discussed.

Lord Hawkesbury, in the name of the King of England, consented to this mode of proceeding, and it was agreed that the conferences should commence at once at London, between him and M. Otto. They did really open, in the early part of April, 1801—middle of Germinal, year IX.

From the 18th Brumaire, year VIII.—9th of November, 1799—to the month of Germinal, year IX.—April, 1801—eighteen months had elapsed, and France, at peace with the continent, engaged in a frank and sincere negotiation with England, was about to obtain, for the first time for ten years, a general peace on land, and at sea. The condition of this general peace, admitted by all the contracting parties, was the preservation of our brilliant conquests.

BOOK X.

EVACUATION OF EGYPT.

Public attention directed toward the Negotiation transacting at London—The question arises as to the Influence of the death of Paul I. on this Negotiation—State of the Court of Russia—Character of Alexander—He and his young friends form a Secret Government, which directs all the affairs of the Empire—Alexander consents to greatly reduce the claims brought to Paris by M. de Kalitscheff, in the name of Paul I.—He receives Duroc with Kindness—Commencement of the Negotiation begun at London—Conditions announced on both sides—Conquests of the two countries by Land and by Sea—England consents to restore a portion of her Maritime Conquests, but makes all depend on the question of France keeping possession of Egypt The two Governments tacitly agree to temporize, in order to await the issue of the Military Operations. The First Consul, aware that the Negotiation depends on these Operations, incites Spain to march against Portugal, and endeavours anew to succour Egypt—Employment of the Naval Forces—Various expeditions projected—Voyage of Gantheume after leaving Brest—This Admiral passes the Straits of Gibraltar without interruption—About to repair to Alexandria, he is alarmed at imaginary dangers and re-enters Toulon—State of Egypt after the death of Kleber—Submission of the Country and prosperous Situation of the Colony—Incapacity and anarchy in the Commanders—Deplorable differences of the Generals—Ill-conceived Measures of Menou, who wants to manage every thing at once—Notwithstanding the repeated information of the approach of an English expedition, he takes no precautionary steps—Disembarkation of the English in the Bay of Aboukir on the 8th of March—General Friant, whose force is reduced to fifteen hundred men, vainly attempts to repulse them—Two battalions added to the division of Alexandria would have saved Egypt—The forces commanded by Menou are concentrated too late—Arrival of the division Lanusse, and a second combat with an insufficient force, on the 13th of March—Menou at last arrives with the main body of the army—Melancholy consequences of the division of the Generals—Plan of a decisive battle—Battle of Canopen, fought on the 21st of March without any decisive results—The English remain Masters of the Shore of Alexandria—Tedious temporizing, during which Menou might yet have retrieved the affairs of the French, by operating against the detached bodies of the enemy—He does nothing—The English make an attempt against Rosetta, and succeed in seizing one of the Mouths of the Nile—They penetrate into the interior—The last chance of saving Egypt lost at Ramanieh through the incapacity of General Menou—The English seize Ramanieh, and separate the division of Cairo from that of Alexandria—The French army, divided into two, has no choice left but that of capitulation—Surrender of Cairo by General Belliard—Menou, shut up in Alexandria, dreams of the glory of a defence resembling that of Genoa—Egypt finally lost to the French.

THE end proposed by the First Consul in assuming supreme power, was soon to be attained, for tranquillity reigned in France, deep satisfaction filled the bosom of every one, and the peace signed at Lunéville with Austria, Germany and the Italian powers, concluded, in fact, with Russia, was being negotiated at London with England. Once formally signed by these two last powers, peace would become general, and, in twenty-two months, the youthful Bonaparte would have accomplished his noble task, and rendered his country the happiest and greatest of the powers of the universe. But this great work was to be terminated, and, above all, peace to be concluded with England; for, as long as this power had not laid down her arms, the ocean was not free, and what was still more dangerous, the continental war might again break forth by the influence of the British subsidies. True it is, that owing to her universal exhaustion, England has but a slender chance of arming anew the continent; she had even recently seen the greater part of it leagued with us against her naval power, and, except for the death of Paul I., might have cruelly expiated her attacks on neutrality. This sudden death, however, was a recent and serious occurrence, which could not fail in modifying the aspect of affairs. What influence would the catastrophe of Petersburg exert over the condition of Europe? As yet this was not known, and the First Consul, impatient for the information, sent Duroc to Petersburg, in order to procure the earliest and most authentic intelligence.

A short time before the death of Paul, the relations with Russia had been surrounded with very great difficulties, in consequence of the excessive pride of that emperor, and the not less excessive pride of his ambassador at Paris, M. de Kalitscheff. The late Czar, as we have elsewhere said, wished to dictate the conditions of France with Bavaria, Wurtemberg, Piedmont, the Two Sicilies, of which states he had made himself the protector, either by his own will, or by obligation, in consequence of the treaties which had united the second coalition. He even wished to regulate our relations with the Porte, and pretended that the First Consul ought to evacuate Egypt, because this province belonged to the Sultan, and, in his opinion, it could not be justly taken from him.

This ally, excited as he was against the English, was far from not being dangerous, and misunderstandings might easily arise with him. Moreover, what could only seem an evidence of folly in the Emperor Paul, was a singular symptom of the progress of Russian ambition, for three quarters of a century. In fact, scarcely eighty years since, Peter the Great, attracting for the first time the attention of Europe, contented himself in desiring to affect the north of Europe, by struggling against Charles XII., in the creation of a king of Poland. Forty years subsequently, Russia, carrying her ambition into Germany, strove against Frederick, with Austria and France, in order to prevent the formation of the Prussian power. A few years later, in 1772, she divided Poland. In 1778, she took another step, and regulating, in conjunction with France, the affairs of Germany, she interposed her mediating influence between Prussia and Austria, about to quarrel for the succession of Bavaria, and had the distinguished honour of guaranteeing, at Leschen, the Germanic Constitution. Lastly, before the expiration of the century, in 1799, she sent one hundred thousand Russians into Italy, not concerning a question of territory, but a moral question, for the preservation, as she said, of the equilibrium of Europe, and of social order, threatened by the French Revolution.

Never, in so short a space of years, had any single power attained so high a degree of influence. Paul, by wishing to make himself the universal arbiter, as the price of his alliance with the First Consul, was merely the dupe of a policy, which, in the Russian cabinet, was the result of profound reflection. His representative at Paris demanded, with cold and well-maintained haughtiness, what his master required with the ordinary impetuosity of his will. He even affected, awkwardly enough, to create himself the protector of the lesser powers, which, after having offended France, were now completely at her mercy. The court of Naples was anxious to put herself under this protection, but it availed her but little, for M. de Gallo had been dismissed from Paris, and his court obliged to submit, at Florence, to the conditions of the First Consul. M. de Saint Massan, the representative of the House of Savoy, near the French Republic, having desired to follow in the footsteps of M. de Gallo, was likewise dismissed.

M. de Kalitscheff hastened to protest for the courts of Naples and Turin, of which his master had guaranteed the dominions; and he pretended, whilst signing a treaty with France, not to be limited to stipulating the restoration of amicable relations between two empires, which had nothing to dispute about with each other by land or by sea, but also to regulate the affairs of Germany and Italy, almost in all their minutiae, but even those of the East, for he persisted in demanding the restoration of Egypt to the Sublime Porte.

Notwithstanding the desire to maintain friendly terms with the Emperor Paul, his ambassador was answered with firmness. It had been agreed to add to the open treaty, which re-established merely peace and friendship between the two states, a secret clause, in which the French cabinet engaged to treat with Russia concerning the regulation of the Germanic indemnities, to favour particularly the Courts of Baden, Wurtemberg, and Bavaria, its allies or relations; to reserve an indemnification for the House of Savoy, if its states were not restored, but without stipulating where, how much, nor when; for the First Consul had already formed the project of reserving Piedmont for France. This was all they would grant. As regards Naples, the treaty of Florence was declared irrevocable; and they determined not to listen to a word on the subject of the restoration of Egypt.

M. de Kalitscheff insisting in rather an unusual tone and manner, they at last ceased to reply to him, and he was left in Paris singularly embarrassed with the part he was to perform, and with his promises to the lesser powers. In this state of affairs, information arrived of the tragical death of Paul. M. de Kalitscheff, without waiting for the orders of his new sovereign, wishing to extricate himself from his false position, on the 26th of April addressed a peremptory note to M. de Talleyrand, asking for an immediate answer on all the points of the negotiation, complaining that conditions agreed upon, as he said, at Berlin, by General Beurnonville and M. de Krudener, were disputed at Paris. He even seemed to insinuate, that if the weaker states were not treated more kindly by France, the glory of the First Consul would be tarnished, and his government would be confounded with the revolutionary governments which had preceded it.

M. de Talleyrand answered instantly, that his despatch was ill-timed; that it was wanting in those courtesies due to each other by independent powers; that it would not be submitted to the inspection of the First Consul, lest his dignity be offended; that M. de Kalitscheff might consider it as not having been received and that the answer demanded in the name of his cabinet, would be granted only when the requisition was made in other terms, and in another despatch.

This severe lesson had its effect upon M. de Kalitscheff. He appeared uneasy as to the consequences of his conduct. Already the little protégés who had sheltered themselves behind him, began to be afraid of his protectorate, and to regret having confided their interests to him. M. de Kalitscheff, reduced to the necessity of remaining without an answer, or of renewing his claims in a more proper form, wrote a second despatch, in which he repeated his demand of explanation, enumerating each topic, without any remark, complaint, and without any compliments. The despatch was cold, but decorous. M. de Talleyrand then informed him, that, in their new form, his questions should be submitted to the First Consul, and an early answer to them returned. M. de Talleyrand likewise added that the latter despatch alone should be preserved in the archives of the French chancery, and that the former should be destroyed.

In a few days, M. de Talleyrand replied to M. de Kalitscheff, in polite but very positive terms. He reiterated, on every topic, the opinion of the French cabinet, and added this very natural reflection that, if France had consented, on many of the most important affairs of Europe, to agree in a friendly manner with Prussia, and had appeared disposed to do what the latter desired, it was in consideration of the intimate alliance contracted with Paul I. against the British policy: but that, since the accession of the Czar Alexander, before granting the same terms, it would be necessary to ascertain if the new emperor entertained the same views, and would prove as faithful and determined an ally as his deceased predecessor.

From that time, M. de Kalitscheff remained quiet, and awaited the instructions of his new master.

The prince who had just ascended the throne of the czars was a singular being, as were the majority of the princes who had reigned in Russia, during a century. Alexander was twenty-five years of age, of a lofty stature, a noble and gentle, though somewhat irregular countenance, his understanding was acute and penetrating, his heart most generous, and his grace unequalled. Nevertheless, there might be perceived in him some tinge of paternal infirmities. His disposition was quick, capable of easily receiving impressions, but versatile, and embracing alternately the most opposite ideas. Impulse alone did not, however, govern this remarkable potentate: in his extensive and chameleon-like intelligence, there were depths which escaped the keenest observers. He was honest, and at the same time dissembling, capable of artifice, and already he had given some intimation of these qualities and these defects, in the tragical events which had preceded his elevation to the throne. Let it not be supposed, for a moment, that we wish to calumniate this illustrious prince: he was entirely deceived as to the projects of Count Pahlen; with the inexperience of youth, he supposed that the abdication of his father was the sole object and would be the sole result of the conspiracy of which he had been made a confidant: and he believed, that by yielding to it, he would save the empire, his mother, his brothers, and himself from singular danger. When the truth flashed upon his mind, he detected his error, and those who had made him particeps criminis. This young emperor, in short, of noble appearance, gracious manners, witty, enthusiastic, versatile, subtle, difficult to fathom, was endowed with unexampled personal attraction and destined to exercise the greatest sway over his contemporaries. It was even his fate to exert this sway over that extraordinary man, so difficult to deceive, who then governed France, and with whom, in after years, he had so many great and terrible contests.

The education received by the young prince had been very singular. Colonel Laharpe, his tutor, had inspired him with the sentiments and ideas of a Swiss republican. Alexander had yielded, with his usual docility, to the influence of his preceptor, and was evidently tinged by it even on his accession. Whilst he was an imperial prince, always governed by an iron rule, sometimes that of Catherine, sometimes of Paul, he had formed intimacies with some young men of his own age, such as M. Paul Strogonoff, M. de Nowosiltzoff, and especially with Prince Czartorisky. This last, descended from one of the most illustrious families of Poland, and deeply attached to his country, dwelt at Petersburg as a sort of hostage: he served in the regiment of guards, and lived at the court with the young grand-dukes. Alexander, attracted toward him by a kind of community of sentiment and ideas, revealed to him the dreams of his youth. Both secretly deplored the misfortunes of Poland, natural enough in a descendant of the Czartorisky family, but rather astonishing in a grandson of Catherine: and Alexander swore to his friend, that, at his accession to the throne, he would restore to unhappy Poland her laws and her liberty.

Paul having perceived this intimacy became offended at it, and exiled Prince Czartorisky by appointing him minister near a king without dominions, the King of Sardinia. Alexander was hardly emperor, when he sent a courier to his friend, then residing at Rome, and desired him to repair to Petersburg. He also brought near him M. Paul Strogonoff and M. de Nowosiltzoff. He thus formed a species of secret government of young men, without experience, animated by generous sentiments, which all have not preserved, filled with illusions, and but little fitted, it must be confessed, to direct a great state in the crisis of the time. They were impatient to get rid of the old Russians who had hitherto governed, and for whom they felt not the slightest sympathy. One personage alone, Prince Kotschoubey, more advanced in years, and more grave in demeanour, added to this society of young men, served to temper, by a more mature reason, the vivacity of their youth. He had travelled over Europe, acquired valuable information, and constantly pointed out to his sovereign improvements which he deemed would be useful to the internal government of the empire. All together blamed the policy which had first consisted in waging war upon France, on account of the Revolution, and then on England under the pretext of supporting the rights of nations. They desired neither a war of principle upon France, nor a maritime war upon England. According to them, the great empire of the north was to hold the balance between these two powers, which threatened to devour the world in their quarrel, and was thus to become the arbiter of Europe, the support of weak against powerful states. But, they were generally less occupied with the external policy than with the interior regeneration of the empire; their only object was to give it new institutions, modelled partly on those found in civilized countries: they had, in a word, the generosity, the inexperience, and the vanity of youth.

The ostensible ministers of Alexander were old Russians, prejudiced against France, infatuated in favour of England, and, above all, very disagreeable to their sovereign. Count Pahlen alone, thanks to the firmness of his judgment, did not share the prejudices of his colleagues, and wished to yield to no influence, but to remain neutral between England and France. In this respect, his ideas suited the new emperor and his friends. But Count Pahlen had the indiscretion to treat Alexander like a youthful prince, whom he had placed on the throne, had directed, and wished still to direct. The highly sensitive vanity of his young master was frequently wounded by him. Count Pahlen likewise treated with harshness the dowager empress, who displayed a pompous grief, and an inextinguishable hatred against the murderers of her husband. In a religious institution under her control, the dowager empress had placed a statue of the Virgin, with the Emperor Paul at her feet, invoking vengeance on his assassins. Count Pahlen caused the image to be removed, despite the remonstrances of the empress and the displeasure of her son. A power so imperiously exerted could not be of long duration.

During the early part of the reign, Count Panin continued to preside over the foreign relations: and Count Pahlen was the chief minister, taking a part in every thing. Alexander, after concerting with his friends, assisted at the meetings of his ostensible ministers. Swayed by these different and sometimes contrary influences, he determined to treat with England, and to begin by removing the embargo on British commerce, which embargo, in his opinion, was an unjust measure. It was decided to make with Lord St. Helena a maritime regulation which should preserve, if not the rights of neutrals, at least the interests of the Russian commerce. Alexander, including among the visionary ideas of his father, the idea of being grand-master of the Order of Jerusalem, declared that he wished to be merely its protector, whilst waiting until the different tongues composing the order were collected, and had named a new grand-master. This resolution caused many difficulties to vanish, either with England, which attached great importance to Malta, or with France, which was not anxious to embark in a desperate war, in order to reduce the island to subjection; or lastly with Rome and Spain, which had never consented to recognise the grand-master of St. John of Jerusalem in an heretical prince.

In order to end another subject of dispute, that with France, it was decided that the evacuation of Egypt should no longer be demanded: for, in fact, it was more to their interest to see it in the hands of the French than in those of the English. As to Naples and Piedmont, they were said to be bound by solemn treaties, and in the commencement of his reign, Alexander was anxious to give an exalted idea of his loyalty. It was determined to ask for the court of Naples, not the revocation of the treaty of Florence, but the guarantee of its actual dominions, and the peaceable evacuation of the gulf of Tarentum. As to Piedmont, it was concluded to ask for the house of Savoy, either Piedmont itself, or, failing that, a proportionate indemnity. Lastly, Alexander desired to regulate, in unison with France, the indemnity promised to the German princes, for the loss of their territories on the left of the Rhine. All this was free from difficulty, for the First Consul had already consented to it. M. de Kalitscheff was recalled, and replaced by M. de Markoff, an intelligent man, but, as regards diplomatic rules, no better than his predecessor.

Duroc, sent to congratulate the young emperor, found, on his arrival at Petersburg, all these points settled, and received, both from the ministers and the monarch himself, a cordial welcome. His elegant address, and intelligence, succeeded in Russia as well as in Prussia, and he inspired esteem and confidence. After the formal audiences, he obtained several private interviews, in which Alexander seemed to take a pride in displaying his inmost thoughts before the representative of the First Consul. One day, especially, in one of the public gardens of St. Petersburg, the prince perceived Duroc, went up to him, accosted him with a most condescending familiarity, sent his officers away, and, leading him to a by-place, seemed to express himself with entire frankness. "I am," said he, "and have long been the friend of France. I admire your new chief, and appreciate what he has done for the tranquillity of his country and the confirmation of social order in Europe. From me he never need fear another war between the two empires. But he must support me, and cease to furnish pretexts to all those jealous of his power. You see that I have made concessions. I do not speak of Egypt;

I prefer that it should belong to France than to England: and if, unfortunately, the English should seize it, I would join you in wresting it from them. I have renounced Malta, in order to suppress one of the difficulties which shackled the peace of Europe. I am bound to the Kings of Piedmont and Naples by treaties; I know they have done wrong towards France, but how could they avoid it, surrounded and threatened as they were by England. It would give me great pain to see the First Consul seize Piedmont, as might be supposed was his intention from the recent acts of his administration. Naples complains of the severance of a portion of her territory. All this is unworthy of the ambition of the First Consul and tarnishes his glory. He is not accused, like the governments which preceded him, with threatening social order, but he is accused of desiring to invade all countries. That injures him, and exposes me to the brawlings of all these little princes, by whom I am beset. Let him remove these difficulties between us, and in future we will live in perfect harmony with each other."

Alexander, giving reign to his enthusiasm, added: tell nothing of all this to my ministers; be discreet; employ none but trusty couriers. But tell General Bonaparte to send me men in whom I can confide. The most direct relations are the best, to maintain a good understanding between the two governments. Alexander said a few words in relation to England. He affirmed that he was unwilling to yield to her the liberty of the seas, the common property of all nations; that if he had removed the embargo from her vessels, it was from a feeling of justice. Former treaties granted to English merchants, in case of a rupture, one year to settle their affairs; it would have been an injustice to seize their property, and that, cried Alexander, I never will commit; such was my only motive. But I do not intend giving myself up to England. It depends on the First Consul alone, whether I shall remain his ally, his friend.

The young emperor, in this interview, appeared sincere, confiding, anxious to separate himself from his ministers, and to show that he had his own views and private policy.

Duroc left Petersburg, loaded with the marks of his consideration, and testimonials in his favour.

It was evident, after these communications, that no great assistance could be expected from Russia against England, but it was hoped that in future we should have much less difficulty with her, in the arrangement of general affairs. The First Consul, now certain of rightly understanding this court, was in no haste to terminate the negotiation, because every day seemed to smooth the difficulties still subsisting between them and us. England, in fact, evinced at that moment but little interest for the houses of Naples and Piedmont, and if, as there was reason to believe, she no longer made their welfare one of the conditions of peace, it would be much more easy to pursue any course in regard to those two houses, when England herself was willing to yield them to the First Consul.

The negotiation with England became therefore the essential, and nearly the sole object of the day. In order to attain this end, it was necessary not only to diplomatize skilfully with London, but also to carry on the war vigorously in Portugal, and energetically to contest the possession of Egypt by the British forces, for the issue of events in these two countries was destined to exert a deep influence on the future treaty. The First Consul, wishing to throw an additional weight into the scale, even made very evident preparations at Boulogne and Calais, in order to let it be understood that the extreme measure of an expedition against England, of which the Directory had long thought, was neither forgotten by him, nor beyond his means. Numerous bodies of troops were concentrated in this part of France, and a large quantity of strongly constructed gunboats, fitted for the transportation of soldiers, and the passage of the straits of Calais, was collected on the coast of Normandy, Picardy, and Flanders.

According to agreement, Lord Hawkesbury and M. Otto had employed the middle of April, 1801—Germinal, year IX.—in diplomatic conferences. The first claims, in obedience to custom, had been excessive. England proposed a very simple basis of arrangement, which was the uti possidetis, that is to say, that each power should preserve all that had fallen into its hands by the chances of war. England, in fact, taking advantage of the prolonged struggle of Europe against France, had enriched herself whilst her allies were becoming exhausted, and had seized the colonies of all nations. She had taken possession of the entire continent of India, as well as of the most important commercial positions in the four quarters of the globe. From the Dutch, she had taken Ceylon, that large and rich island, which, situated at the extremity of the Indian continent, adds so much to its beauty. She had acquired the other possessions of the Dutch in the Indian ocean, except, indeed, the great colony of Java. She had wrested from them the Cape of Good Hope, between the two oceans, and one of the best situated maritime stations in the world. Her most vigorous efforts could not obtain the Isle of France, of which we did not lose possession. In South America, she had also taken from the unhappy Dutch, the greatest sufferers in this war, the territories of Guiana, extending from the Amazon to the Orinoco, such as Surinam, Berbice, Demerara, Essequibo, valuable countries, which, however, neither presented then, nor offer at this time any very considerable agricultural or commercial advantages, but which are destined to enjoy at some period an immense prosperity, and which then had the merit of being one step made toward the great Spanish colonies of the American continent. England coveted these colonies: she intended at least to drive them to independence, in order to revenge her losses in North America, and consoled herself with the idea that when once independent, they would soon become the prey of her commerce. For this same reason, she attached great importance to a conquest in the Antilles, the island of Trinity, taken from the Spaniards, situated near South America, like a kind of foot-hold, advantageously located either for smuggling, or for the invasion of the Spanish possessions. She had also made another acquisition of great value in the Antilles, in the island of Martinico, taken from the French. The means used were scarcely lawful, for the colonists of Martinico, fearing a servile insurrection, had voluntarily intrusted themselves to her: and this voluntary trust was construed into a formal surrender. England retained Martinico on account of the immense harbour in that island. She had also taken in the Antilles, St. Lucie and Tobago, islands much smaller than the preceding, and in the direction of the fisheries, St. Pierre and Miquelon. Lastly, in Europe she had taken from the Spaniards the most valuable of the Balearic islands, and from the French, who had won it by conquest from the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, Malta, the queen of the Mediterranean.

After these conquests, it may be said that there was but little left to fight for, except the continental possessions of the Spaniards in the two Americas. The English did, indeed, threaten, if the invasion of Portugal was insisted in, to indemnify themselves by taking Brazil.

By way of retaliation for these vast maritime possessions, France had seized the most valuable portions of the continent of Europe, assuredly much more important than all these distant countries; but she had restored them, except the part comprised between the great lines of the Alps, Rhine, and Pyrenees. She had, moreover, conquered a colony, which alone was an ample indemnification for all the colonial greatness added to England, namely Egypt. No possession equalled it in value. Egypt was the most certain route to India, should it ever be desirable to shake the British power in that country. In peace, therefore, as well as in war, it was the most valuable colony in the globe. If, for the time, the chief of the French government had thought of France alone, and not of his allies, he might have accepted the bargain proposed by England; for Martinico itself, the only direct and important loss experienced by France in this war, was nothing in comparison with Egypt, an actual empire situated between the eastern and western oceans, at once commanding and shortening the navigation of these waters. But it was a point of honour with the First Consul to cause the greater part of the possessions of the allies of France to be restored to them. He could not save Holland from the mortification of the sacrifices which she had suffered, in consequence of the defection of her navy, which, as is well known, had followed the Stadtholder into England; but he insisted on the restoration of the Cape and Guiana: he was anxious that Spain, having gained nothing in the war, should not lose any thing, and that the Balearic and Trinity islands should be returned to her. Lastly, he was determined to yield Malta at no price, for such a measure would tend to weaken and render precarious the conquest of Egypt. His intention was to leave to the English Hindostan, even with the small factories of China.

dermagor and Pondicherry, which had no interest for us; to add to that Ceylon, a Dutch possession, but to demand the restitution of the Cape, the Guianas, Trinity, Martinico, Malta, the Balearic islands, and to retain Egypt, considering that conquest as an equivalent to France for the acquisition of the continent of India by the English. We shall hereafter see the course he pursued to attain this end during a negotiation which lasted five whole months.

Under the pretext of adopting the uti possidetis, as a basis of the future treaty of peace, the French negotiator was ordered to answer by peremptory arguments. You wish to lay down as a principle, said he to Lord Hawkesbury, that each nation shall retain what she has conquered. In that case, France should keep in Germany, Baden, Wurtemberg, Bavaria, and three-fourths of Austria: in Italy she should retain all Italy itself; that is, the ports of Genoa, Leghorn, Naples, Venice; they should keep possession of Switzerland, which she intends to evacuate as soon as a reasonable order of affairs is restored: she should keep Holland, occupied by her armies, and where, by her influence, the most powerful fleets might be equipped. She might take Hanover, and give it as a compensation to certain continental powers, and thus attach them to her for ever. She might, in short, complete the campaign commenced against Portugal, indemnify Spain with the spoils of that country, and secure to herself new ports. The maritime positions extending from the Texel to Lisbon and Cadiz, from Cadiz to Genoa, from Genoa to Otranto, and from Otranto to Venice, are of the greatest importance. Peace will be impossible if absolute principles are advanced in the negotiation. France has returned the greater part of her conquests to all the governments vanquished by her; to Austria she has restored a part of Italy; to the court of the Two Sicilies, the kingdom of Naples: to the Pope, all the Roman states: she has given Tuscany, which she might have easily retained, to the house of Spain; she has re-established the independence of Genoa; she wishes to make of Lombardy a friendly republic, and is preparing to evacuate Switzerland, Holland, and even Hanover. England, therefore, must restore a portion of her conquests. Those claimed by France do not affect her directly, but belong to her allies. France considers it a duty to recover, in order to restore them. Again, when India and Ceylon are yielded to England in comparison with these, those of which the restoration is demanded sink into insignificance. If no concessions are made, it must be said, and openly declared, that the negotiation is merely a decoy. The world will know which power has prevented the establishment of peace. France will then make a last effort, and this difficult, and undoubtedly dangerous effort, may perhaps strike a mortal blow at England's prosperity, for the First Consul does not despair of being able to cross the straits of Calais at the head of a hundred thousand men.

Lord Hawkesbury and Mr. Addington negotiated with the desire of obtaining a peace advantageous for themselves, naturally enough, but an immediate peace. They appreciated the arguments of the French cabinet, and were struck with the firmness of their assertions. They immediately lowered the tone of their pretensions, and seemed about to effect a reconciliation. They replied in the first place to the argument of the First Consul, drawn from the conquests restored by France, that if France had abandoned a portion of her conquests it was, because she could not keep them, whilst no naval power on earth could take from England the colonies she had conquered: that if France restored a portion of the territories occupied by her armies, she retained Nice, Savoy, the shores of the Rhine, and above all the mouths of the Scheldt and Antwerp, all of which considerably increased her, not only by land but by sea; that it was necessary to re-establish the equilibrium of Europe which had been destroyed, that it must be re-established, if not on the continent where it was wholly lost, at least on the ocean; that if France wished to retain Egypt, India was no longer a sufficient compensation for England, and that the British cabinet would then retain a great portion of her new possessions. Nevertheless, added Lord Hawkesbury, we have merely made the first proposal, and are prepared to remove whatever may seem too exacting in it. We will restore some of our conquests. Inform us only which are those to which you attach the greatest importance.

The First Consul replied warmly to the arguments of the British ministers. In his opinion it was incorrect to say, that England could maintain all her naval conquests, while France, on the contrary, was unable to retain her continental possessions. The continental war being at an end, either in consequence of the absolute exhaustion of a portion of the allies of England or of the disgust felt by the others at her alliance, France, aided by the resources of Holland, Spain, and Italy, might have wreaked her will on the continent. She was in a condition of performing on the ocean more than was supposed by the British ministers. France, undoubtedly, could not have retained the centre of Germany, and three-fourths of Austria, without creating great disorder in Europe: but she might have concluded a peace less moderate than that of Lunéville: Austria being exhausted after Hohenlinden, she might have retained all Italy, and even Switzerland, without any one being able to gainsay. As to the continental equilibrium, it was broken on that day, when Russia, Prussia and Austria divided among themselves, without an equivalent for any other power, the vast and splendid kingdom of Poland. The shores of the Rhine, the declivities of the Alps, could hardly be considered by France as an equivalent for the acquisitions of her rivals on the continent. On the ocean, Egypt scarcely balanced the conquest of the Indies. It was even doubtful that, with this colony, whether France could preserve in regard to England, her former maritime proportions.

These arguments had the cogency of reason, and fortunately that of might, for it is not enough that this latter should be on only one side of a negotiation. The parties were soon agreed as to the basis of the negotiation. It was conceded that England, retaining possession of India, should restore a portion of the conquests taken from France, Spain, and Holland. They then began to discuss what territories should be retained or restored.

Without formally granting to France the possession of Egypt, a point over which the English negotiator always allowed a doubt to hover, he nevertheless proposed two hypotheses, one by which France might retain Egypt, and one by which France might lose it, either by the force of arms, or voluntary abdication. In the former case, England, whilst retaining India and Ceylon, comprising also Chandernagor and Pondicherry, claimed in addition the Cape of Good Hope, a portion of Guiana, that is to say, Berbice, Demerara, Essequibo, Trinity and Martinico in the Antilles, and lastly, and above all, the island of Malta. She was willing to restore the small Dutch possessions in the Indies, Surinam, the insignificant islands of St. Lucie and Tobago, St. Pierre, Miquelon and Minorca. In the latter case she still insisted on India and Ceylon, but consented to restore the small factories of Pondicherry and Chandernagor, the Cape of Good Hope, Martinico or Trinity, whichever we might choose, she keeping the other. Lastly, she still claimed Malta, but not in a peremptory manner.

These restorations did not satisfy the First Consul. The question was again discussed, and after the lapse of a month, the following propositions, which were in reality the intentions of the two governments, were concluded upon.

England wanted, under all circumstances, India and Ceylon. If the French would evacuate Egypt she would give the small factories of Chandernagor and Pondicherry: she would restore the Cape to the Dutch, on condition of its being declared a free port; she would restore to them, in addition to Berbice, Demerara, and Essequibo, on the continent of America, the establishment of Surinam; she would restore one of the great Antilles, Martinico or Trinity, and St. Lucie, Tobago, St. Pierre, and Miquelon, and lastly the islands of Minorca and Malta. Thus, she obtained, as the result of the war, if we had not Egypt, the continent of India, Ceylon, one of the two principal Antilles, Martinico or Trinity; and if we had Egypt she obtained, in addition, Chandernagor and Pondicherry, the Cape, Martinico and Trinity, and lastly Malta: that is to say, in the second case, she would, as a precautionary measure, take from us the two footholds of Chandernagor and Pondicherry, in the Indian peninsula, and, as an indemnification, Trinity, which threatened Spanish America; Martinico, the chief port of the Antilles, and lastly Malta, the principal port of the Mediterranean.

Although the Cape, Martinico, or Trinity, and Malta, demanded as an overplus in case we should retain Egypt, were far from being equal to this important possession, and though it would have been proper to yield immediately, if this condition had been inevitable, the First Consul was anxious to retain Egypt, by paying for this concession at a less dear price. He hoped, that if the English army, directed toward the Nile, were conquered, that if the Spaniards waged an active war against Portugal, he could, whilst retaining Egypt, cause the Cape to be restored to the Dutch, Trinity to the Spaniards, Malta to the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, and thus oblige England to be satisfied with India, Ceylon, a portion of Guiana, and one or two of the little Antilles.

Every thing, therefore, depended on the issue of the war; and the English, hoping, in their turn, that it would result advantageously for them, were not sorry to await its result, which must soon be known, for the question was whether the Spaniards would dare to march on Portugal, and if the English troops on board of Admiral Keith's vessels in the Mediterranean could land in Egypt. A month or two at farthest would make known this result. Thus, on both sides, whilst avoiding most scrupulously any rupture in the negotiation, which it was sincerely desired would end in peace, they endeavoured to gain time, and the multiplicity and complication of topics to discuss furnished a very natural reason, without recourse to much diplomatic artifice.

"All depends," wrote M. Otto, "on two things: Will the English army be beaten in Egypt? Will Spain march vigorously against Portugal? Hasten, obtain both or one of these results, and you will have the most splendid peace the world has ever seen. But I must tell you," he added, "that if the English ministers fear our soldiers of the army of Egypt, they have but little dread of the resolution of the court of Spain."

The First Consul, therefore, strove continually to awaken the old Spanish court, and bring it to unite in his great designs, which consisted on the one hand to seize Portugal, and on the other to direct toward Egypt the naval forces of the two countries. Unfortunately the resources of this ancient monarchy were exhausted. A king honest, but blinded, and absorbed by cares the most vulgar and most unworthy of a throne; a queen abandoned to the most licentious debauchery; a vain, frivolous, weak-minded favourite, lavished in thoughtlessness and licentiousness the last resources of the monarchy of Charles the Fifth. Lucien Bonaparte, sent as ambassador to Madrid, to indemnify him for the ministry of the interior—Lucien, ambitious of equalling the diplomatic success of Joseph, endeavoured to support in Spain the policy of his brother: and he had acquired some influence, thanks to his name, and thanks also to the happy boldness with which he had neglected the nominal ministers, and addressed himself immediately to the true head of the government, the Prince of Peace. By giving this prince the choice of the resentment or friendship of the First Consul, he had excited in him an unusual degree of zeal for the interests of the alliance, and induced him to adopt the project of the war against Portugal. Lucien said to the Spanish court: You desire peace, you desire an advantageous, at least not a ruinous peace, you desire to conclude it without the loss of any of your colonies: así es as, therefore, in seizing pledges, of which we can make use, in order to wrest from England the majority of her maritime conquests. This reasoning was excellent, and admitted of no reply, but it was not that which had the most weight with the prince. Lucien bethought himself of a still more powerful argument. You are omnipotent here, said he to the favourite, my brother knows it, and will attribute to you the failure of the projects of the alliance. Would you prefer the Bonapartes as friends or enemies? These arguments, used at first to decide on the Portuguese war, were repeated daily in order to hasten the preparations for it. Moreover, whatever reasons may have acted upon the Prince of Peace, in waging this war, he did not betray the interests of his country. He could not, in fact, serve her more usefully, for a war with Portugal was the only means of forcing England to a restoration of the Spanish colonies.

The preparations were made with as much rapidity as possible, and the last resources of the monarchy applied thereto. Who would believe that this great and noble nation, whose glory has filled the world, and whose patriotism was soon about to shine forth with such brilliancy, unfortunately against us—who would believe that she could scarcely collect twenty-five thousand men: that with magnificent ports, a large quantity of vessels, the remains of the splendid reign of Charles the Third, she would with difficulty pay a few workmen in her arsenals, in order to make her vessels ready for sea; and that at last she was unable to victual her fleets! Who would believe that the fifteen Spanish vessels, shut up for two years at Brest, constituted her whole navy, at least all fit for service? The privation of the metals, in consequence of the interruption of her relations with Mexico, had reduced her to paper money, and the paper money had fallen to the lowest degree of discredit. An appeal was made to the clergy, who did not possess, at that time, the funds which were immediately required, but who possessed more influence than the crown, and by using this influence, the preparations were ultimately completed.

Twenty-five thousand men, not badly equipped, advanced at last toward Badajos; but this was not enough. The Prince of Peace had declared that, without a French division, he would not dare to enter Portugal. The First Consul had hastened the collection of this division at Bordeaux; it had soon crossed the Pyrenees and marched rapidly toward Ciudad-Rodrigo. The Prince of Peace wanted to enter with the Spaniards by Alentejo, whilst the French division was to penetrate through the provinces of Tras-os-Montes and Beira. General Saint-Cyr, who was to command the French, had gone to Madrid to concert a plan of operations with the Prince of Peace; and, although he was little fitted to deal with the delicacy of others, possessing a great deal himself, he succeeded in causing the prince to accept some good counsel, and in concerting with him a suitable plan of operations.

Portugal, finding herself pressed so closely, had sent M. d'Aranjo to Madrid, but he was not permitted to pass through the country. He then repaired to France where he met with the same refusal. Portugal was willing to submit to any conditions, provided she were not required to close her ports to English vessels. Her offers were rejected. It was determined to demand the entire expulsion of English ships, both merchant and naval, to hold three provinces as a guarantee until the peace, and lastly to make her pay the expenses of the expedition.

The troops of both nations began their march, and the Prince of Peace left Madrid, with his head filled with visions of glory. The court and Lucien himself were to accompany him. The First Consul had enjoined the most strict discipline on the French troops, he had ordered them to hear mass on Sunday, and visit the bishops in passing through the capital of a diocese, in short, to conform to all the customs of the Spaniards. He wished that the sight of the French, instead of alienating the Spaniards, should attach them still more to France.

In this quarter, things were in accordance with the wishes of the First Consul, and the great interest of the negotiation commenced at London. Much was still left to do, as regards the employment of the naval forces. It has been seen in what manner the three navies of Holland, France, and Spain, were to act in concert. Five Dutch, five French, and five Spanish vessels, in all fifteen, loaded with troops, were to threaten Brazil or endeavour to reconquer Trinity. All the rest of the naval forces was destined for Egypt. Ganteaume having left Brest with seven vessels, and a considerable reinforcement, was on his way to Alexandria. The other Spanish and French ships remained at Brest, in order to keep up the constant idea of a descent upon Ireland, whilst a second expedition, sailing from Rochefort, and joining five Spanish vessels equipped at Ferrol, and six others equipped at Cadiz, was to follow Ganteaume into Egypt. Spain was not informed of this project, lest through indiscretion she should betray it. She was asked, without explanation, to send to Cadiz the naval force prepared at Ferrol. The Spanish court protested warmly against this order, alleged the danger of meeting the English cruisers, which were very numerous at the entrance of the straits and in the vicinity of Gibraltar. The ships at Ferrol were moreover scarcely ready for sea, so much had their equipment been retarded. Lucien, without confessing the project upon Egypt, spoke of the necessity of commanding the Mediterranean, of the possibility of attempting in that sea something useful to both countries, perhaps an expedition to retake Minorca. At last he wrung from them the necessary orders, and the Spanish division of Ferrol was to be conveyed to Cadiz by the French fleet of Rochefort. This was not all: Spain, as is to be remembered, had promised a gift of six vessels. There was some dispute as to when this condition should be fulfilled; but, as Tuscany was about to be given up, even before Louisiana passed into the hands of the French, it was just that the vessels should be given immediately. The Spanish minister then determined to select six in the navy yard at Cadiz, and to give them to us, but he would not transfer them armed and victualled. Cannons and biscuit could, however, be sent thither from France. These were contemptible disputes, in the presence of a common enemy, who was to be beaten by all means, in order to make him reduce his claims. These difficulties were at last settled to the satisfaction of the First Consul. It has been already seen that the French Admiral Dumanoir had left by post for Cadiz, in order to superintend the fitting out of the Spanish vessels now become French, and to assume the command. This admiral had visited the ports of Spain, and in them found all the confusion, and all the destitution of negligent and ill-governed opulence. With the remains of a magnificent matériel, with numerous very fine ships, but unarmed; with superb establishments, there was at Cadiz, for want of pay, neither a seaman nor a workman to put this navy afloat. Every thing was wasted and neglected. The French minister had given Admiral Dumanoir letters of credit on the richest houses in Cadiz, and by means of ready money, this officer succeeded in overcoming the principal difficulties. After having chosen those vessels which had suffered least from time and Spanish neglect, he armed them with arms taken from the others; he obtained French sailors, some of whom had emigrated in consequence of the Revolution, and some had escaped from English prisons; he received a certain number sent from French ports in small vessels; he asked and obtained permission to ship some Spaniards, and hired, by means of good pay, some Swedes and Danes. The officers necessary to organize his staff came through the Peninsula, and detachments of French infantry were sent through Catalonia to complete his crews. This division, that of Ferrol, and that of Rochefort, constituting a force of about eighteen ships, were to repair to Egypt, after having touched at Otranto, in order to take on board 10,000 men. These projects, a sketch of which has been previously given, were now in a complete state of preparation.

In order to extort from Spain the feeble efforts she had so reluctantly made, the First Consul had fulfilled with remarkable fidelity, and even surpassed all his promises to her. The house of Parma having received, in lieu of her duchy, the beautiful land of Tuscany, for a long time ardently coveted by the Spanish court; the consent of Austria was necessary to the exchange. The First Consul applied for and obtained it. The duchy of Tuscany had, moreover, been erected into the kingdom of Etruria. The old reigning Duke of Parma, a bigoted prince, inimical to all the novelties of the age, was the brother, as we have previously said, of the King of Spain. His son, a young man very badly educated, had married an infant, and lived at the Escorial. The kingdom of Etruria was intended for this youthful pair. Nevertheless, the First Consul, having only promised this kingdom in exchange for the duchy of Parma, was bound to surrender one, only on the vacancy of the other, which would take place alone by the death or abdication of the old reigning duke, who would neither die nor abdicate. Although it was greatly to the interest of the First Consul to be freed from such a host in Italy, he consented to tolerate him in Parma, by placing immediately the infantas on the throne of Etruria. He merely required that they should come to Paris and receive the crown from his hands, as formerly in ancient Rome, the vassal monarchs came to receive their crowns from the hands of the People-King. He wanted to exhibit one great and singular spectacle to republican France. The young princes therefore left Madrid on the route to Paris, at the same time that their parents repaired to Badajos, in order to afford the favourite the gratification of being seen at the head of an army.

Such were the courtesies by which the First Consul hoped he might excite the zeal of the Spanish court, and induce it to aid him in his designs.

At this time all eyes were turned towards Egypt. Toward her were directed the efforts, the attention, hopes and fears of the two great belligerent nations, France and England. It seemed that, as if, before laying down their arms, these two nations were anxious to use them for the last time, in order to terminate with glory, and with most advantage, the terrible war which, for six years, had deluged the world with blood.

We left Ganteaume, endeavouring to leave Brest on the 3d of Pluviôse—23d of January, 1801—during a tremendous storm. The winds had been for a long time light or contrary. At last, during a gale from the north-west, which blew on the coast, he set sail, in obedience to the aid-de-camp of the First Consul, Savary, who was at Brest, with orders to vanquish all obstacles. This might be very imprudent, but what was to be done in the presence of an enemy's fleet, which constantly blockaded the harbour of Brest, in all weathers, and retired only when it became impossible to cruise? He was reduced to the alternative of either never going out, or of sailing during a storm, which would drive off the English. The squadron composed of seven ships, two frigates, and a brig, all fast sailing vessels, carried 4000 troops, an immense cargo, and numerous artisans with their families, who supposed they were going to St. Domingo. The fires of the squadron were extinguished in order not to be perceived, and they weighed anchor in the midst of the greatest apprehensions. The north-west wind is the most dangerous of all for leaving Brest. It blew at this moment with extreme violence, but fortunately did not attain its maximum until they were out in the open ocean. There they met with horrible squalls, and a tremendous sea running. The squadron sailed in order of battle, the admiral's ship, the Indivisible, leading. She was followed by the Formidable, carrying the flag of Vice-admiral Linois. The remainder of the division followed, each ship ready for action, if the enemy appeared. They were scarcely at sea when the wind, still increasing, carried away the Formidable's topmasts. The Constitution lost her main topmast; the Dix-Août, and the Jean-Bart, who followed close in her wak-ranged themselves on the right and left, and kept her in sight till morning, to render any assistance that might be necessary. The brig Vantour was nearly swamped, and was about sinking when succour was sent to her. In the confusion of the tempest and darkness, the squadron was dispersed. The next morning, at the break of day, Ganteaume, in the Indivisible, laid to for some time to reassemble his division: but fearing the return of the English, who till then had not appeared, and reckoning on the rendezvous appointed for each ship, he sailed toward the place of meeting agreed upon. This was fifty leagues west of Cape St. Vincent, one of the most projecting capes of the southern coast of Spain. The other vessels of the division, after riding out the gale, repaired their damage at sea, and re-united, with the exception of the admiral's ship, which, after having waited for them, had sailed towards the place of rendezvous. The only accident of the voyage was the meeting of the French frigate La Bravoure, with the English frigate the Concord, who was watching the direction of the division. Captain Dordelin, commanding La Bravoure, made sail for the English frigate, and offered her battle. He ranged alongside of her and discharged several broadsides, which made tremendous havoc on her decks. Captain Dordelin was preparing to board, when the English frigate, manoeuvring to escape this danger, took refuge in flight.

The French frigate rejoined the division, and the whole of the squadron soon found the admiral at the appointed place. They then sailed for the straits of Gibraltar, after having miraculously escaped the dangers of the sea and the enemy. The fleet was full of ardour; they began to understand where they were going, and each one was burning to fulfil the glorious mission of saving Egypt.

It was necessary to use all haste, for at that moment the fleet of Admiral Keith, collected in the bay of Macri, on the coast of Asia Minor, was only waiting for the final preparations of the Turks, always very slow to set sail, and transport an English army to the mouths of the Nile. Expedition, therefore, was of the utmost importance, and circumstances seemed to favour the French in the most fortunate manner. The English Admiral St. Vincent, commanding the blockade of Brest, aware too late of the departure of Ganteaume, had sent Admiral Calder in pursuit of him, with a force equal to the French division, that is, with seven ships, and two frigates. The English not supposing that the French division would dare to enter the Mediterranean, amidst so many cruisers, and deceived moreover by various reports, thought that the French had sailed for St. Domingo. Admiral Calder, therefore, bore away for the Canary islands, and from thence to the Antilles. During this time, Ganteaume had approached the strait, and was hugging the African coast in order to escape the observation of the British cruisers from Gibraltar. The winds were not very favourable, but such was not the case with the opportunity it afforded him for executing his mission, for the English Admiral Warren, who cruised constantly between Gibraltar and Mahon, had only four vessels, the rest of the English forces, under Lord Keith, being employed in transporting the army of embarkation. Unfortunately, Ganteaume was ignorant of these facts, and the serious responsibility weighing upon him caused him an involuntary uneasiness which bullets would never have produced in his gallant breast. Annoyed by two of the enemy's vessels which were watching him too closely, the cutter Sprightly and frigate Success, he pursued and captured them. At last he passed the strait and entered the Mediterranean. He had now nothing left to do but to crowd all sail, and make for the east. Admiral Warren, in fact, was snug in the harbour of Mahon, and Admiral Keith, embarrassed with two hundred transports, had not yet left the shores of Asia Minor. The coast of Egypt was clear, and the assistance anxiously desired and long promised to the French army there might have been easily afforded. But Ganteaume, always uneasy about the fate of his squadron, and still more about that of the numerous troops he had on board, was alarmed at the sight of the smallest vessels he met. Supposing that there was between him and Egypt a fleet which never existed, he was alarmed for the state of his vessels, and feared, if it were necessary to carry all sail in presence of a superior force, that he would be unable to do with rigging crippled by the storm and hastily repaired at sea. He had lost all confidence in himself. Dissatisfied with the Bravoure, which did not sail to please him, he determined to get rid of her, and order her to Toulon. Instead of directing her alone to this port, and coasting himself along the African shore from west to east, he committed the error of sailing northward, and coming almost in sight of Toulon. His intention was to convoy the Bravoure, to protect her from the enemy's cruisers: a fallacious reason certainly, for it was better to hazard a single frigate than the success of his mission. Owing to this fault he was seen by Admiral Warren, who immediately left Mahon. Ganteaume, in order to deceive him, pretended to give him chase. The valiant Captain Bergeret, commanding the French ship the Dix-Août, advancing faster and further than the rest, examined the English closely, and could make out only four ships and two frigates. Filled with joy at the sight, he thought that, superior in force to the English, we should pursue them, either to chase or engage them. But he soon perceived the signal to give up the chase, and to join the squadron. This brave officer, deeply chagrined, immediately informed Ganteaume that he had been deceived by his look-out-men, that there were only four vessels before them; but in vain! Ganteaume thought he saw seven or eight, and resolved to sail to the north. Nevertheless it was certain (as subsequently proved by the reports of Admiral Warren) that the enemy had but four ships.¹ Ganteaume approached the gulf of Lyons to discharge the Bravoure, and having again seen the British fleet, distracted he entered Toulon. There new anxieties awaited him; and the fear of the anger of the First Consul, indignant at the failure, in the very moment of success, of so important an expedition. This fatal determination lost Egypt, which on that very day might have been saved.

The English have asserted that the French frigate Indivisible was the field of battle. The information given by two officers of high rank, still living, and present at the time, leaves no doubt on my mind as to the truth of the above account.

In fact, whilst Ganteaume was beafig between the coast of Africa and Mahon, two frigates, the Justice and Egyptienne, with provisions and four hundred troops, had sailed to the east from Toulon, and arrived at Alexandria without meeting a single English vessel. Two other frigates, the Régénérée and Africaine, had sailed from Rochefort, crossed the ocean, and entered the Mediterranean, without any hindrance. They unfortunately separated. The Régénérée arrived at Alexandria, on the 2d of March, 1801—11th Ventôse, year IX. The Africaine, overhauled by a British frigate during the night, waited to fight her. She had on board three hundred troops, who, wanting to share the combat, caused a terrible disorder, and after a heroic contest, was the reason of her loss. She was taken by the English frigate. But, as has been seen, of four frigates which sailed from Toulon and Rochefort, three, arriving safely, found the coast of Egypt freed from the presence of the enemy, and so easily accessible that they entered Alexandria without striking a blow; so seldom do meetings occur in the vast expanse of the ocean, and so great boldness may favour an officer, who will risk his flag for the execution of a great duty!

Ganteaume entered Toulon on the 19th of February—30th Pluviôse—worn out with fatigue and anxiety, and a prey, as he wrote to the First Consul, to every species of mental misery. This was natural enough, for he had compromised interests of the most vital importance. The First Consul, naturally irritable, could not govern his temper when his orders were disobeyed. But he understood men; he knew that signs of dissatisfaction were not to be shown at the very moment of action, because by this means they would be alienated; instead of being excited; he knew that it was necessary to encourage and cheer Ganteaume, instead of driving him to despair by the outbursts of an anger which every one dreaded at that time as the greatest of evils. Therefore, far from overwhelming him with reproaches, he sent his aid-de-camp, Lacuée, to console and comfort him, and place at his disposal troops, provisions, and money, in order to be ready to start again immediately. He merely blamed him, gently, for having left the coast of Africa for that of the Balearic islands, and for having thus induced Admiral Warren to pursue him.

Ganteaume was a brave man, a good seaman, and an excellent soldier. But his moral condition at that moment proves that responsibility may exert a much greater influence over some men than the fear of cannon balls. This even is an honourable trait, for it shows that they are more afraid of failing in the execution of any duties assigned, than of losing their lives. Ganteaume, encouraged by the First Consul, applied himself to his task; but he lost much time either in repairing his ships or in waiting for favourable winds. Some propitious moments were, however, still left. Admiral Warren had sailed towards Naples and Sicily. Admiral Keith, it is true, was approaching Aboukir with the English army: but it was not impossible to deceive his vigilance, and land the French troops either beyond Aboukir, that is at Damietta, or on this side, at 20 or 25 leagues to the west of Alexandria, by which means our soldiers would have reached Egypt by a short march across the desert.

At the same time that the earnestness of the First Consul incited Ganteaume to a second expedition, letters arriving from Paris urged the organization of the squadrons of Rochefort, Ferrol, and Cadiz, in order to pour succour into Egypt by every avenue possible. Lastly, Ganteaume, restored to his senses by the exhortations of the First Consul, added to numerous testimonials of kindness, set sail on the 9th of March—28th Ventôse. But on leaving the port, the Constitution ran aground; and two days were lost in putting her afloat. On the 22d of March—1st Germinal—the squadron again weighed anchor with seven ships, several frigates, and shaped their course for Sardinia, without being perceived by the English.

It was highly desirable that these attempts should succeed, at least in part; for our army in Egypt, thrown upon its own resources, was harassed with the collected soldiers of the east and west. Nevertheless, reduced to its own numbers, it could conquer a host of enemies, as it had done in the fields of Aboukir and Heliopolis, if it behaved with its usual good conduct. Unfortunately General Bonaparte was no longer at its head. Desaix and Kléber were no more.

It now becomes necessary to explain the situation of Egypt, after the fatal blow which had stricken down the colossal figure of Kléber, whose look alone, on the shores of the Rhine, as on those of the Nile, was wont to cheer the hearts of our soldiers, and make them forget danger, misery, and exile. We must first describe the prosperous state of the colony, and then its sudden disastrous situation; it must be done, for the reverses as well as the successes of a nation must be exhibited, in order to teach a useful lesson. Of a surety, in the midst of the unexampled prosperity of the Consulate, the fruit of skilful government, one misfortune cannot obscure the brilliancy of the picture it is our duty to present: but it is also our duty to present to our warriors and our generals still more than to our soldiers, the cruel lesson taught by the last days of the occupation of Egypt. May it cause them to reflect on their too ordinary tendency to disunion, especially when they are not governed by a powerful hand, which directs against the enemy the united activity of their minds, and the impetuosity of their passions.

When Kléber died, Egypt appeared to be in a state of subjection. After having seen the army of the grand-vizier scattered like chaff before the wind, and the revolt of 300,000 inhabitants of Cairo repressed by a handful of soldiers, the Egyptians looked upon the French as invincible, and considered their establishment on the shores of the Nile as a decree of destiny. They began moreover to become familiarized with their European masters, and found that the new yoke was much less heavy than the old one; for they paid fewer taxes than under the Mamelukes, and did not receive the bastinado at the period of the collection of the miri, as under their dethroned co-religionists. Murad Bey, that gallant and chivalrous Mameluke prince, who at last attached himself to France, held Upper Egypt in fief. He was a faithful vassal, paid his tribute punctually, and kept the Upper Nile in good order. He was an ally on whom confidence could be placed. A single brigade of 2500 men, in the environs of Beni-Souef, which could always easily fall back on Cairo, was sufficient to keep Upper Egypt in subjection: which was a great advantage on account of the small numbers of our troops.

¹ Vide a report of Admiral Warren of the 23d of April, 1801, published in the Moniteur of 27d Messidor, year IX. (Double number 286 and 287.)

The French army, having partaken of the error of its general during the convention of El-Arisch, and having accompanied him to the plains of Heliopolis, began to understand its mistake, and did not feel disposed to commit a second. Confident that the Republic looked to it for the maintenance of that splendid possession, it did not dream of abandoning it. Moreover General Bonaparte was now at the head of affairs; the soldiers comprehended the reasons of his departure, and no longer regarded him as a deserter. Believing themselves to be always under the eyes of their former general, they did not concern themselves about the future. Thanks, indeed, to the foresight of the First Consul who caused merchant vessels to be freighted from every port, there scarcely elapsed a week without the arrival at Alexandria of ships bringing provisions, European goods, newspapers, letters, and despatches of government. In consequence of these frequent communications, their home was, as it were, always present. A sigh for it arose undoubtedly in their bosoms, when any circumstance occurred to excite it. For instance, when General Menou assumed the command, after the death of Kléber, all eyes were turned toward France. A brigadier-general, presenting his officers to Menou, asked him if he intended to restore them to their country. Menou reprimanded him severely, and announced in the order of the day his formal resolution to obey the intentions of his government, which were to retain possession of the colony for ever, and every one submitted anew. But above all, General Bonaparte was in power: this alone gave the old soldiers of Italy reason to trust and to hope.

Their pay was punctual, and provisions were cheap. The soldiers' rations were commuted for money. Bread alone was furnished to them in kind. They thus had the advantage of a good bargain, and lived in the greatest abundance, eating poultry much more frequently than butcher's meat. They had no cloth; but owing to the warmth of the climate, the want of this was supplied, for a portion of their dress, by the cotton fabric so abundant in Egypt. For the other part, they took all the cloth brought into the east, without regard to colour. Some variety in the uniform was the result of this: regiments, for example, were seen dressed in blue, red, and green; but the soldier was dressed, and even presented a martial appearance. Colonel Couté was of great service to the army, on account of the fertility of his inventive mind. He had brought with him a company of artificers, the remains of the artificers of Fleurus,¹ and by their assistance erected at Cairo manufactories for weaving, fulling, and shearing cloth: and as wool was abundant, it was hoped that European stuffs could be dispensed with entirely. The same was the case with powder. The factories established at Cairo already produced enough for all the wants of war. Internal trade was evidently being restored. The caravans, well protected, began to arrive from the middle of Africa. The Arabs of the Red Sea came to the ports of Suez and Cosseir, where they exchanged coffee, perfumes, and dates, for the grain and rice of Egypt. The Greeks, taking advantage of the Turkish flag, and better sailers than the English cruisers, brought to Damietta, Rosetta, and Alexandria, wine, oil, and various commodities. In a word, nothing was wanting at that moment, and extensive preparations were making for futurity. The officers, seeing that the permanent occupation of Egypt was determined on, made their arrangements to pass their time as agreeably as possible. Those residing at Cairo or Alexandria, and they composed the larger number, found comfortable quarters. Syrian, Greek, and Egyptian women, either purchased from the slave merchants, or of their own free will, shared their lodgings with them. All gloom had disappeared. Two engineers had built a theatre at Cairo, and the officers themselves acted French plays. The soldiers lived as well as their commanders, and, thanks to that facility of the French character in assimilating with all nations, they were seen smoking and drinking coffee, in company with the Turks and Arabs.

The financial resources of Egypt, judiciously administered, satisfied all the wants of the army. Egypt had paid under the Mamelukes, according to the greater or less amount of taxation, 36 to 40,000,000. She now paid about 20 or 25,000,000, and the collection was much more easy. These 20 or 25,000,000 were sufficient for the expenses of the colony, which did not exceed 1,700,000 francs per month, that being 20,400,000 francs per annum. Time, improving the collection, rendering it at once more punctual and more easy, must necessarily lighten the burden on the population, and increase the wealth of the army. It would not be impossible to create an excess of 3 or 4,000,000 per annum, which would have served to form a small treasury, either to supply extraordinary wants, or to construct works of utility or defence. The army consisted of 25 or 26,000 individuals, reckoning the general staff, the women, the children of many soldiers, and artisans. Of this number there were 23,000 soldiers, of whom 6,000 were unfit for field duty, but able to defend the fortresses, and 17 or 18,000 in prime condition, capable of the most active service. The cavalry was superb: it equalled the Mamelukes in bravery, and surpassed them in discipline. The field artillery was in good order and well drilled. The dromedary regiment had attained the highest degree of perfection. It traversed the desert with extraordinary rapidity, and had entirely cured the Arabs of the love of pillage. The current loss of men was slight, for there were but 600 sick out of 26,000 persons. Nevertheless, in case of a long war, men might be wanting: but the Greeks enlisted readily, as also the Copts. The negroes likewise, bought at a very cheap rate, and remarkable for their devotion, made excellent recruits. In time, the army might have been increased by 10 or 12,000 faithful and brave soldiers. Confident to excess in their bravery and military experience, they did not doubt for a moment their ability to drive into the ocean the Turks, or English, who might be sent from Asia or Europe. Certain it is, that well commanded, these 18,000 men, properly united, and directed in a body against newly embarked troops, ought, at all hazards, to remain masters of the coast of Egypt. But they needed a skilful head: this condition of success was indispensable to this army, as well as to any other.

¹ This was a company of artisans, of all trades, subjected to military organization and discipline.

Imagine Kléber, or, still better, Desaix, the wise and valiant Desaix, left in Egypt whence he was taken by the tender friendship of the First Consul; imagine Kléber, having escaped the Mussulman's poniard, governing Egypt for some years! Who can doubt but that he would have converted it into a flourishing colony, and founded a splendid empire! The climate was healthy, free from fever, the land of inexhaustible fertility, the peasants in subjection and attached to the soil, the recruits voluntary, and all the conditions of the country vastly superior to the establishment now being founded in Africa!

But instead of Kléber, instead of Desaix, Menou had become general-in-chief of the army by right of seniority. It was an irreparable misfortune for the colony, and a fault on the part of the First Consul, not to have superseded him. Not being certain that his orders would reach any given point in Egypt, he feared that, if the decree containing the appointment of a new general fell into the hands of the English, they might make use of it to disorganize the government. This motive, however, would not have excused the First Consul, if he had been able to know the profound imbecility of Menou in military affairs. Another reason influencing him in favour of this general, was his known zeal for the preservation and colonization of Egypt. Menou had, indeed, warmly opposed the project of evacuation, resisted the influence of the officers of the Rhine, and constituted himself, in short, the chief of the colonist party. He even carried his enthusiasm so far as to be converted to Islamism, and marry a Turkish woman. He took the name of Abdallah Me-

nou. These eccentricities made our soldiers naturally jesters, laugh, but, in the minds of the Egyptians, did no harm. Menou had intelligence, information, great industry, a taste for colonial establishments, all the qualities of a governor, but none of those of a general. Wanting in experience, that comprehension which seizes every thing at a glance, and determination, he was, moreover, physically incapable. He was very fat, near-sighted, and a bad horseman. He was a chief ill adapted to soldiers as active and brave as ours. In addition to all, he wanted character, and, under his feeble authority, the chiefs of the army became discontented and very soon a prey to fatal divisions of opinion.

Under General Bonaparte, there was in Egypt but one mind, one will. Under Kléber, there were for a time two parties, the colonists and anti-colonists, those who wished to remain, and those who wished to depart. But after the insult offered by the English to our soldiers, and gloriously avenged at Heliopolis, after the necessity of remaining became known, order was re-established. Under the imposing authority of Kléber there were union and harmony. But a short time elapsed between the victory of Heliopolis and the death of Kléber. Union fled when Menou assumed the command.

General Reynier, a good staff-officer, had distinguished himself in this capacity in the army of the Rhine, but reserved, inaccessible, without any influence over the soldiers, enjoyed nevertheless the esteem of all. He was looked upon as one of the officers most worthy to be at the head of the army. He was next in seniority to Menou. On the day of Kléber's death, a warm altercation took place between Reynier and Menou, not about the command, for on the contrary, each was anxious to avoid the burden of it. Neither would accept it; and, it must be confessed, that at that moment it was far from being desirable. It was supposed the blow of the poniard which had terminated Kléber's career, was the signal of a general insurrection, organized throughout Egypt by the influence of the Turks and English. They therefore feared, under such critical circumstances, the heavy responsibility of the command. Menou yielded however to the entreaties of Reynier and the other generals, and consented to become the chief of the colony. But the true state of affairs soon became apparent from the profound tranquillity which followed the death of Kléber, and the command, at first refused, was subsequently regretted. General Reynier then wanted what at first he would not accept. Under a reserved, modest, and even timid exterior, he concealed a profound vanity. The authority of Menou became insupportable to him. From being tranquil and obedient, he became censorious and meddling. He found fault with every thing. The entreaties of his companions in arms had induced Menou to accept the command, and he had assumed the title of Commander in chief ad interim. Reynier criticized this title. At the funeral of Kléber, Menou had assigned the four corners of the pall to generals of division, and marched behind at the head of the staff.

Reynier thought he was aspiring to vice-royalty. Menou had ordered the illustrious Fourier to pronounce the eulogium of Kléber: Reynier pretended that it was an insult to his memory, to praise him through the medium of another. A delay in a subscription opened to erect a monument to Kléber, difficulties as to the successor of this general, very pitiful, in the noble warriors of that day: these puerilities, and others, were interpreted by Reynier and his friends, in the most perverted manner. We relate these trifles which would be unworthy of a place in history, did they not show to what degree unfounded discontent can descend. Reynier thus became a disobedient, foolish, and guilty subaltern. To him was added General Damas, a friend of Kléber, and chief of the general-staff, carrying in his bosom all the jealous feelings of the army of the Rhine against that of Italy. From that time opposition found a dwelling-place in the very bureaux of the staff. Menou would not permit it so near him, and determined to remove General Damas from the post he had occupied under Kléber.

The disconcerted opponents endeavoured to ward off the blow by sending to Menou, in the capacity of a negotiator, the wise and brave General Friant, who, devoted entirely to his duties, and taking part with neither, mingled with them only to effect a reconciliation. Menou, more firm than usual, did not suffer himself to be persuaded, and superseded General Damas by appointing General Lagrange. He was thus less inconvenienced by the proximity of his enemies; but they were not the less irritated, far from it, and the most scandalous and alarming discord arose among the chiefs of the army. The wise among them lamented the shock given to the government; a shock always to be dreaded, but especially so when remote from the supreme authority, and surrounded by continual dangers.

Menou, a bad general, but an industrious governor, laboured night and day, at what he termed the organization of the colony. He did some good and some evil things, but above all he did too much. In the first place, he endeavoured to make the pay of the troops punctual, and used for this purpose the contribution of 10,000,000 levied by Kléber on the Egyptian cities, as a fine for the last revolt. This was one way of maintaining good humour and obedience in the army: for, during the convention of El-Arisch, some symptoms of insubordination were produced, partly by the pay being in arrears. Menou considered that the regular payment of the soldiers' dues was a guarantee of good order, and he was right. But he formed the rash determination to pay the wages, always in preference to every other expense, forgetting forced cases which might arise from war. He attended to the bread for the troops, which he had made excellent. He organized the hospitals, and carefully attended to introducing order in the bureau of accounts. Menou was a man of perfect integrity, but somewhat inclined to bombast. He expressed so frequently, in his orders of the day, his intention to reform the morals of the army, that he wounded the feelings of his generals. They asked with bitterness, if honesty and propriety dated only from the assumption of the command by Menou. In fact, but few misdemeanors had been committed since the occupation of Egypt. After the violation of the convention of El-Arisch, a considerable capture had been made in the port of Alexandria; that of several vessels, sailing under the Turkish flag, in order to transport the army to France, and almost all loaded with merchandise. Menou seemed displeased with the operations of the commission and of General Lanusse, who commanded at Alexandria; he recalled him in a very insulting manner, and superseded him by General Friant. Lanusse was offended, and, on his return to Cairo, enrolled himself among the malcontents. Menou did not stop there; he was anxious to change the system of taxes, and here he committed serious faults. Undoubtedly at a later period some reformation might have been effected in the finances of Egypt. The people would have been easily contented, and the public revenue considerably increased by an equitable division of the land-tax, and some duties calculated on the consumption. But at that time, exposed to attacks from abroad, it was unwise to create intestinal difficulties, and to introduce innovations, the benefit of which were not at once evident to the people. The collection of the old duties with regularity and justice, was sufficient to establish between the Mamelukes and the French a comparison highly advantageous to the latter, and largely to swell the treasure-chest of the army. Menou conceived a general register of property, a new system of land-tax, and, above all, the exclusion of the Copts, who were, in Egypt, the farmers of the revenue, and played almost the same part as the Jews in the north of Europe. These projects of future benefit were productive of present evil. Menou fortunately had not time to put his whole plan into execution: but he had enough to create new contributions. The sheiks El-Beled, the municipal magistrates of Egypt, received at certain periods the investiture of municipal power, and obtained as presents, either cloaks or shawls, from the authority appointing them. They gave in return horses, camels, and horned-cattle. The Mamelukes renewed this ceremony as frequently as possible, on account of the benefit they received from it. Some had even converted it into a prestation in money. Menou intended to generalize this measure, and extend it over all Egypt. He imposed on the sheiks El-Beled a tax, amounting to nearly 2,500,000. They were certainly rich enough to pay it, and for many of them, this regular tax was an actual disburdening. But they possessed great influence over the 2500 villages subjected to their authority, and he ran the risk of rendering them hostile, by imposing on them an absolute, uniform, and uncompensated tax, which had in addition the effect of suppressing a custom of which the moral effect was useful. Menou, possessed with the desire of assimilating Egypt to France, or, as he said, of civilizing it, conceived moreover a system of tolls. Egypt had her duties on sales, which were collected in the akels, or store-houses in which, in the east, all merchandise which is to be transported from one place to another, is deposited. This mode of collection was simple and easy. Menou wished to change it to a duty paid at the gates of the cities, which are not very numerous in Egypt. Independently of the innovation on the customs of the country, the immediate effect was to advance the price of merchandise in the garrisons, to throw a portion of this burden on the army, and thereby excite anew discontent. Lastly, Menou resolved to levy a contribution on the rich merchants, who held no public offices, such as the Copts, the Greeks, the Jews, the Damascenes, and Franks, etc. He imposed on them a capitation tax of 2,500,000*fr.* per annum. This was not too much, especially for the Copts, who had grown rich by the farming of the duties. But they had been very badly treated in the revolt of Cairo: they were, moreover, necessary, for recourse must be had to them, when it became requisite to borrow money. It was imprudent to alienate them any more than the Greek and European merchants, who, assimilated to us in manners, customs, and mind, were our natural medium of communication with the Egyptians. Lastly, Menou created a tax on successions, which he wished even to extend to the army, thus throwing an additional cause of dissatisfaction among the malcontents.

This manner of assimilating a colony to the metropolis, and of thinking that it was to be civilized by clashing with its prejudices, possessed Menou, as well as all the most enlightened colonizers, who were more anxious to do quickly than to do well. To complete the work, Menou created a privy-council, composed not of four or five chiefs of the service, but of about fifty civil and military officers of all grades. It was an actual parliament, which ridicule never permitted to assemble. Lastly, he added an Arabic gazette, intended to inform the Egyptians and the army of the acts of the French authority.

The soldiers troubled themselves but little about these matters. They lived well, laughed at Menou, but appreciated his good nature and solicitude for their welfare. The inhabitants were submissive, and found, after all, that the yoke of the French was much lighter than that of the Mamelukes. The malcontents of the army were infinitely more irritable. To avoid their censure, Menou should have done absolutely nothing, and even then they would have blamed him for his want of energy. But Menou was too much possessed with the mania of organizing, not to furnish ample material for criticism. They took advantage of it, and went so far as to project the deposition of the general in chief, a mad act which would have overturned the colony, and converted the army of Egypt into an army of prætorian guards. The officers of several divisions were sounded, but so much fidelity and disinclination to revolt were found, that the subject was dropped. Reynier and Damas had persuaded Lanusse, and they combined, corrupted Belliard and Verdier, and, with the exception of General Friant, all the generals of divisions were soon ranked in this unhappy opposition. Two old members of the National Convention, whom General Bonaparte had taken to Egypt, to occupy their leisure time, Tallien and Isnard, were at Cairo, and, returning to their former habits, became violent agitators. Instead of the deposition of the general in chief, found to be impossible, the generals conceived the idea of waiting on him in a body, to present their remarks on his measures, some of which undoubtedly were open to severe criticism. They entered without being announced, and greatly surprised Menou, by their unexpected appearance. They laid their complaints before him, which he heard with much displeasure, but not without a certain degree of dignity. He promised to consider their remonstrances, and had the weakness not to crush on the spot the impertinence of their conduct. This step gave great offence to the army, and was universally condemned. Isnard and Tallien, however, paid for all, and were sent to Europe.

During this state of affairs the order of the First Consul arrived confirming Menou in his position, and definitively investing him with the chief command. This expression of the supreme power was very seasonable, and brought a portion of the malcontents to a sense of their duty. Unfortunately, new quarrels broke out, and soon restored things to their former state. Thus in petty altercations, these disappointed spirits, soured by exile, encouraged to discord by the weakness of their commander, spent the time between the victory of Heliopolis and the present, that is, one year; a valuable space of time which should have been employed in living harmoniously, and preparing, by union, for the overthrow of the powerful enemy about to attack Egypt.

The Nile was falling, the waters were returning to their bed, and the inundated country was beginning to dry. The time of disembarkation had arrived. The month of February, 1801—Ventôse, year IX.—was approaching. The English and Turks were preparing to make another descent on the colony. The grand-vizier, who had been beaten by Kléber at Heliopolis, was at Gaza, between Palestine and Egypt, not having dared to show himself, since his defeat, at Constantinople, not having more than 10 or 12,000 men in his army, decimated by the plague, living by pillage, and fighting daily with the mountaineers of Palestine, who had risen against him. He gave no great cause for fear. The capudan pasha, the enemy of the vizier, and the favourite of the sultan, was cruising with some vessels between Syria and Egypt. He was anxious to renew the convention of El-Arisch, having but slender hopes of reconquering Egypt by force of arms, and greatly distrusting the English, whom he suspected of wishing to wrest this beautiful country from the French, in order to take possession of it themselves. Lastly, 18,000 men, collected at Macri, in Asia Minor, composed of English, Hessians, Swiss, Maltese, and Neapolitans, officered exclusively by Englishmen, and in a high state of discipline, were about embarking on board of Lord Keith's squadron and attacking Egypt, under the command of a skilful general, Sir Ralph Abercrombie.

To these 18,000 European soldiers were to be added 6000 Albanians, then on board of the squadron of the capudan pasha, 6000 Sepoys coming from India by way of the Red Sea, and some 20,000 men, miserable eastern soldiers, ready to join the 10,000 men of the grand-vizier in Palestine. The army of Egypt was threatened by about 60,000 men. She could oppose only about 18,000 combatants. These, however, were enough and even more than necessary, if well directed.

At first there was no danger of surprise, for information arrived from every quarter, from the Archipelago by the Greek ships, from Upper Egypt by Mourad Bey, and from Europe by the frequent couriers of the First Consul. All these advices gave notice of an impending expedition, composed of English and eastern forces. Menou, deaf to these warnings, at this critical moment, did nothing which he ought to have done, and which was clearly pointed out by the situation of affairs.

Good policy would have suggested to him, in the first place, to secure the fidelity of Mourad Bey, by proper treatment, for he had possession of Upper Egypt, and moreover preferred the French to the Turks and English. But Menou neglected this precaution, and answered the advices of Mourad Bey, in a manner to have alienated him from his allegiance, had that been possible. Good policy would also have suggested the propriety of taking advantage of the distrust of the English by the Turks, and, without renewing the convention of El-Arisch, of paralyzing them by a pretended negotiation, which, whilst occupying them, would have delayed their preparations. Menou thought no more of this than of any other measure.

He did not know how to avail himself of any of the military or civil measures required by the circumstances. In the first place, he should have made at Alexandria, Rosetta, Damietta, Ramanieh, and Cairo, or wherever the army might chance to be, ample collections of munitions of war, always easily obtained in a country like Egypt. Menou refused to do so, wishing to take nothing from the men's pay, which he had promised should be kept sacred. It became necessary to remount the cavalry and artillery, the principal resources against an army of embarkation, which is generally wanting in those arms. He refused, for the same financial reasons. He even carried his improvidence so far as to select this time for castrating the artillery horses, which were entire, and difficult to manage on that account.

Lastly, Menou was opposed to concentrating the troops, which a regard for the health of the soldiers would have rendered proper, even if no danger had threatened Egypt. In fact some symptoms of the plague had appeared. It was absolutely necessary to encamp the troops, and withdraw them from the cities, independently of rendering them more active. The army, scattered in garrisons, or uselessly collected at Cairo, or employed in the collection of the mir, was in no wise fit for action. And yet by a proper disposition of the 23,000 men remaining, of whom 17 or 18,000 were ready for active service, Menou might have everywhere defended Egypt with advantage. He might be attacked at Alexandria, by the bay of Aboukir, in the vicinity, and always preferred for landing; at Damietta, another favourable point for disembarkation, although much less so than that of Aboukir; lastly, on the Syrian frontier, where the vizier was stationed with the wreck of his army. Of these three points, but one was seriously threatened, namely, Alexandria and at the bay of Aboukir; a circumstance easy to have been foreseen, and it was the common belief among the soldiers and civilians. The coast of Damietta, on the contrary, was difficult of access, and connected by so few points with the Delta, that the enemy's army, if it had disembarked, might have been easily blockaded, and forced to regain their ships. It was therefore not probable that the English would come to Damietta. On the Syrian frontier the vizier could give but little uneasiness. He was too weak, and remembered Heliopolis too well, to commence the attack. He would assume the offensive, only when the English had succeeded in landing. In all cases it was good policy to let him advance, for the more he did so, the more he was compromised. The only subject of consideration with the general in chief, should have been the English army, of which the landing was announced to be daily expected. Under these circumstances, a strong division should have been left around Alexandria, that is 4 or 5000 active troops, exclusive of the marines and men intended to garrison the forts. Two thousand men would have been sufficient for Damietta. The dromedary regiment could have protected the Syrian frontier. A garrison of 3000 men at Cairo, reinforced by the 2000 men of Upper Egypt and about 1000 French from the depots, would more than have sufficed to keep in subjection the population of the capital, if the vizier had appeared under its walls. This arrangement would require 11 or 12,000 men, out of 17 or 18,000 active troops. There then remained a reserve of 6000 picked men, who should have been encamped at an equal distance from Alexandria and Damietta. Ramanieh presented all these favourable conditions; it was a healthy location, on the shore of the Nile, not far from the sea, easily provisioned, one day's journey from Alexandria, two from Damietta, and three or four from the Syrian frontier. Such a force, stationed at that point, would have effectually frustrated all the attempts of the enemy.

Menou thought of none of these measures, and not only did not think of them, but he rejected the advice of those who suggested them to him. Judicious counsel reached him from all sides, and particularly from the generals who had opposed him. This justice is due to them, and, among their number, Reynier, more accustomed than the others to great military manœuvres, pointed out to him the proper course to pursue; but they had lost the confidence of the commander in chief, through their untimely opposition, and, now that they were in the right, he listened to them with no more deference than when they were in the wrong.

The brave Friant, ignorant of the fatal discord reigning in the army, attended zealously to the defence of Alexandria. He had organized the sailors and men of the garrison, so as to leave them in charge of the forts: but that being done, he had left only about 2000 active troops to direct toward the point of embarkation. Some of these were necessary for the defence of the principal points of the coast, such as the fort of Aboukir, the ports of Maison-Carrée, Edko, and Roseita. After occupying these points, he had left only 1200 men. Fortunately the Régénérée, arriving from Rochefort, had brought a reinforcement of three hundred men, with a considerable store of provisions. Thanks to this unexpected succour, the force of General Friant reached about 1500 men. Imagine of what assistance Ganteaume's squadron would have been at this moment, if, trusting a little more to chance, this admiral had brought the 4000 picked soldiers, on board of his ships.

General Friant, even in his destitute condition, demanded only two additional battalions and a regiment of cavalry. This might have sufficed, but in such a situation it was very rash to trust to a reinforcement of about 1000 men. It must be confessed, that the confidence of the army in itself contributed greatly to its defeat. It had been accustomed to fight in Egypt, one to four, and sometimes one to eight, and did not value correctly the power of the English. It was supposed that the enemy could not land more than a few hundred men at a time, without artillery or cavalry, and that they might be easily overcome by the bayonet. Fatal delusion. Nevertheless, this reinforcement, demanded by Friant, although small, would have saved all, as will be evident from the events that followed.

On the 28th of February, 1801—9th Ventôse, year IX.—an English boat was seen not far from Alexandria, apparently reconnoitring. It was pursued and captured, with the officers in it, who had charge of the disembarkation. The papers found on them left no doubt as to their intentions. Immediately afterward, the English fleet of seventy sail appeared in sight of Alexandria; but, separated by bad weather, they put to sea again. There was still left a chance of preserving Egypt from the English, for they probably would be unable to effect a landing for several days. The despatches sent by Friant to Cairo, arrived there on the 4th of March—14th Ventôse—in the afternoon. If Menou had immediately adopted a prompt and prudent determination, all might have been retrieved. If he had marched the whole army toward Alexandria, the cavalry would have reached that place in four days, the infantry in five, that is, on the 8th and 9th of March—17th and 18th Ventôse—he might have had 10,000 men on the shore of Aboukir. The English might possibly at that time have disembarked their troops, but it would have been impossible for them to have landed their ammunition, fortify their position, and the French might have attacked them with success. Reynier, who was at Cairo, wrote to Menou, on the same day, a most able letter. He advised him to pass by the vizier, who would not assume the offensive, as also Damietta, which did not appear to be threatened, and to concentrate his forces on Alexandria. Nothing could be more correct. At all events, no error could be committed by marching toward Ramanieh, for from this place it was easy to go toward Damietta or Syria, as either point might seem in danger. Not a single day had been lost, and they approaching Alexandria, where the true danger was. It was necessary to decide instantly, and march that very night. Menou would listen to nothing, and became absolute in his orders, whilst he was vacillating in his ideas. Unable to understand which point was really threatened, he sent a reinforcement to General Rampon, near Damietta; and ordered Reynier with his division toward Belbeis to oppose the vizier on the Syrian frontier. He sent the division Lanusse to Ramanieh, and even did not send the whole of it, for he kept the 88th demi-brigade at Cairo. He sent only the 17th chasseurs (light infantry). General Lanusse was ordered to march to Ramanieh, and thence, according to the information received, to Alexandria. Menou remained himself at Cairo, with a large portion of the forces, waiting for further news, in this position, so remote from the sea. Imbecility could go no further.

During this time, events succeeded each other with great rapidity. The English fleet was composed of seven ships of the line, a great number of frigates, brigs, and large vessels belonging to the East India Company, in all seventy sail. They had on board an immense number of boats. As has been before said, Lord Keith commanded the naval and Sir Ralph Abercromby the land forces. The point selected for landing was the point always chosen previously, that is, the bay of Aboukir. There our squadron was anchored in 1798, when it was found and destroyed by Nelson; there the Turkish squadron had landed the brave Janissaries, conquered by General Bonaparte, in the glorious combat of Aboukir. The English fleet, after having been forced to stand off for several days, creating a delay which would have been fatal to them, and most fortunate to us, had Menou known how to take advantage of it, cast anchor in the road of Aboukir, on the 6th of March—15th Ventôse—at five leagues distance from Alexandria.

ABERCROMBY, SIR RALPH. Born in 1738, at Tillibodie, in Clackmannanshire. His first commission was in the 3d Dragon Guards, in 1756, and having passed through all grades of the service, he was a major-general in 1787. He was employed in Flanders and Holland, with the local rank of lieutenant-general. In 1795 he received the order of the Bath, and was appointed commander in chief of the forces in the West Indies, in which expedition he captured Grenada, St. Lucia, St. Vincente, Trinidad, Demerara, and Essequibo. In 1799

he distinguished himself in Holland under the Duke of York. In 1801, was appointed commander in chief of the expedition to Egypt, and on the 31st of March was unhorsed and wounded in two places, though he disarmed his antagonist, whose sword he gave to Sir Sidney Smith, in his victorious battle of Alexandria. He died of his wounds within a week, and was buried under the castle of St. Elmo, in Malta.—Encyclopedia Americana.

Lower Egypt, like Holland and Venice, is a country of lagoons. It presents, like all countries of this kind, a character which must be well understood, in order to execute properly any military operations of which it may become the theatre. At the points where the large rivers enter the sea, banks of sand form around their mouths. The banks are composed of sand brought down by the rivers, repelled by the sea, and thus between two conflicting forces, accumulate in ridges parallel to the shore. They constitute those barriers so dreaded by navigators, and always so difficult to surmount, in passing into or out of the channel of the river. They rise successively to the edge of the water, then, in time, above it, and form long sandy beaches, lashed on the outside by the waves of the ocean, and on the inside by the waters of the river, the course of which they interrupt. Where the Nile empties into the Mediterranean by numerous mouths, it has formed a vast semi-circle of these sand-banks. This semi-circle extends for at least seventy leagues, from Alexandria to Pelusium,¹ and is scarcely broken near Rosetta, Bourloz, Damietta and Pelusium, by a few apertures through which the waters of the Nile flow into the ocean. One side is washed by the Mediterranean, by lakes Mareotis, Madieh, Edko, Bourloz and Menzaleh. No landing can be made in Egypt, except on one of these sand-banks. Induced by example and necessity, the English had chosen that which forms the harbour of Alexandria. This bank, about fifteen leagues long, extending between the Mediterranean on the one hand, and lakes Mareotis and Madieh on the other, has Alexandria located at one extremity, and Rosetta at the other, terminating in a semi-circular re-entering. This semi-circular re-entering forms the roadstead of Aboukir. One shore of this roadstead was defended by the fort of Aboukir, built by the French, and commanding the adjacent coast. Then came some sand-banks, spread around the shore, and terminating on the other side of the roadstead, in a level sandy plain. General Bonaparte had ordered works to be thrown upon these banks. Had he been obeyed, a landing could never have been effected.

The English fleet, drawn up in two lines, anchored in this roadstead. They rode at anchor until the sea became sufficiently smooth for them to launch their boats. At last on the 8th, in the morning—17th Ventôse—the weather permitting, Lord Keith distributed 5000 picked men in 320 boats. These boats ranged in two lines, and led by Captain Cochrane, advanced, their wings being protected by a division of gun boats, which received and returned a very heavy cannonade.

General Friant, repairing to the spot, formed a little in the rear of the shore, to shelter his troops from the British artillery. He had thrown between him and the fort of Aboukir, a detachment of the 25th demi-brigade, with some pieces of cannon. On his left he had placed the 75th, two battalions strong, and hidden by the sand-banks; in the centre, two squadrons of cavalry, one of the 18th, and one of the 20th dragoons; lastly, on his right the 61st demi-brigade, also two battalions strong, and charged with the defence of the lower part of the shore. All his troops did not exceed 1500 men. Some outposts occupied the margin of the sea; the French artillery, posted on the projecting sites of the land, swept the roadstead with their guns.

The English advanced, the soldiers lying in the bottom of the boats, the sailors pulling lustily at the oars, and supporting with great coolness the fire of the artillery. As soon as a sailor fell, another took his place. The whole mass, moved by one impulse, was approaching the shore. At last they reached it; the English soldiers rose from the bottom of the boats, and jumped ashore. They formed and ran to the sandy encampment which bordered the bay. General Friant was informed of the circumstances by his outposts, which were driven in, but arrived rather late. Nevertheless, he ordered the 75th to the left, on the sand-banks, and the 61st to the right, toward the lower part of the shore. The latter gallantly charged the English, who were unsupported at that point. They drove them back and followed them into their boats. The grenadiers of this demi-brigade seized twelve boats, and directed a deadly fire on the enemy. The 75th, who, informed too late, had given the English time to obtain possession of the encampments on the left, rapidly advanced to dislodge them. Uncovered by this movement, and exposed to the fire of the gun-boats, it received a terrible discharge of grape, which killed thirty-two men and wounded twenty. It met at the same moment the terrible fire of the English infantry. This brave demi-brigade, surprised momentarily and placed on unequal ground, attacked in some confusion. General Friant wishing to support it, ordered a charge of the cavalry against the English, who were deploying in the plain, after having surmounted the first obstacles. The commander of the 18th dragoons, sent for several times to receive the general's orders, came at last. General Friant, amid a shower of balls, pointed out the precise point of attack. This officer, unfortunately somewhat timid, did not advance directly on the enemy, lost his time in making a detour, made an injudicious charge, and lost a great many men and horses, without shaking the English, and without disengaging the 75th, who were intent upon taking the sandy heights on the left. The squadron of the 20th alone remained. A brave officer, named Boussart, who commanded it, charged at the head of his dragoons, and overthrew all before him. Then the 61st, which, on the right, had remained masters of the shore, unable alone to overcome the body of enemy, took courage, followed the 20th dragoons, attacked the centre of the English, and forced them to re-embark. The 75th, under a terrible fire, renewed its attempts. If at this decisive moment General Friant had had the two battalions of infantry and the regiment of cavalry, he had so frequently demanded, the day would have been won, and the English driven to the sea. But a company of 1200 picked men, composed of Swiss and Irish, turned the sand-banks, and outflanked the left of the 75th, which was again forced to yield. It retired, leaving on our right the 61st, intent on victory, but compromised by its own success.

¹ Called by the moderns Tineh.

General Friant, seeing that the 75th being obliged to retrograde, the 61st might be surrounded, ordered a retreat, which he effected in good order. The grenadiers of the 61st, excited by carnage and success, obeyed with regret the orders of their general, and whilst retiring, kept the English at bay by some gallant charges.

The loss of Egypt followed that of this unfortunate day of the 8th of March—17th Ventôse. The brave General Friant had perhaps chosen his first position somewhat too far from the shore: perhaps also he had had too great confidence in the superiority of his soldiers, and supposed that the English could land but a few at a time. This confidence, however, was excusable, and after all, justified by the event, for if he had had one or two battalions more, the English would have been repulsed, and Egypt been saved. But what can be said of that general in chief, who, for two months, perfectly aware of the danger, had not concentrated his forces at Ramanieh, whence he might have directed 10,000 men to Aboukir, on the day of action? who, informed even on the 4th of March, by a courier who arrived that day at Cairo, had not despatched his troops, who might have arrived on the very morning of the 8th, and consequently been in time to repulse the English? What can be said of that Admiral Ganteaume, who might have landed 4000 men in Alexandria, on the very day that the Régénérée brought 300, who fought on the shore of Aboukir? What can be said of so much timidity, negligence, and faults of every kind, except that there are days, when the fates seem to conspire against the issue of battles and the existence of empires?

The combat had been bloody. The English lost 1100 men, killed and wounded, of 5000 engaged. Of 1500 of ours, 400 were disabled. Both sides had fought well. General Friant retired under the walls of Alexandria, and sent for immediate assistance to Menou, and the other generals in his vicinity.

All might however have been retrieved, had advantage been taken of the time still left, the forces at their disposal, and the embarrassing situation in which the English would be, when once landed on this sandy beach.

They had first to land the bulk of their army, and then their ammunition and provisions, all of which required considerable time. They were then obliged to march along this sandy bank, in order to approach Alexandria, with the sea on the right, and lakes Madieh and Mareotis on the left, supported, indeed, by their gun-boats, but without cavalry, and having no field artillery, but such as was dragged by men. Their advance must needs be slow, and surrounded by difficulties, for when before Alexandria, they would be reduced, to extricate themselves from this cul-de-sac, either to take that place, or to travel along the narrow dikes, which maintain the communication with the interior of Egypt. In order to arrest their progress, it was necessary no longer to fight partial and unequal combats, which gave them confidence, dispirited our troops, and reduced our forces, already too small. Even without fighting, the way might have been secured by a position. There was but one course left to pursue, which was to wait until Menou, whose blindness was now removed by facts, had collected the whole army under the walls of Alexandria.

General Lanusse, however, had been ordered with his division to Ramanieh. Having there heard of the transactions at Aboukir, he immediately marched for Alexandria. He had about 3000 men. Friant had lost 400 out of 1500 on the 8th of March, but having called in all the small posts, from Rosetta to Alexandria, he had still 17 or 1800. The forts of Alexandria were defended by the sailors and soldiers of the garrison. With the division of Lanusse he had nearly 5000 men to bring into action. The English had landed 16,000 exclusive of 2000 sailors. As yet it would have been improper to risk a battle. One circumstance, however, led the two French generals into error.

The long sand-bank on which the English had landed, separated by lakes Madieh and Mareotis from the interior of Egypt, communicated with it, only by means of a long embankment, passing between the two lakes and terminating at Ramanieh. This embankment formed both the canal bringing the fresh water of the Nile to Alexandria, and the high road from Alexandria to Ramanieh. At this moment it was in the greatest danger of being occupied by the English, for they had nearly reached the point where it unites to the sand-bank on which Alexandria is situated. The English had consumed the 9th, 10th, and 11th of March—18th, 19th, 20th Ventôse—in landing and organizing. On the 12th they took up their march, travelling with difficulty through the sand, the sailors of the squadron dragging the artillery, supported on the right and left by the gun-boats. On the evening of the 12th they were near the point of junction of the embankment with the ground of Alexandria.

Generals Friant and Lanusse were afraid to allow the English to occupy this point, and thus abandon to them the road to Ramanieh, by which Menou was to arrive. However, even had this road been lost, there was left another, long indeed, and difficult for the transportation of artillery; namely, Lake Mareotis itself. This lake, more or less overflowed according to the rise of the Nile and the season of the year, left exposed swampy shoals, over which a tortuous but secure road might have been found. Hence there was no reason for risking a fight, with all the chances against them.

Nevertheless, Generals Friant and Lanusse, magnifying the danger to which their means of communication were exposed, decided on offering battle. The fatality of this mistake might have been partly retrieved by remaining on the sandy heights which commanded the sand-bank, and terminated at the very head of the embankment. By remaining in this position, and using judiciously their artillery.

which was greatly superior to the English, they would retain all the advantages of the defensive, compensate for their inferior numbers, and probably succeed in keeping possession of the point, for which a second and deplorable combat was about to be fought.

Such was the plan agreed upon between Generals Friant and Lanusse. Lanusse was full of natural intelligence, bravery and audacity. He, unfortunately, was but little disposed to listen to the voice of prudence. Moreover having taken part in the dissensions of the army, he would have been delighted to achieve a victory before the arrival of Menou.

On the morning of the 13th of March—22d Ventôse—the English appeared. They were marching in three divisions; that on the left, followed the edge of Lake Mareotis, threatening the head of the embankment, and supported by the gun-boats: that of the centre advanced in the form of a square, flanked by battalions in close column, in order to repel the French cavalry, which the English greatly feared; and that on the right marched along the margin of the sea, supported, like the first, by the gun-boats.

The division which was to attack the head of the embankment had preceded the two others. Lanusse seeing the left wing of the English venturing unprotected along the lake, could not resist the desire of rushing on it. He committed the error of leaving the heights to attack it. But, at that very moment, the fearful square in the centre, hidden at first by the sandy downs, appeared on the other side of these downs, over which they had passed. Lanusse then, obliged to abandon his first intention, marched directly to this square, which was preceded at some distance by a line of infantry. He threw out the 22d chasseurs, who rushed on this line of infantry, cut it into two, and made two battalions lay down their arms. The 4th light infantry, advancing to support the 22d, completed the success. During this time, the square which had arrived within gun-shot, opened that dreadful fire of musketry which had already so much annoyed our army at the landing of Aboukir. The 18th light infantry hurried up, but it was met by a deadly fire, which occasioned some disorder in its ranks. At this moment the English were seen to advance from the right, having left the shore of the sea, in order to support the centre. Lanusse, then having only the 69th to support the 18th, ordered a retreat, not wishing to engage in too unequal a combat. Friant, on his side, surprised at seeing Lanusse descend to the plain, had also descended to assist him, and had advanced toward the head of the embankment, against the English left. He bore for a long time a heavy fire, which he returned by one equally heavy, when he perceived the retreat of his colleague. He then also retired, in order not to engage alone the English army. Both, after this short engagement, regained the position, which they were wrong ever to have left.

It was merely a reconnoissance, but a very superfluous one, which should have been avoided, for it was attended by a loss of 5 or 600 men; a loss deeply to be regretted, as we had not, like the English, the means of receiving reinforcements, and were obliged to fight with a force of only about 5 or 6000 soldiers. If the loss of the English could have indemnified us, it was great enough to satisfy us. They had, in fact, 13 or 1400 men disabled.

They determined to wait for Menou, who had at last decided upon marching to Alexandria. He had ordered General Rampon to leave Damietta and direct his forces to Ramanieh; he had with him the principal bulk of the soldiers. Nevertheless some troops were left in the province of Damietta, in the vicinity of Belbeis and Salabié, and even at Cairo, and Upper Egypt, which were not nearly so useful in those positions as they would have been before Alexandria. If Menou had evacuated Upper Egypt and confided it to Mourad Bey, and abandoned the city of Cairo, which was not much disposed to insurrection, to the soldiers of the garrisons there, he might have 2000 men additional to oppose to the enemy. Such an increase of force was certainly not to be despised, for the most important point of all, was to beat the English. The Egyptians, not dreaming of revolt, did not require the precautions used against them. They were only to be feared when the French were decidedly vanquished.

Menou, having reached Ramanieh, there learned the whole importance of the danger. General Friant had sent two regiments of cavalry to meet him. This general thought with reason, that shut up for several days in the walls of Alexandria, he would have no use for these regiments, and that, on the contrary, they would be very useful to Menou as a vanguard.

Menou was obliged to make long circuits, in the bed of Lake Mareotis itself, in order to reach the beach of Alexandria. He succeeded, however, with some fatigue, especially for his artillery. The troops arrived on the 19th and 20th of March—28th and 29th Ventôse. He arrived himself on the 19th, and could then see how enormous had been the mistake of allowing the English to land.

The enemy had received some reinforcements, and plenty of ammunition. He had taken possession of those same sandy heights occupied by Lanusse and Friant on the 13th of March. He had there thrown up some field works, and armed them with heavy cannon. To dislodge him would prove a very difficult task.

The English were likewise far superior to us in numbers. They had 17 or 18,000 men against less than 10,000. Menou brought at most 5000. We had not, therefore, 10,000 men to oppose 18,000, located in an entrenched position. All the chances which in the first, or even in the second affair were in our favour, had now turned against us. After having, in fact, endeavoured to drive the English to the sea, at first with 1500, then with 5000 men, it would have been extraordinary not to have attempted it, with nearly 10,000, which were almost all that could be collected at one point.

It must not be forgotten that another plan still remained, which it would have been much better to have adopted after the landing, and before the useless battle fought by Generals Lanusse and Friant; this was to have left the English in the cul-de-sac which they occupied: to have thrown up works of defence around Alexandria; to have intrusted it to the sailors and garrison soldiers, reinforced by 2000 active troops; to have evacuated all the ports excepting Cairo, where 8000 men might have been left, having the citadel as a place of refuge; then, to keep the field with the remainder of the army, that is with 9 or 10,000 men, to attack the Turks, if they entered through Syria, or the English, if they advanced into the interior, by the narrow dikes traversing Lower Egypt. We possessed the advantage of the various kinds of arms, cavalry, artillery, and infantry, and the exclusive command of the provisions of the country. They might have been blockaded, and probably forced to re-embark. But, to effect all this, there was required a general far more skilful than Menou, well versed as he was otherwise in the science of manœuvring troops. A chief, in short, was wanting, different from him, who, with all the chances of success in his favour, at the outset of the campaign, had so conducted himself as to turn them all against him.

Nevertheless it was a natural determination, to attack the English, and consistent with all that had been done, from the opening of the campaign. But, having once resolved on a decisive effort, it should have been put into immediate execution, in order not to give the Turks coming from Syria time to press us too closely.

Before offering battle, it was necessary to agree upon a plan. Menou was incapable of conceiving one, and he no longer had with his generals those relations which permitted him to ask their advice. Nevertheless the chief of the general-staff, Lagrange, asked Lanusse and Reynier to furnish a plan, which they did conjointly, and sent to Menou for his approbation. He adopted it almost mechanically.

The two armies were in sight of each other, occupying the sand-bank, about a league in width and fifteen or eighteen leagues in length, on which the English had landed. The French army was before Alexandria, on moderately elevated ground. In front of it extended sandy plains, and here and there downs, which the enemy had carefully entrenched so as to form a continuous chain of posts from the sea to Lake Mareotis. On our left, precisely against the sea, was seen an old Roman camp, of a square form, and uninjured, and a little in front of this camp, a small sand-hill, on which the English had thrown up a work. There they had posted their right, under cover of a double fire from this work and a division of gun-boats. In the middle of the battle-field, at an equal distance from the sea and Lake Mareotis, was another sand-hill, more elevated and extensive than the preceding, and crowned with entrenchments. On it the English centre rested. Lastly, quite to the right, on the side of the lakes, the ground decreasing in elevation terminated at the head of the dike, for which a battle had been fought a few days previously. A series of redoubts united the centre with the head of this embankment. The English had there, posted their left, protected, like their right, by a division of gun-boats, in Lake Mareotis. This front of attack presented an extent of near a league; it was provided with heavy artillery which had been dragged thither by men, and defended by a portion of the English army. But the bulk of the army was drawn up in two lines, in order of battle, behind these works.

It was agreed upon to move before day on the morning of the 21st of March—30th Ventôse—in order better to conceal our operations, and to be less exposed to the fire of the enemy's intrenchments. The intention of the French generals was to take these intrenchments at the first outset, carry them, pass through them, and attack the front of the English army drawn up in order of battle in their rear. Our left, consequently, under Lanusse, was to bear down in two columns, on the right wing of the English resting on the sea. The first of these two columns was to attack directly, and at a run, the work erected on a sand-hill in front of the Roman camp. The second, passing rapidly between this work and the sea, was to assail the Roman camp, and carry it. The centre of our army, under General Rampon, was ordered to extend far beyond this attack, to pass between the Roman camp and the great central redoubt, and assail the English army beyond the works. Our right wing, composed of the divisions of Reynier and Friant, but commanded by Reynier, was directed to deploy in the plain to the right, and feign an attack toward Lake Mareotis, in order to persuade the English that the true danger was in that quarter. In order to confirm them in this idea, the dromedaries were, by following the bed of Lake Mareotis, to make an attempt on the head of the dike. It was hoped that this diversion would facilitate the sudden attack of Lanusse toward the sea.

On the 21st—30th Ventôse—before break of day, they began to march. The dromedaries executed faithfully their orders. They crossed rapidly the dry parts of Lake Mareotis, dismounted in front of the head of the dike, carried the redoubts, and turned the artillery against the enemy. This was sufficient to deceive the attention of the English, and draw it toward Lake Mareotis. But, in order to execute successfully the plan agreed upon for the sea-side, there was needed a precision difficult to be obtained in night operations, still more difficult when there is not a sole chief, who can exactly calculate time and distances to direct the movements.

The division of Lanusse, manœuvring in the dark, advanced in disorder, and frequently jostled our troops of the centre. The first column, under command of General Sully, marched resolutely to the redoubt in front of the Roman camp. Lanusse led it in person to the very spot, but suddenly perceived that the second column was going astray, and that instead of going along the sea to attack the Roman camp, it was approaching too closely the first. He ran to it to give it the proper direction. Unfortunately he fell mortally wounded in the thigh; a fatal event, and fraught with the most disastrous consequences! The sudden removal of this gallant officer from his men, slackened their energy. Day was beginning to break, and showed the English where to direct their fire. Our soldiers, exposed at the same time to the fire of the gun-boats, the Roman camp, and the redoubts, exhibited the most admirable firmness. But in a short time all their superior officers being killed or wounded, they became confused, and fell back behind some sand hillocks, scarcely sufficient to cover them. During this time, the first column, which Lanusse had left in order to direct the second, had carried the first redan of the redoubt placed on an eminence to the right. They then marched directly to the body of the work, but failed in their front attack, and turned to attack by the flank. The centre of the army under Rampon, seeing the situation of this column, turned also from its object to assist them. The 32d demi-brigade, detached from the centre, attacked the fatal redoubt. This union of attempts created a kind of confusion. Their most energetic efforts were directed against this obstacle, and the sudden manœuvre which was to have consisted merely in carrying at a run the line of works, was changed into a prolonged and obstinate attack, costing much valuable time. The 21st demi-brigade, which belonged to the centre, leaving the 32d before the warmly contested redoubt, executed alone the plan projected, passed the line of intrenchments, and deployed bravely in front of the English army. It received and returned a dreadful fire. It became necessary to support it, and Menou, during this time, incapable of commanding, was walking over the battle-field, giving no orders, and permitting Reynier to extend uselessly on the plain to the right with a considerable force not brought into action.

Menou was then advised to charge the English, opposed by the 21st alone, with the cavalry, about 1200 strong. He immediately issued the necessary orders. The brave General Roize placed himself instantly at the head of these 1200 horsemen, crossed rapidly the dangerous pass, formed by the redoubts of the right and left, which our infantry was vainly attacking, debouched beyond, found the 21st demi-brigade engaged with the English, on whom he fell with great impetuosity. This heroic cavalry leaped a ditch which separated them from the enemy, and rushed with ardour upon the first line of the English infantry, overthrew it, and sabred a great number of men. It was then obliged to retire. If Menou, at this moment, or even Reynier, supplying the deficiency in his chief, had directed our right wing to the support of the cavalry, the centre of the English army overturned and driven beyond the works, certain victory must have followed. The works, isolated and separated from all support, would have fallen into our hands. Nothing of this kind took place. The French cavalry having overthrown the enemy's first line, seeing others still to overcome, and supported only by the 21st demi-brigade, retreated, passing again through the deadly fire of the redoubts.

From this moment, the battle could be productive of no advantageous results. The left, dismayed by the death of their general, maintained a useless fire on the intrenchments, whence one more deadly was returned. The right, deployed in the plain near Lake Mareotis, to make a diversion which no longer had any object, for since the battle had become general each corps retained its position, was of no service. Undoubtedly an active general, who would have brought it down upon the centre, and, renewing the attack with General Roize, would have made a second upon the bulk of the English, might have changed the aspect of the battle. But General Menou did not know how to command, and Reynier, who at this moment might have assumed a responsibility, which he so often did at unreasonable times in civil affairs, contented himself with complaining at receiving no orders from the commander in chief. In this state of things the only alternative left was to retreat. Menou issued the order, and the divisions fell back, still preserving a show of resistance, and suffering additional loss from the fire of the works.

What a spectacle is war, when the lives of men and the fate of nations, are thus intrusted to chiefs who are imbecile or at variance with each other, and when blood flows, in proportion to the ignorance or dissensions of those in command!

It could not be said that the battle was lost, as the enemy had not advanced a single step—but it was lost, the moment that it was not completely gained, for an unconditional victory was necessary to drive the English back to Aboukir and force them to re-embark. Both sides had suffered great loss. The English had had about 2000 men disabled, and among them the brave General Abercromby, carried in a dying state on board his ship. The loss of the French was nearly equal. Exposed for a whole day to a raking front and flank fire, they had had a most trying position. The troops had displayed extraordinary coolness. The dashing charge of the cavalry filled the English with surprise and admiration. The number of French officers and generals wounded was greater than usual. Generals Lanusse and Roize were killed; Brigadier-general Silly, commanding one of the columns of Lanusse, had his thigh carried away; and General Baudot was wounded beyond all hope of recovery. General Destaing was dangerously hurt. Rampon's clothes were riddled with balls.

The moral effect was still more serious than the actual loss. No hope of forcing the enemy to re-embark was left. We were about to be attacked by the English landing at Alexandria, the Turks coming from Syria, the capudan pasha with the Turkish squadron, preparing to land 6000 Albanians at Aboukir; lastly 6000 Sepoys, brought from India by way of the Red Sea, and close to Cosseir, on the borders of Upper Egypt. What was to be done in the midst of so many enemies, with an army, the bravery of which was still undaunted, but which, when the affairs of the colony took a wrong direction, was always ready to exclaim, that the expedition had been a splendid folly.

and that they were uselessly sacrificed to a vain chimera?

In the three engagements of the 8th, 13th, and 21st of March, nearly 3500 men had been disabled, a third of whom were killed, a third dangerously wounded, and a third would be unable to enter the ranks for some weeks. Although the army was greatly weakened, even yet, as in the beginning of the campaign, they might have manœuvred with rapidity amongst the corps of the enemy which were endeavouring to effect a junction; have beaten the vizier if he entered by Syria; the capudan pasha, if he attempted to penetrate by Rosetta; and the English did they essay to march along the narrow tongues of land which communicated with the interior of Egypt. The 3500 men lost to the army rendered this more difficult than ever. If 8000 men were left at Cairo, 2 or 3000 at Alexandria, there would be left scarcely 7 or 8000 men to take the field, even supposing that all the disposable forces had been collected, and all the secondary posts, without exception, evacuated. With a very determined and skilful general, this might have been followed by an uncertain but possible success: but what was to be expected from Menou and his subalterns?

The resource was still left. As yet it was not despaired of, and was daily expected. This resource was Ganteaume and his fleet; and the troops he had on board, 4000 men, arriving at that time might have saved Egypt. An advice boat had been sent to the admiral, to inform him of a point in the coast of Africa twenty or thirty leagues to the west of Alexandria, at which he might land, far out of the reach of the English. Three thousand men might have been left in Alexandria, and, collecting the surplus at Cairo, there would have been 10 or 11,000 men, fit to take the field.

But Ganteaume, although very superior to Menou, did not act with any more energy in the circumstances in which he was placed. After having repaired at Toulon the damages he met with on leaving Brest, as has been seen, he sailed from Toulon on the 19th of March—28th Ventôse—returned on account of the grounding of the Constitution, and sailed again on the 22d of March—1st Germinal. At this moment he was sailing toward Sardinia. A favourable wind, a determined spirit, might have borne him to the Egyptian shore, for he had adroitly escaped from Admiral Warren, by following another course. He was already fifteen leagues from Cape Carbonara, the extreme point of Sardinia, and about entering the channel, separating Sicily from Africa. Unfortunately during the evening of the 26th of March, one of his captains commanding the Dix-Août, in the absence of Captain Bergeret, who was sick, was awkward enough to run foul of the Formidable, by which both vessels were greatly damaged. Alarmed by this accident, and the damage done, Ganteaume deemed it imprudent to remain at sea any longer, and returned to Toulon on the 5th of April—15th Germinal—fifteen days after the battle of Canopus.

All this was unknown in Egypt, and notwithstanding the length of time elapsed, a ray of hope still remained. Every sail which appeared in sight was supposed to be Ganteaume. In this state of anxiety, no plans were adopted, all was left in a fatal state of inaction. Menou merely threw up some works around Alexandria to resist any attack from the English. He ordered Upper Egypt to be evacuated, and the brigade of Donselot to be withdrawn and sent to Cairo. He had despatched some troops from Alexandria to Ramanieh, to watch the movements of the enemy in the direction of Rosetta. To crown the disasters, Mourad Bey, whose fidelity had never been shaken, had just died of the plague, and left his Mamelukes to Osman Bey, in whom confidence could not be placed. The plague began to rage at Cairo. Affairs were getting worse, and tending fast to a fatal crisis.

The English, on the other hand, fearing the army before them, attempted nothing. They preferred to march slowly but safely. They waited especially until their allies the Turks, whom they distrusted, were able to assist them. A month had elapsed since their landing, without their having attempted any enterprise but that of taking the fort of Aboukir, which made a brave defence, but was silenced by the overwhelming fire of their ships. Lastly, about the beginning of April, they determined to throw off their supineness, and free themselves from the kind of blockade to which they were reduced. Colonel Spencer was ordered, with a body of a few thousand English, and the 6000 Albanians under the capudan pasha, to cross the bay of Aboukir, and land before Rosetta. Their intention was thus to open a communication with the interior of the Delta, to procure fresh provisions which they greatly needed, and join the vizier, who was advancing toward the other extremity of the Delta, by way of the Syrian frontier. There were at Rosetta but a few hundred French, who could oppose no resistance to this attempt, and fell back, by ascending the Nile.

At El-Ain, a short distance in front of Ramanieh, they joined a small body of troops sent from Alexandria, composed of the 21st light infantry, and a company of artillery. The English and Turks, masters of a mouth of the Nile, by which they could obtain provisions, having access to the interior of Egypt, thought of turning their success to advantage, but in no great haste, for they waited more than twenty days before marching forward. An energetic and prudent enemy had now a favourable opportunity to beat them. General Hutchinson, the successor of Abercromby, had not dared to weaken his camp before Alexandria. He had sent scarcely 6000 English and 6000 Turks toward Rosetta, although he had received reinforcements which amply covered his losses, and placed about 20,000 men at his disposal. If General Menou, making good use of his time, and employing the month spent in throwing up around Alexandria the works indispensable to its protection, had so arranged his affairs as to leave but a small garrison there: if he had sent about 6000 men to Ramanieh, and drawn to this point all that was not necessary at Cairo, he might have opposed 8 or 9000 men to the English, who had just entered by Rosetta. These would have sufficed to have driven them back to the mouths of the Nile, to have revived the spirit of the army, secured the wavering submission of the Egyptians, retarded the march of the vizier, placed the English in a state of blockade on the shore of Alexandria, and restored our lost chances. This was the last opportunity, and he was advised to seize it, but always timid, he only half followed the counsel given to him. He sent General Valentine to Ramanieh with a reinforcement which was declared insufficient. He then sent a second, with the chief of his general-staff, General Lagrange. Both of these together did not exceed 4000 men. He did not, however, order the troops from Cairo; and General Lagrange, otherwise a brave officer, was not the man to make much head with such means, against 6000 English and 6000 Turks. Menou should have collected there at least 8000 men, under his best general. He might have done so by a strong concentration of his forces, and sacrificing everywhere the secondary to the primary objects of the day.

¹ GENERAL HUTCHINSON, afterwards created Earl of Donoughmore, for his exploits in Egypt.

General Morand, who commanded the first detachment sent to Rosetta, established himself at El-Ast, on the borders of the Nile, near the town of Fouah, in a position presenting some advantages for defence, where he was joined by General Lagrange. The English and Turks, masters of Rosetta and the mouths of the Nile, soon covered the river with their gun-boats, and carried the small open town of Fouah. We were therefore obliged to fall back on Ramanieh, on the night of the 8th of May—18th Floréal. The site of Ramanieh did not present many advantages for defence, and the strength of the place could hardly counter-balance the numerical superiority of the enemy. However, should a desperate resistance become anywhere necessary, Ramanieh was the place; for, this position once lost, the detached corps of General Lagrange would be separated from Alexandria, and forced to fall back on Cairo. The French army would be thus divided into two, one half shut up in Alexandria, and the other in Cairo. If, when united, it could not successfully oppose the English, it could hardly be expected, when divided, to make a very effectual resistance. Under these circumstances, the only resource left was to capitulate. The loss of Ramanieh was therefore the loss of Egypt. Menou wrote to General Lagrange that he was hastening to his assistance with 3000 men, proving that he had this number at his disposal. There were in fact 3000 at Cairo; consequently, they might have had 9000, or at least 8000 at Ramanieh. Then, in an open country, with excellent cavalry and light artillery, and the determination to conquer or die, victory was certain. But Menou did not show himself, and Belliard, who commanded at Cairo, received no orders. General Lagrange, at the head of his 4000 men, rested his rear-guard on Ramanieh and the Nile, on which this little town is built. In this position the English gun-boats occupied the river in his rear, and discharged a shower of balls into the French camp; in his front to the plain, without any other protection than some very insufficient field-works, was the bulk of the enemy composed of Turks and English. They were about 12,000 against 4000. The danger was great; nevertheless, it would have been better to have fought, and if conquered, yielded prisoners on the field of battle, after having struggled all day, than to have abandoned such a position, without striking a blow. Four thousand men, of such troops, determined to defend themselves, would have had some chances of success. But the chief of Menou's general-staff, though devoted to his general and the preservation of the colony, not calculating the consequences of this retreat, abandoned Ramanieh on the evening of the 10th of May—20th Floréal—in order to retire to Cairo. There he arrived on the morning of the 14th. He had lost at Ramanieh a convoy of immense value, and what was still more important, all communication with the army was cut off.

From this day, Egyptian affairs became unworthy of criticism, and lost all interest. The actors in the scene soon fell with their fortunes, even beneath themselves. Everywhere was exhibited the most shameful weakness, added to the most lamentable incapacity. When we speak of the men, we mean the chiefs alone; for the soldiers and subaltern officers, always gallant in presence of the enemy, were ready to die to the last man. Not once did they tarnish the escutcheon of their former glory.

At Cairo, as at Alexandria, but one resource was left, that of capitulation. The only merit now remaining, and which is often a very delicate matter, was to retard the capitulation. Frequently, whilst seeming only to defend one's honour, in reality, one's country is saved! Masséna, by prolonging the defence of Genoa, had rendered possible the victory of Marengo. The generals occupying Cairo and Alexandria, by continuing a hopeless resistance, might yet support very usefully the important negotiations between France and England. It is true, they were not aware of this; and for this reason, when we are ignorant of the services which may be rendered by prolonging a defence, we should listen to the voice of honour which commands us to resist to the last extremity. Of these two blockaded generals the most unfortunate, for he had committed most faults, Menou, by obstinately delaying the surrender of Alexandria, was yet useful, as will be seen, to the interests of France. This was subsequently a source of consolation to him, and palliated his conduct in the opinion of the First Consul.

When the troops returned to Cairo, a council of war was held to deliberate on the course to be pursued. General Belliard, from his rank, was commander in chief. He was a prudent man, but more prudent than determined. There remained about 7000 active troops and 5 or 6000 sick and wounded, and now employed in various departments in the army. The plague was raging; they had but little money and provisions, and a town of immense extent to defend, for which 7000 men were scarcely sufficient. The walls were nowhere capable of resisting European engineers. The citadel, indeed, offered a place of refuge, but could not contain 12,000 Frenchmen, nor protect them against the English heavy artillery. This post was only useful as a protection against the populace of Cairo. There were evidently but two things to do: either to attempt, by a bold march, a descent into Lower Egypt, the surprise of the passage of the Nile, and a junction with Menou at Alexandria, or to fall back on Damietta, which would be more certain and easy, on account of the crowd of people that must be carried with them. Once there, in the midst of the lagoons which communicate with the Delta, only by very narrow tongues of land, which 7000 soldiers of the army of Egypt could have defended for a long time against an enemy two or three times their superior in force. They were certain of obtaining an abundant supply of provisions, for the province was well furnished with cattle, Damietta well stocked with grain, and Lake Menzaleh abounded in the best and most suitable fish for the troops. Since capitulation alone was left, Damietta afforded a chance of delaying for five or six months at least this melancholy alternative. The engineer d'Hautpoul proposed this judicious plan; but, for its adoption it was necessary to evacuate Cairo. General Belliard, who, a few days subsequently, was capable of surrendering this town to the enemy, by a disgraceful capitulation, would not consent at that time to evacuate it voluntarily, for a bold and ingenious military reason. He therefore determined to remain in this capital of Egypt, without knowing what he was to do there. On the left bank of the Nile, the English and Turks ascended from Ramanieh to Cairo; on the right bank, the grand-vizier, followed by 25 or 30,000 men, composed of miserable oriental troops, was coming from Syria, and advancing upon Cairo, by the way of Belbels. General Belliard, remembering the glories of Heliopolis, wanted to meet the vizier by the same route pursued by Kléber. At the head of 6000 men he advanced as far as the heights of Elmenafir. Surrounded frequently by a cloud of horsemen, he sent his light artillery after them, who here and there reached a few of them with their balls. This was the only result he could obtain. The Turks, prudently commanded this time, would not accept a battle off Heliopolis. There was but one way to excite them, which was to take their camp at Belbels. But General Belliard, received at all the villages by discharges of musketry, found the number of his wounded hourly increasing, as well as the distance separating him from Cairo. He was afraid at least the English and Turks should enter there during his absence. Before leaving it he should have foreseen this danger, and inquired if he had time sufficient to make the passage of Belbels. Having left Cairo without knowing what to do, he returned thither in the same condition, after a useless manœuvre, which caused the whole population to suppose that he had been beaten. Like all recently conquered people, the Egyptians wavered with fortune, and, although not discontented with the French, they were disposed to abandon them. There was, however, no fear of an insurrection, unless they were anxious to condemn the city of Cairo to the horrors of a siege.

The French army, disgusted with the humiliations to which the incapacity of their generals exposed them, had completely returned to the ideas which brought about the convention of El-Arisch. They consoled themselves by dreaming of revisiting France. If a resolute and skilful general had given them an example, such as was given by Masséna to the garrison of Genoa, they would have followed him; but nothing of this kind was to be expected from General Belliard. Pressed on the left bank of the Nile by the Anglo-Turkish army coming from Ramanieh, on the right by the grand-vizier, who kept pace with it, he proposed to the enemy a suspension of arms, which was gladly accepted, for the English were more ambitious of utility than of glory. Their chief desire was the evacuation of Egypt, no matter at what price. General Belliard assembled a council of war, in which debates were carried on with great warmth. He was told that he had neither known when to abandon Cairo, to take post at Damietta, nor how to maintain himself in that capital of Egypt by well-concerted operations; that he committed a folly in going out to attack the vizier, without succeeding in coming to close quarters with him, and that, now, not knowing where to lay his head, he inquired of his officers whether they should negotiate or be killed, when he had already resolved the question himself, by the spontaneous commencement of negotiations. Reproaches were heaped upon him with great bitterness, especially by General Lagrange, a friend of Menou, and a warm advocate for the preservation of Egypt. Generals Valentin, Duranteau, Dupas, agreed with Lagrange, that for the honour of the flag, they ought to offer battle. This, unfortunately, could not be done without great cruelty for the army, and the numerous host of artificers and sick following in its train. Before them were more than 4000 of the enemy, without reckoning the Sepoys, who, having landed at Cosseir, were descending the Nile with the Mamelukes, who had forsworn their allegiance since the death of Mourad Bey. Behind was a population of 30,000 half-barbarians, desolated by the plague, threatened with famine, and always ready to rebel against the French. The space to be defended was too extensive to be guarded by 7000 men, and too weak to resist European engineers. They and the colony might be carried by assault, and put to the sword. In vain did some brave officers raise the cry of injured honour; to surrender was their only choice. General Belliard, anxious to prove himself fit for every thing, again agitated the question of retiring to Damietta, now rather unseasonable, and another not less ridiculous, that of retreating to Upper Egypt. This latter intention was wholly absurd. They were merely artifices of weakness, endeavouring to conceal his confusion under a false show of daring. The capitulation was therefore determined on; and there was nothing else left to do, if they were not desirous of having their throats cut by remaining.

Delegates were sent to the Anglo-Turkish camp to negotiate a capitulation. The enemy's generals accepted the proposition with joy, so greatly did they fear, even at this moment, a vicissitude of fortune. They granted the most advantageous conditions to the army. They agreed that they should retire with the honours of war, with their arms and baggage, artillery and horses, and be transported to France, and be victualled during the voyage, at the expense of England. Those of the Egyptians who wished to follow the army (and some of them were compromised by their alliance with the French) were at liberty to do so. They were also to be allowed to sell their effects.

This capitulation was signed on the 27th of June, 1801, and ratified on the 28th—8th and 9th Messidor, year IX. The pride of the old soldiers of Egypt and Italy was cruelly wounded. They were about returning to France, not as in 1798, after the victories of Castiglione, Arcola, and Rivoli, proud of their glory, and the services they had rendered the Republic; they were about returning after having been conquered, but they were about to again behold their country, and this consoled those gallant men, so long exiled from home, for all their reverses. There was a deep-seated satisfaction visible on every countenance, though not confessed. The chiefs alone were gloomy, thinking of the judgment the First Consul would pass on their conduct. The despatches which accompanied the capitulation were marked by the most humiliating anxiety. The men, who, by their own achievements, were most exempted from blame, were selected to carry these despatches; they were the engineer d'Hautpoul, and the director of the powder factory, Champy, both of whom had been so useful to the colony.

Menou was shut up in Alexandria, and, like Belliard, was forced to surrender. But a short time must elapse between the two. The plague was making some ravage in Alexandria; provisions were becoming scarce, in consequence of the want of foresight in laying in an ample supply in case of a siege. The Arabs, lured by the hope of gain, had indeed brought milk, meat, and some grain. They had, however, no wheat, and had to substitute rice for it in making bread. The scurvy lessened daily the number of efficient men. The English, in order to completely isolate the place, had conceived the idea of turning Lake Madieh into the half-dried Lake Mareotis, so as to surround Alexandria with water, on which they might have a continuous line of gun-boats. To effect this they had made an opening in the embankment from Alexandria to Ramanieh, and separating the two lakes. But, as there was only nine feet in the difference of the level, the waters were but slowly discharged, and, moreover, the operation, judicious, had it been of importance to separate Belliard from Menou, was no longer of any use after the occurrences at Cairo. If it extended the line of gun-boats, it gave the French the advantage of contracting the front of attack, without even cutting off their communication with the caravans, for the long sandy beach on which Alexandria is situated communicates by the west with the desert of Libya. Therefore the English were anxious to complete the investment as soon as possible; and for this purpose they embarked troops in their boats; and landed about the middle of August—end of Thermidor—not far from the tower of Marabout. They even began regularly to besiege that fort. From that time, the place, completely invested, was reduced to the necessity of surrendering.

The unfortunate Menou, left with nothing to do, and leisure to ponder over his mistakes, overwhelmed with universal censure, consoled himself with the idea of having made a heroic resistance, like that of Massena at Genoa. He wrote to the First Consul, and informed him of the desperate defence. Generals Damas and Reynier were left without troops at Alexandria. They used very improper language, and even went so far as to forget their own dignity. Menou ordered their immediate arrest and embarkation for France. This energetic act came too late, and produced but little effect. The good sense of the army blamed Reynier and Damas severely, but did not think much more of Menou. The only favour they granted him, was not to hate him. Listening coldly to his proclamations, in which he announced the determination to die rather than to yield, they were ready, if necessary, to fight to the last breath, but they did not believe in the necessity of it. They understood too well the consequences of the events at Cairo, not to foresee an approaching capitulation; and at Alexandria, as at Cairo, consoled themselves for their reverses by the hope of soon seeing France.

From this day, the presence of the French in Egypt was marked by no important occurrences, and the expedition was, as it were, terminated. Considered by some as a prodigy of skill and boldness, by others, and especially by those who affect to weigh events in the balance of sober reason, it has been regarded only as a brilliant chimera.

With all the appearance of wisdom, this latter sentence is absurd and unjust.

Napoleon, in his long and wonderful career, never conceived any thing greater, or which could be more truly useful. In truth, if it be remembered that we were unable to retain the Rhine and the Alps, it will be said, that, had we occupied Egypt for fifteen years, it would have been taken from us, like our continental frontiers, and that old and valuable possession the Isle of France, which was not the result of the wars of the Revolution. But in this view, it may even be asked, if the conquest of the Rhine was not itself a folly and a chimera. In order to form a proper opinion upon this question, it must, for an instant, be supposed that our long wars had terminated differently, and inquired, if, in that case, the possession of Egypt would have been possible, desirable, and important. The answer, in this aspect of the question, cannot be doubtful. In the first place, England was almost ready in 1801 for certain considerations to give us Egypt. These considerations explained to our ambassador were not exorbitant. During the maritime peace which ensued, the termination of which we shall soon show, the First Consuls foreseeing the short duration of this peace, would have, undoubtedly, sent immense resources to the mouths of the Nile, both in men and provisions, and that splendid army to St. Domingo, to seek an indemnification for lost Egypt, would for a long time have guaranteed the new colony from any attack. A general like Decaen or Saint-Cyr, adding to experience in war the art of governing, having, in addition to the 22,000 men remaining in Egypt, from the first expedition, the 30,000 who perished uselessly at St. Domingo, in a perfectly healthy climate, a country of inexhaustible fertility, cultivated by peasants obedient to all masters, and not carrying a musket with their plough,—a general, we repeat, like Decaen or Saint-Cyr, with such means, would have gloriously defended Egypt, and founded a superb colony.

Success was certainly possible. We may add that, in the maritime and commercial struggle maintained by France and England against each other, the attempt was in some measure required. In fact, England had just conquered the Indian continent, and obtained the supremacy of the Eastern Ocean. Could France, until then her rival, yield without a contest, such a supremacy? Did she not owe it to her glory, to her destiny, to fight? Policians and patriots must here give the same answer. Yes! she must carry the war into those regions of the East, that vast field of ambition of maritime nations, and there endeavour to gain some possessions, to counter-balance those of the English. Admitting this truth examine the world, and say if there was a possession better calculated than Egypt for the end proposed? She, alone, was worth the finest lands; she bounded on the richest, and most fertile, and those which furnished the most ample food for foreign trade. She brought to the Mediterranean, which was then ours, the commerce of the East; she was, in a word, an equivalent for India, and, at all events, was the high-road thither. The conquest of Egypt was therefore of immense service to France, to the independence of the seas, and to the civilization of the world. Therefore, as may be elsewhere seen, our success was more than once desired in Europe in those short intervals when hatred did not disturb the harmony of cabinets. For such an end, it was worth losing an army, not only that sent at first to Egypt, but that subsequently sent to perish uselessly in St. Domingo, Calabria, and Spain. Would to Heaven, that in the flights of his lofty imagination, Napoleon had never conceived any plan more rash!

BOOK XI.

GENERAL PEACE

Last and fruitless Expedition of Ganteaume. He touches at Derne, does not dare to land 2000 men he had on board, and turns back to Toulon—Capture of the Swiftsure—Admiral Lincol, sent from Toulon to Cadiz, is obliged to anchor in the bay of Algeiras—Battle of Algeiras—A squadron, composed of French and Spaniards, sails from Cadiz, to succour the division of Lincol—Return of the combined Fleets to Cadiz—Combat of the rear-guard with the English admiral Saumarez—Terrible mishap of two Spanish ships, who, during the night, mistake each other for enemies, enrage, and both blow up—Gallant Feat of Arms of Captain Troude—Short campaign of the Prince of Peace against Portugal—The Court of Lisbon sends an Ambassador to Badajoz, submitting to the combined will of France and Spain—Progress of European affairs since the Treaty of Lunéville—Increasing Influence of France—Residence at Paris of the Infantas of Spain, intended to reign in Etruria—Renewal of the Negotiation at London, between M. Otto and Lord Hawkesbury—New aspect given to the question by the English—They demand Ceylon in the Indies, Martinico or Trinité in the Antilles, Malta in the Mediterranean—The First Consul answers these claims by threatening to conquer Portugal, and if necessary making a descent upon England—Warm Polemics between the Moniteur and the English Journals—The British Cabinet renounces Malta, and renews all its claims by demanding the Spanish Island of Trinité—The First Consul, in order to save the possessions of an allied power, offers the French Island of Tobago—The British Cabinet refuses—Silly conduct of the Prince of Peace, which furnishes an unexpected explanation—This Prince treats with the Court of Lisbon, without consulting France, and thus deprives the French Legation of the argument drawn from the Dangers of Portugal—Irritation of the First Consul, and Threats of War with Spain—M. de Talleyrand proposes to First Consul to terminate the Negotiation at the expense of the Spaniards, by giving to the English the Island of Trinité—M. Otto receives authority to make this concession, but only at the last extremity—During the Negotiation, Nelson bravely endeavoured to destroy the Flotilla at Bologne—Combats of Bologne, between Admirals Latouche-Treville, and Nelson—Defeat of the English—Rejoicing in France, and uneasiness in England, in consequence of these two engagements—Disposition to Reconciliation—The last Difficulties are passed over, and the preliminaries of Peace concluded by the sacrifice of the Island of Trinité—Unexampled Joy in England and France—Colonel Lauriston ordered to carry to London the Ratification of the First Consul, is carried in triumph for some hours—Assembling of a Congress at Amiens to conclude on a definitive Peace—Succession of Treaties signed one after another—Peace with Portugal, the Ottoman Porte, Bavaria, Russia, etc.—Celebration of Peace on the 18th Brumaire—Lord Cornwallis, Plenipotentiary at the Congress of Amiens, present at this festival—His reception by the Parisian people—Banquet of the City of London—Extraordinary Testimonials of Sympathy exchanged at that time between the two nations.

WHILST the army of Egypt was surrendering, owing to the unskilfulness of its chief, and the want of timely assistance, Admiral Ganteaume was attempting his third sortie from Toulon. The First Consul scarcely gave him time to repair the damage done by the Dix-Août and indomptable running foul of each other, and was obliged to set sail almost immediately. Admiral Ganteaume put to sea on the 25th of April—5th Floréal. He was ordered to coast along the island of Elba, in order to make, whilst passing, a demonstration on Porto-Ferrajo, to facilitate its occupation by the French troops. The First Consul was intent on taking this island, secured to France by treaties with Naples and Etruria, and in which there was a small garrison, half Tuscan and half English. The admiral obeyed, appeared before the island of Elba, threw a few balls into Porto Ferrejo, and passed on, in order not to expose himself to damages, which might have rendered impossible the fulfilment of his mission. Had he sailed in a direct line, he might have been useful to the army of Egypt, for as has been seen the position of Ramanieh was lost only on the 10th of May—20th Floréal. He would have had time, by sailing on the 25th of April, to have prevented the French army from being cut in two, and the surrender of one division after the other.

To do this, not a moment should have been lost. But a kind of fatality awaited all the operations of Ganteaume. We have seen him sailing safely from Brest, enter safely the Mediterranean, suddenly lose all confidence, mistake four vessels for eight, and enter Toulon. We have seen him leaving this port in March, escape from Admiral Warren,¹ pass the southern point of Sardinia, and stop again, on account of the injuries received by the Dix-Août and Indomptable. He had not reached the climax of his misfortune. He had scarcely left the waters of the island of Elba, than a contagious disease broke out in his squadron. Either from the circumstance of the troops having been on board for a long time, or from ill-fortune, the disease attacked, with great rapidity, a great portion of the crew and the soldiers. It was deemed imprudent and useless to convey so many sick to Egypt, and Admiral Ganteaume determined to divide his squadron. Intrusting three ships to Vice-admiral Linois,² he placed in them the sick sailors and soldiers, and ordered them to Toulon. He continued his course with four ships and two frigates, with only 2000 troops, toward Egypt. But the time had gone for ever; the middle of May had arrived, and at that moment the French army was lost, for Generals Menou and Belliard were separated, by the abandonment of Ramanieh. Admiral Ganteaume was ignorant of this. He passed Sardinia and Sicily, appeared in the Gulf of Candia, escaped several times from the enemy, running up once as far as the Archipelago for that purpose, and at last anchored on the coast of Africa, a few days' sail to the west of Alexandria. The point he had selected was Derna, indicated in his instructions as suitable for landing. By furnishing the troops with provisions and money to hire camels from the Arabs, it was supposed that they could cross the desert, and reach Alexandria in a few days. This was a very hazardous conjecture. Admiral Ganteaume had anchored but a few hours, and begun to launch some of his boats, when the inhabitants crowded the shore, and kept up a warm firing. The youngest brother of the First Consul, Jérôme Bonaparte,³ was in the midst of the troops attempting a landing. They endeavoured in vain to conciliate the inhabitants. It would have been necessary to destroy their little town of Derne, and march to Alexandria without water, and almost without provisions, fighting all the time. It was a silly enterprise, without any good object, for 1000 or at most 2000 men might have reached the termination of the voyage. So feeble an existence was not worth the loss of so many brave troops. But an event, easily to be foreseen, put an end to all doubts. The admiral thought he saw the English fleet: he deliberated no longer, hoisted his boats aboard, did not even take time to weigh anchor, but cut his cables, in order not to be attacked at anchor. He set sail, and was never seen by the enemy.

Fortune, hitherto unpropitious—for as often is said, she only favours the brave—seemed about to make him some amends. Whilst crossing the Gulf of Candia, he met an English ship of the line, the Swiftsure. To chase, surround, and capture her, was the work of a few moments. This fortunate meeting occurred on the 24th of June—5th Messidor. Admiral Ganteaume entered Toulon, with this species of trophy, but a slight compensation for so many failures. The First Consul, inclined to deal kindly with men who had incurred great dangers with him, was willing to accept this compensation, and publish it in the Moniteur.

Nevertheless, all these squadron movements were about to finish in a manner less discreditable to our navy. Whilst Admiral Ganteaume was entering Toulon, Admiral Linois, who had come to land his sick soldiers and sailors, had again sailed under the formal orders of the First Consul. After whitewashing the inside of his ships, exchanging his sick for fresh troops, and recruiting his crew with able-bodied seamen, he set sail toward his new destination. A despatch, which was only to be opened at sea, ordered him to repair immediately to Cadiz, join the six vessels armed at that port by Admiral Dumanoir, the five Spanish ships of Ferrol, making with his own a division of fourteen vessels of the first class. The squadron of Rochefort, under Admiral Bruix, might possibly have arrived. They could then collect a squadron of more than twenty ships, which could command the Mediterranean for some months, take the troops from Otranto, and afford immense assistance to Egypt. It was unknown in France that it was too late, and that Alexandria was the only place left to defend. To have saved this last point, however, was not a matter of indifference.

¹ADMIRAL WARREN. SIR JOHN BORLASE.—A very distinguished officer. He commanded the naval portion of the expedition to Quiberon. In 1796 captured a French convoy off the Pennacks. In 1798, he took the Hoche line of battle ship with a squadron of frigates destined for Ireland. In 1801, he pursued Ganteaume's squadron, though in vain, off the coast of Egypt.—Brenton's Naval History.

²LINOIS. Probably the best naval officer France has ever produced. Besides the action in Algeiras bay, in which the Hannibal grounded under the enemies' batteries and was forced to surrender, though it is false that the Pompee struck her colours, he distinguished himself very greatly in the Indian seas.—Brenton's Naval History.

³JEROME BONAPARTE. Born at Ajaccio, in 1784. When the family was compelled to leave Corsica, he accompanied them in 1793 to France. Shortly after his brother assumed the command of the army of Italy, he was sent with his sister Caroline and the two sisters of Josephine, to Madame Campan's establishment at St. Germain. Thence he went to the college of Juilly in the department of the Seine et Marne, where he remained until the 18th of Brumaire, placed Napoleon at the head of the consular government. He then left college; and in his fifteenth year entered the navy. In 1801 he was appointed to the command of a small sloop of war, l'Epervier. He never realized the expectations of Napoleon, who always called him a "petit polisson," little scamp!—Court and Camp of Napoleon.

Admiral Linois hastened to obey, and sailed for Cadiz. On his way, he chased some English frigates, which he failed in taking, met with contrary winds at the entrance of the strait, and at last succeeded in penetrating it, about the beginning of July—middle of Messidor. The English fleet of Gibraltar, on the look-out near Cadiz, being pointed out to him, he anchored in the Spanish port of Algeiras, on the evening of the 4th of July—15th Messidor.

Near the straits of Gibraltar, that is toward the southern point of the peninsula, the mountainous coasts of Spain open, and, assuming the shape of a horse-shoe, form a deep bay which opens to the south. On one side of this bay is Algeiras, on the other Gibraltar; so that Algeiras and Gibraltar are opposite to each other, at about 4000 fathoms, or nearly a league and a half distance. From Algeiras Gibraltar can be easily seen with an ordinary glass. There was not a single English vessel in the bay, but Vice-admiral Saumarez¹ was not far off. He was watching with seven vessels the port of Cadiz, in which were several naval divisions, both French and Spanish. Informed of what was taking place, he hastened to take advantage of the opportunity of destroying the division of Linois, for he could oppose seven vessels to three. However of the seven he had detached one, the Superb, to watch the mouth of the Guadalquivir. He made the signal of recall, but the wind being unfavourable for the return of the Superb, he sailed for Algeiras, with six ships and one frigate.

Admiral Linois had likewise been warned by the Spanish authorities of the danger which threatened him, and had recourse to the only precautions afforded to him by the nature of the place. The coast of Algeiras, in the bay of that name, situated, as we have just said, opposite Gibraltar, presents an anchorage rather than a port. It is a slightly projecting, perfectly straight coast, extending from the south to the north, without any indentations to shelter a vessel. At the extremities of this anchorage are two batteries; one to the north of Algeiras, on an elevated point of the coast, known by the name of the battery of St. James; the other to the south of Algeiras, on a little is. and called Green island. The battery of St. James had five eighteen pounders, that of Green island seven twenty-four pounders. They could not be of much assistance, especially on account of the Spanish negligence, which had left all the ports along the coast unprovided with artillery-men and ammunition. Admiral Linois, however, communicated with the local authorities, who did all in their power to assist the French. He ranged his three ships and his frigate along the shore, resting the flanks of this short line on the two fortified posts of St. James and Green island. First came the Formidable, to the northward, and supported by the battery of St. James; then the Desaix, in the centre; lastly the Indomptable to the southward, near the battery of Green island. Between the Desaix and Green island was the frigate La Muiron. A few Spanish gun-boats were among the French ships.

On the 6th of July, 1801—17th Messidor, year IX.—about seven o'clock in the morning, Vice-admiral Saumarez, coming from Cadiz with a west-north-west wind, advanced toward the bay of Algeiras, doubled Cape Carneio, entered the bay, and bore up for the French line. The wind, unfavourable for the English ships, separated them from each other, and fortunately did not allow them to act with the unity they desired. The Venerable, which led the column, fell behind; the Pompey took her place. The latter passing along our line, received successively the fire of the battery of Green island, the frigates La Muiron, the Indomptable, the Desaix, and the Formidable, discharging a broadside at each of them. She took her position within gun-shot of the admiral's ship, the Formidable, commanded by Linois. There then began between these vessels a bloody combat, almost muzzle to muzzle. The Venerable, at first distant from the scene of action, endeavoured to close to assist the Pompey. The Audacious, the third English vessel, intended to engage the Desaix, could not get up high enough, attacked the Indomptable, the most to the south. The Cæsar and Spencer, the fourth and fifth English ships, were one in the rear, and the other driven to the lower part of the bay by the wind, which was blowing from west to east. Lastly, the sixth, the Hannibal, carried at first toward Gibraltar, but having succeeded in nearing Algeiras, endeavoured to beat to windward of the Formidable, and get between her and the shore. The combat between the vessels engaged was very obstinate. In order not to be driven toward Gibraltar, the English had each let go an anchor. Our admiral's ship, the Formidable, was engaged with two, the Pompey and the Venerable, to which a third would have been added, had the Hannibal succeeded in getting between her and the shore. The captain of the Formidable, the brave La-londe, had just been cut in two by a shot. The firing continued with great warmth amid cries of Vive la Republique! Vive le Premier Consul! Admiral Linois, on board of the Formidable, bringing his broadside to bear on the Pompey,

¹ SAUMAREZ, SIR JAMES, afterwards created LORD DE. A very distinguished naval officer. He was captain of the Orion 74, in the battle off Cape St. Vincent, on St. Valentine's day, in which the Santissima Trinidad struck to him, although she was not taken possession of, and got off for the present. At the Nile, was second to Nelson, still in the Orion, with one broadside of which he sunk La Serieuse frigate, and then took his station on the bow of the Franklin and the quarter of Le Souverain Peuple, engaging both with great spirit until the end of the action. He subsequently attacked a French squadron in Algeiras bay, unsuccessfully, owing to the variableness of the wind and the grounding of the Hannibal 74, which was taken. A few days after this he attacked the combined French and Spanish squadrons at night, with five sail of the line, a frigate and polacre, in all 422 guns, the enemy being nine sail of the line and four frigates, mounting 933 guns. In this action, the first off Trafalgar, two 113 gun-ships were blown up, and a 74 taken. He commanded after this at Gurnsey, when he bombarded Graeville, and after that in the Baltic, with as much of discretion and prudence as he had previously shown of gallantry and daring.—Brenton's Naval History.

who only presented her bows, had succeeded in dismasting and nearly disabling her. Taking advantage at the same time of the breeze, which had shifted to the east, and blew toward Algeiras, he made the signal to his captains to cut their cables, and let their ships go aground, so as to prevent the English from getting between us and the shore, thus placing us between two fires, as Nelson had done at the battle of Aboukir. The safety of the French ships was not much endangered by running aground, for it was low tide, and at high water they would certainly float. This order, timely given, saved the division. The Formidable having disabled the Pompey, grounded easily, for the wind had lulled in shifting. Thus extricated from the danger threatened by the Hannibal, she assumed a fearful position for this latter vessel. In fact, the Hannibal, in executing the manœuvre, grounded herself, and remained unmoving under the double fire of the Formidable and the battery of St. James. In this perilous situation, the Hannibal endeavoured to get afloat, but as the tide was falling, she remained firmly fixed in her position. She received from all sides a raking fire of artillery, by land, from the Formidable and the Spanish gun-boats. She sank one or two of these, but received a heavier fire than she could return. Admiral Linois, thinking that the battery of St. James was not well served, sent General Devaux thither with a detachment of French troops he had on board. The fire of the battery was then redoubled, and the Hannibal was overcome. But a new adversary completed her defeat. The second French ship, the Desaix, obeying the order to ground, and on account of the lightness of her breeze, having performed this manœuvre but slowly, was by this means thrown somewhat out of the line, at equal distances from the Pompey and the Hannibal. Profiting by this position, she fired a broadside at the Pompey, which made her strike; and then turned all her energy upon the Hannibal. Her balls, grazing the Formidable, committed great havoc on the Hannibal. At last, incapable of longer resistance, she struck her flag. Thus, two English vessels, out of six, were obliged to surrender. The four others had succeeded in recovering their alignment, and engaged at a convenient distance the Desaix and Indomptable. The Desaix, before grounding, had fought them gallantly, whilst the Indomptable and La Muiron, whilst retiring slowly toward the coast, answered them with a well-directed fire. These two vessels ranged themselves under the battery of Green island, the artillery of which was served by some French soldiers.

The battle had lasted for several hours with the greatest activity. Admiral Saumarez, having lost two vessels out of six, and hoping for no good result from this action, for in order to engage the French more closely he ran the risk of grounding, made the signal for retreat, leaving us the Hannibal, but endeavouring to carry off the Pompey, which, dismasted, remained unmoving on the field of battle. Admiral Saumarez sent to Gibraltar for small boats, which succeeded in towing away the hulk of the Pompey, which our ships being aground were unable to prevent. The Hannibal remained in our possession.

Such was the combat of Algeiras, where three French fought six English ships, destroyed two of them, one of which remained in our hands. The French were filled with joy, although they had suffered considerable loss. Captain Lalonde of the Formidable was killed. Monconsu, captain of the Indomptable, had gloriously died. We lost about two hundred killed and three hundred wounded, of two thousand men on board the squadron. The English, however, had nine hundred men disabled, and their vessels were riddled.

However great was the glory of this action, all was not over. It was absolutely necessary, in the damaged state of our vessels, to leave the anchorage of Algeiras. Admiral Saumarez, furious, and swearing to revenge himself as soon as Linois left his asylum to repair to Cadiz, was making great preparations. He employed the vast resources of the port of Gibraltar to put his division in fighting order, even got ready fire-ships, determined at least to burn the French vessels if he could not induce them to put to sea. Admiral Linois, to repair his damages, had only the resources, almost next to nothing, of Algeiras. The arsenal of Cadiz, indeed, was near there; but it was very difficult to get supplies thence by sea, on account of the English, and by land, from the difficulty of transportation: and yet the upper rigging of the French vessels was destroyed, and several of their masts either shot away or badly wounded. Admiral Linois exerted himself to the utmost to get ready for sea. He had scarcely wherewithal to dress the wounded. The French consuls of the neighbouring ports were obliged to send by post surgeons and medicines.

There were at this moment at Cadiz, the Spanish squadron, which had arrived from Ferrol, and the six vessels given to France and hastily equipped by Admiral Dumanoir. The strength of these two divisions, in point of numbers, was certainly great; but the Spanish navy, always worthy, by its bravery, of the illustrious nation to which it belonged, partook of the general neglect which paralyzed all the resources of the monarchy. The division of Admiral Dumanoir, scantily manned by sailors of all nations, was unworthy of very great confidence. Not one of the vessels composing it equalled those of the division of Linois, grown skilful by long cruises, and elated by their recent victory.

Admiral Massarède, commanding at Cadiz, and not very well disposed toward us, required the most earnest entreaties to assist Admiral Linois.

¹ DUMANOIR. This French admiral commanded a squadron of five ships of the line at Trafalgar, and died early in the day, with Gravina, leaving the gallant and unfortunate Villeneuve to his fate. He had borne no part in the action, but as he fled discharged his broadside into the captured Spanish ships, actually backing his topsails in order to fire with more precision into his own unfortunate allies. He was taken a few days later off Rochefort by Sir Richard Strachan.—Brenton's Naval History.—Soutby's Nelson. ■

On the 9th of July—20th Messidor—he dispatched Admiral Moreno, a brave and experienced officer, to Algeiras, with the five Spanish vessels from Ferrol, one of the six vessels given to Dumanoir, the San Antonio, and three frigates. This squadron carried the ammunition intended for the division of Linois. In one day it reached the anchorage of Algeiras.

Night and day they were employed in refitting the three ships which had fought so gallantly, and which had floated at the first full tide. They were rigged as well and as fast as possible, and on the morning of the 12th were ready for sea. The same attention was paid to the Hannibal, taken from the English, and intended to be sent to Cadiz.

On the morning of the 12th the combined squadron set sail, with an east-north-east wind, which carried it out of the bay of Algeiras, into the Strait. It advanced in order of battle, the two largest Spanish vessels, the San Carlos and Santa Hermenegilda, of 112 guns each, forming the rear-guard. According to Spanish usage, the two admirals were on board of a frigate, the Sabine. Toward evening the wind began to lull. They were unwilling to return to the anchorage of Algeiras on account of the danger of its position, in the presence of an enemy's fleet, strengthened probably by reinforcements daily expected by the English. They decided, however, on leaving the Hannibal behind, which could not sail, although towed by the Indienne. She was ordered back to the anchorage. The combined squadron was brought to, in the hope that in the course of the night the wind might freshen. Admiral Saumarez, on his side, had given orders for sailing. He had lost the Hannibal, the Pompey was unfit for service; he had therefore only four vessels of the six which had fought at Algeiras. But he had been joined by the Superb, thus giving him a force of five ships of the line, besides several frigates and small craft filled with combustible materials. He had carried his fury so far as to build in his ships furnaces for heating balls. Although he had only five line-of-battle ships, and the allies had nine, he was ready to dare any thing to retrieve the humiliating check he had received at Algeiras, and avoid the anger of the British Admiralty. He followed closely the Franco-Spanish squadron, waiting for a favourable moment to attack the rear-guard.

Toward the middle of the night the wind freshened, and the combined fleet again steered for Cadiz. Its order of sailing was somewhat changed. The rear-guard was formed by three ships abreast: the San Carlos on the right, the Santa Hermenegilda in the centre, and the San Antonio on the left. The darkness was intense. Admiral Saumarez ordered the Superb, an excellent sailer, to crowd all sail, and attack our rear-guard. The Superb soon reached the Franco-Spanish fleet. She had extinguished her fires so as not to be seen. Ranging herself a little to the rear of the San Carlos, and bringing her broadside to bear, she gave her the whole of it: then, continuing incessantly, she discharged a second and a third, with red-hot shot. The San Carlos soon took fire. The Superb, seeing this, stopped, and taking in sail, kept off at some distance. The San Carlos, wrapped in flames, manœuvred in disorder, fell off before the wind, and, instead of keeping the line, was soon astern of both of her companions. The balls from her guns were flying in all directions, and struck the Santa-Hermenegilda, who, mistaking her for the head of the English column, directed her fire against her. The Spanish crews then fell into a horrible error, each supposing the other to be an enemy. They ran foul of each other with great fury, and closing, so as to lock their yard-arms, engaged in bloody combat. The fire, gaining with rapidity on the San Carlos, soon communicated to the Santa Hermenegilda, and, in this state, the two vessels kept up a furious cannonade. The opposing squadrons were involved in darkness, and ignorant of what was going on; and, with the exception of the Superb, who understood this fatal mistake, as she had caused it, no vessel dared to approach, not knowing whether she was to assist or attack a Spanish or English ship. The French ship, San Antonio, was distant from this dangerous vicinity. The conflagration soon became terrible, and cast a gloomy light over the ocean. The fatal delusion which had arrayed these brave Spaniards against each other was then dispelled, but too late, and the San Carlos blew up with an awful explosion. In a few moments the Santa Hermenegilda shared the same fate, and spread horror throughout the squadron, ignorant as to which vessel was the victim.

The Superb, seeing the San Antonio separated from the two others, attacked her with great boldness. This vessel, recently armed, fought without the discipline and coolness, indispensable to the manœuvring of these large machines of war. She was terribly crippled, and two new antagonists, the Cæsar and Venerable, coming up at the same time, completed her defeat. She was obliged to strike after a gallant resistance.

Admiral Saumarez had taken a cruel revenge, productive of not much glory to him, but of great damage to the Spanish fleet. The two admirals, Linois and Moreno, in the Sabine, kept as close as possible to this terrible scene. Being unable, on account of the darkness, to distinguish the vessels, and give the necessary orders, they were in a state of great anxiety. At the break of day, they were at some distance from Cadiz, their squadron had collected, but was short of three of its number, the San Carlos, and Santa Hermenegilda, which had blown up, and the San Antonio, captured.

A fourth vessel of the combined fleet had remained behind, the Formidable, who had covered herself with glory in the battle of Algeiras, but was yet crippled by the wounds received on that day. Deprived of some of her canvas, sailing slowly, in close proximity to two burning ships, and fearing the fatal mistakes of the night, she had fallen astern, thinking she could be useful to neither of the combatants. She thus became separated from the rest of the squadron. Being seen in the morning by the English, she was attacked by a frigate and three vessels. Admiral Linois having gone on board the Sabine, left one of his subalterns, Captain Troude, in command of the Formidable. This skilful and brave officer, judging with extraordinary presence of mind, that, if he attempted to run, he would be outstripped by vessels better rigged than his own, resolved to seek safety in a bold manœuvre, and a gallant combat. His crew shared his feelings, and were unwilling to tarnish the laurels of Algeiras. They were old sailors, well disciplined by long cruising, and accustomed to war, a quality even more useful at sea than on land. Captain Troude did not wait until the pursuing enemy had collected all his forces against the Formidable, but laid himself alongside the nearest, the frigate Thames. He neared her, and opened a heavy and destructive fire, which soon disgusted her with the unequal contest. After her, came at full sail the Venerable, an English seventy-four. Captain Troude, feeling himself still superior, (the Formidable was an eighty gun ship,) waited for her, whilst the two other English ships, endeavouring to outsail him, attempted to cut off his road to Cadiz. Manœuvring skilfully, he presented his terrible broadside, to the unarmed bows of the Venerable, and adding to the superiority of his artillery the advantage of the manœuvre, he riddled her with shot, carried away first one, then a second and a third mast, and, having reduced her to a hulk, he pierced her with several dangerous shots between wind and water, thus exposing her to the immediate risk of sinking. This unfortunate ship, horribly crippled, excited the fears of the rest of the English division. The Thames came to her assistance; the two vessels which had attempted to cut off the road to Cadiz, immediately returned. They were anxious to save the crew of the Venerable, and overcome the French ship which had made so stout a resistance. The latter trusting to her manœuvre and her good fortune, directed upon them broadside after broadside; beat them off, and sent them to the assistance of the Venerable, about capsizing, if active measures were not taken for her safety.

The brave Captain Troude, freed from his numerous enemies, sailed in triumph for the port of Cadiz. A portion of the population, attracted by the cannonade during the night, was awaiting his approach. They had seen the danger and victory of the French ship, and despite a very natural grief at the loss of the two Spanish vessels, they shouted with joy, at the victorious return of the Formidable to the roadstead.

The English could not dispute with us the glory of the battle, and as to the actual loss it was pretty equally shared. If the French had lost one ship, and the Spaniards two, the English had left one in our possession, and had no so crippled as to be rendered entirely useless. Without an accident which occurred in the night, they might have been considered as completely beaten, in the different engagements. The battle of Algeiras and the return of the Formidable are among the most gallant feats of arms in the annals of the navy. But the Spaniards were very gloomy, for although their Admiral Moreno had behaved well, they were not indemnified, by a brilliant action, for the loss of the San Carlos and Santa Hermenegilda.

The affairs of Portugal, however, offered them some consolation. We left the Prince of Peace preparing to begin the war against Portugal, at the head of the combined forces of the two nations, in the hope, as was previously explained, of influencing the negotiations at London.

According to the plan agreed upon, the Spaniards were to operate on the left bank of the Tagus, and the French on the right. Thirty thousand Spaniards were collected before Badajoz, on the frontier of the Alentejo. Fifteen thousand French were marching by way of Salamanca, on the Tras-os-Montes. Owing to unheard of efforts, loans from the clergy, and the sacrifice of all business, 30,000 Spaniards had been equipped. The artillery, however, was far behind. Nevertheless the Prince of Peace, reckoning with justice on the moral effect of the union of the French and Spaniards, wished to commence hostilities, anxious to reap the first laurels. He wanted to gain all the honour of the campaign, and keep the French merely as a resource against reverses. The Prince of Peace was welcome to enjoy this pleasure. The French, at that time, were intent, not on glory, but on useful results; and these consisted in occupying one or two provinces of Portugal, so as to hold an additional guarantee against England. Though the war seemed easy, there was one danger to fear, that is, that it might become national on the part of the Portuguese. Their hatred for the Spaniards might have produced this unhappy result, if the approach of the French, a few days march in the rear, had not dispelled all thoughts of resistance. The Prince of Peace, therefore, hastened to pass the frontier, and attack the towns of Portugal with a field battery having no besieging artillery. He easily took possession of Olivença and Jurumenha. But the garrisons of Elvas and Campo-Mayor retired behind the walls and made a show of defence. The Prince of Peace ordered a blockade of these places, and during that time, marched to meet the Portuguese army, commanded by the Duke d'Alafoens. The Portuguese made no stand anywhere, and fled toward the Tagus. The blockaded places, likewise opened their gates, Campo-Mayor surrendered, and the siege of Elvas was regularly undertaken, with a park of artillery from Seville. The Prince of Peace pursued the enemy in triumph, and passed rapidly Azumar, Alegrete, Portalegre, Castello-de-Vide, Flor-de-Rosa, and at last arrived at the Tagus, behind which the Portuguese were endeavouring to find an asylum. He had subdued nearly the whole province of the Alentejo. The French had not yet crossed the frontier of Portugal, and it was evident, that if the Spaniards alone had been thus successful, that the Spaniards and French united would in a few days be masters of Lisbon and Oporto. The court of Portugal, which had always refused to believe that the attack against it was serious, seeing what had occurred, immediately submitted, and sent M. Pinto de Souza to the Spanish head-quarters, with orders to accept such conditions as the combined armies might impose. The Prince of Peace, desiring to render his masters partakers of his glory, sent for the king and queen of Spain, to distribute the rewards to the army, and to hold a sort of Congress. Thus, this court, formerly so great, now so dishonoured by a dissolute queen, by an incapable and omnipotent favourite, endeavoured to delude itself with the belief of having achieved great deeds. Lucien Bonaparte had followed the king and queen to Badajos. Such was the posture of affairs at the end of June and the beginning of July.

The combats of Algesiras and Cadiz, calculated to restore confidence to our navy; the short campaign of Portugal, which proved the decided influence of the First Consul over the Peninsula, and the power he possessed to treat Portugal, like Naples, Tuscany, or Holland, compensated, to a certain degree, the occurrences in Egypt. Moreover, they were ignorant of the battle of Canopus, the capitulation already signed at Cairo, and that of Alexandria inevitable. News did not then travel so rapidly by sea as now, and a month at least, sometimes more, was required for information of an event occurring on the Nile to reach Marseilles. Nothing was known of the affairs of Egypt, but the landing of the English, their first combats on the shore of Alexandria; no idea was formed of the subsequent operations, and the greatest anxiety existed as to the ultimate result of the contest. France, therefore, had lost none of her weight in the negotiation, which, on the contrary, was increasing in proportion to the influence she was daily acquiring on the continent of Europe.

The treaty of Lunéville was, in fact, followed by its inevitable consequences. Austria, disarmed, and for the future impotent in the eyes of every one, left a free course to our projects. Russia, since the death of Paul and the accession of Alexander, was not, it is true, disposed to act very energetically against England, nor to resist the intentions of France in the west. Therefore the First Consul took no pains to conceal his views. He had just erected, by a simple decree, Piedmont into French departments, without appearing to listen to the protest of the Russian envoy. He had declared, that, as regarded Naples, the treaty of Florence should be her law. Genoa had just submitted her constitution to him, that he should make certain changes, destined to increase the authority of the executive power. The Cisalpine Republic, composed of Lombardy, the duchy of Modena, and the Legations, established the first time by the treaty of Campo-Formio, the second by the treaty of Lunéville, was again erected into an allied state, dependent on France. Holland, following the example of Liguria, submitted her constitution to the First Consul, in order to give more strength to the government; a species of reform taking place, at that moment, in all the republics which had sprung from the French Republic. Lastly, the unimportant negotiators, who formerly sought support from M. de Kalitscheff, the haughty minister of Paul I. now regretted their folly, and asked for an improvement in their condition, alone from the graciousness of the First Consul. The representatives of the German princes, especially, showed, in this respect, the greatest anxiety. The treaty of Lunéville had laid down the principle of the secularization of the ecclesiastical states, and their division among the hereditary princes. The ambition of all was awakened by this last clause. The great as well as the little powers hoped to obtain the best share. Austria and Prussia, though they had lost but little on the left of the Rhine, wanted to share in the promised indemnities. Bavaria, Wurtemberg, Baden, and the house of Orange, beset with their entreaties the new ruler of France because, as he was one of the principal framers of the treaty of Lunéville, he necessarily must possess great influence over the execution of this treaty. Prussia herself, represented at Paris by M. de Luchesini, did not disdain playing the part of a solicitor, and increasing, by her solicitation, the power of the First Consul. Thus, the six months elapsed since the signatures made at Lunéville, though marked by reverses in Egypt, reverses which, it is true, were but imperfectly known in Europe, had seen the increase of the ascendancy of the French government; for time showed its power to be only more effective and evident. These circumstances ought to influence the negotiation at London, which had been momentarily interrupted, but which, by common consent, was about to be renewed, with increased activity, in accordance with a singular conformity of ideas in the two governments. The First Consul, seeing the first acts of Menou, deemed the campaign lost, and wanted the treaty signed at London, before the catastrophe which he foresaw. The English ministers, unable to see, like him, the result of events, were afraid of some bold stroke by that army of Egypt, so renowned for its courage, and wanted to take advantage of the first appearance of success to negotiate; so that, after having been agreed to temporize, they were now agreed to conclude.

But, before entering anew into the labyrinth of the vast negotiation, where the greatest interests of the universe were to be agitated, we must sketch an event, which at that time occupied the curiosity of Paris, and which finishes the singular picture then presented by consular France.

The Infantas of Parma, destined to reign over Tuscany, had left Madrid, when the royal family left for Badajos, and had just arrived at the frontier of the Pyrenees. The First Consul was intent upon showing them Paris, before sending them to Florence to take possession of the new throne of Etruria. All these contrasts gratified the lively and grand imagination of General Bonaparte. He loved that scene, truly Roman, of a king made by him, by his republican hands: he loved, also, to show that he was not afraid of the presence of a Bourbon, and that his glory elevated him far above all comparison with the ancient dynasty whose place he filled. He loved, also, to display to the eyes of the world, in that Paris, so recently the theatre of a bloody revolution, a pomp and splendour worthy of kings. All this only marked still more what a sudden change had been effected in France, under his government.

This attentive and minute foresight, which he knew how to apply to a great military operation, he did not disdain to use in those scenes of pomp and parade, in which he and his glory were to play a conspicuous part. He regulated the smallest details, provided for all contingencies, and assigned to every thing its place. This was necessary in an entirely new social order, founded on the ruins of a world which had been destroyed. Every thing was to be created anew, even etiquette, which is necessary in a republic as elsewhere.

The three Consuls deliberated for a long time upon the manner of the reception of the King and Queen of Etruria in France, and the honours to be paid to them. To avoid many difficulties, it was agreed that they should be received under the assumed names of Count and Countess of Leghorn; that they should be treated as illustrious guests, as had been done in the last century, with regard to the young czar, afterward Paul I. and the Emperor of Austria, Joseph II.¹ By means of the incognito they could avoid the embarrassment occasioned by the official rank of king and queen. Proper orders were consequently given along the route to the civil and military authorities of the departments.

Novelty is always charming to all nations. This was one of a most surprising character, that of a king and a queen, after twelve years of revolutions, which had overturned or shaken so many thrones, and one peculiarly flattering to the French people, for this king and queen were the fruits of their victories. The Infantas were received with infinite regard and respect. No unpleasant occurrence made them feel that they were travelling through a country so recently a prey to intestinal convulsions. The royalists, by no means flattered by this monarchical work of the French revolution, were the only ones who availed themselves of the opportunity of showing some ill-will. At the theatre at Bordeaux, to the enthusiastic cries of "Long live the King," they answered by "Down with Kings."

The First Consul repressed himself, by letters sent from his cabinet, the rather excessive zeal of the prefects, and did not wish this royal progress to be magnified into too great an event. The young princes arrived at Paris in June, and were to spend a whole month there. They were to reside with the Spanish ambassador. The First Consul, though only the simple temporary magistrate of a republic, represented France: before this prerogative all privileges of royal blood grew pale. It was concluded that their youthful majesties, advising the First Consul of it, should pay the first visit, and that he should return it the next day. The second and third Consuls, who could not be said, in the same degree, to represent France, were to pay the first visit to the Infantas. Thus, as regards them, was established the distance of birth and rank. On the next day after their arrival the Count and Countess of Leghorn were conducted to Malmaison by the Spanish ambassador, the Count d'Azara. The First Consul received them at the head of that military establishment which he had collected around him. The Count of Leghorn, somewhat embarrassed by his appearance, threw himself ingenuously into the arms of the First Consul, who clasped him to his breast. He treated this young couple with a parental kindness, and the most delicate attentions, but through which, nevertheless, were perceived all the superiorities of glory, power, and age. On the next day the First Consul returned their visit, at the hotel of the ambassador. The Consuls Cambacérés and Lebrun fulfilled the duty prescribed to them, and received from the young princes the courtesies due to them.

The First Consul was to present the Count and Countess of Leghorn to the Parisian public, at the opera. On the day selected for the presentation, he was sick. Cambacérés supplied his place, and escorted the Infantas to the opera. Having entered the consular-box, they took the Count of Leghorn by the hand, and presented him to the public, who answered by unanimous applause, and without any malicious or offensive expressions. Nevertheless, the idle, accustomed to worry themselves with subtle interpretations of the most ordinary events, gave a thousand aspects to the voyage of the princes to Paris. These who were satisfied with a bon mot, said that the Consul Cambacérés had just presented the Bourbons to France. The royalists, who persisted in hoping from General Bonaparte what he neither would nor could do, pretended that it was, on his part, a sort of preparation for the return of the old dynasty. The republicans, on the contrary, asserted that he desired, by this regal pomp, to accustom France to a re-establishment of monarchy, in his own person.

The ministers were ordered to entertain the travelling princes. To M. de Talleyrand this order was unnecessary. A model of taste and elegance under the ancient regime, he was deservedly much more so under the new, and he gave, at the chateau of Neuilly, a magnificent festival, adorned by the best society of France, and names long since strangers to the circles of the capital. At night, in the midst of a brilliant illumination, the city of Florence suddenly appeared, represented with surprising accuracy. The Tuscans, dancing and singing on the celebrated square of the Palazzo Vecchio, presented flowers to the young sovereigns, and triumphal crowns to the First Consul. This magnificence cost an enormous sum. It was the profusion of the Directory, with the elegance of another age, and that quite new propriety, which a severe master was endeavouring to impress on the manners of revolutionary France. The minister of war, in conjunction with the minister of foreign affairs, gave a military entertainment, intended to celebrate the anniversary of the battle of Marengo. The minister of the Interior, the

¹ JOSEPH II., Emperor of Germany, son of Francis I. and Maria Theresa, born March 13, 1741, at a time when Frederic the Great had already conquered half Silesia. In 1765 he became German emperor, on the death of his father. He was a moderate, tolerant, and liberal prince, and in the early part of his reign distinguished by his concessions to popular reform. Toward his latter days his country was disturbed, and, in 1790, he died, as much perhaps of mortification as of pulmonary disease.—Encyclopædia Americana.

second and third Consuls, likewise entertained the princes magnificently, and for a whole month the capital was a scene of continual rejoicing. The First Consul, however, did not wish the princes to be present at the republican solemnities of July, and he made the necessary arrangements for them to leave Paris before the anniversary of the 14th of July.

In the midst of these brilliant festivals, he endeavoured to give some advice to the royal couple, about to reign over Tuscany. But he was struck with the weakness of the young prince, who, when at Malmaison, amused himself in the hall of the aides-de-camp, with games worthy at most of a youth. The princess alone appeared intelligent, and attentive to the advice of the First Consul. The latter augured badly of these new sovereigns given to a part of Italy, and understood clearly that it would be frequently necessary for him to assist in the direction of the affairs of their kingdom. "You see," said he, openly to some members of the government, "you see that they are princes, descended from an ancient line, and especially one brought up in the courts of the south. How can the reins of government be intrusted to them! On the other hand, it was well to show to France this specimen of the Bourbons. She can judge if these ancient dynasties are equal to the difficulties of an age like ours.—In fact, all who had seen the young prince had made the same remark as the First Consul. General Clarke was sent as a Mentor to these young sovereigns, under the title of Minister of France near the King of Etruria.

Amid this vast movement of affairs, amid these festivals, which, in themselves, almost assumed a serious character, the great work of the maritime peace had not been neglected. The negotiations, commenced at London between Lord Hawkesbury¹ and Mr. Otto, had become public. They were kept less secret, as soon as they were in haste to bring them to a close. As we have elsewhere said, the wish to temporize was succeeded by the wish to terminate, for the First Consul augured badly of the events occurring on the shores of the Nile, and the British government was continually fearing some unexpected exploit on the part of the army of Egypt. The new English ministers were anxious for peace, for on it depended their existence. In fact, if the war was to be continued, it was much more important to have Mr. Pitt than Mr. Addington² at the head of affairs. All the events which had transpired either in the North, or in the East, although they might have bettered the relative condition of England, appeared to them the means of making a more advantageous peace, and one more easily defended in Parliament, but not motives for desiring it less. They considered the opportunity as good, and were desirous of avoiding the fault, for which Mr. Pitt had been so much blamed, of not having made a treaty previous to Marengo and Hohenlinden. The King of England, as has been seen, had returned to pacific views, from regard for the First Consul, as well as from some displeasure against Mr. Pitt. The people, suffering from scarcity, and fond of change, were expecting from the termination of the war an improvement in their condition. Reasonable persons, without exception, thought that ten years of bloody war were enough, and that it was unwise, by continuing any longer, to give France a chance of still further aggrandizement. In addition to all this, some uneasiness was felt at London, at the preparations for a descent on England, seen along the coast of the British channel. One class of men alone, those embarked in great maritime speculations, and who had subscribed to the enormous loans of Mr. Pitt, seeing that peace, by opening seas to the flags of all nations, and to that of France in particular, would deprive them of the monopoly of commerce, and put an end to great financial operations, were opposed to the system of Mr. Addington. They were devoted to Mr. Pitt and his policy; they were even inclined for war, when Mr. Pitt himself began to consider peace as necessary. But the rich city speculators were silenced by the cries of the people and the agriculturists, and above all by the unanimous voice of the reasonable part of the nation.

The English minister was therefore determined not only to negotiate, but to negotiate promptly in order to present the result of their negotiations, to the next meeting of Parliament that is, in the autumn. An advantageous treaty had just been concluded with Russia, England had to settle with this court merely a question of maritime right. She had made some concessions to the new emperor, and had also required some, which the prince, young and unexperienced, anxious to please the party which had placed him on the throne, still more anxious to indulge tranquilly in his ideas of internal reform, had had the weakness to grant, of the four fundamental principles of maritime law, maintained by the league of the North and France, Russia had abandoned two, and retained two. In a convention signed on the 17th of June, between Vice-Chancellor Panin³ and Lord St. Helens, the following stipulations were agreed upon.

I. Neutrals might freely trade between all the parts of the globe, even those of nations engaged in war. They might carry every thing, according to custom, except such as were comprehended in the war contraband. This clause was inserted to protect the interests of Russia. Thus bread-stuffs, and nava-

¹ LORD HAWKESBURY, an English diplomatist of some repute.

² MR. ADDINGTON. HENRY, LORD SIDMOUTH, the son of a physician. He was born in 1756, and educated with William Pitt, the son of Lord Chatham, of whom he was constantly a personal friend as well as a political supporter. In 1789 he was Speaker in the House of Commons. In 1792 he voted, for the first and last time, against his friend, on the motion of Mr. Wilberforce. In 1801 he succeeded Mr. Pitt as Chancellor of the Exchequer. He was an advocate of peace after the peace of Amiens, until its violation by the French, after which he became one of the strongest war councillors of the king. In 1804 he was succeeded by Pitt and created viscount Sidmouth. In 1806 he was again for a short time in office. In 1812 he was Secretary of State under Lord Liverpool's administration, until 1822, when he retired, and was succeeded by Mr., now Sir Robert, Peel.

—Encyclopedia Americana.

³ PANIN. A Russian minister of some distinction, but in no respect equal to his father, Nikita Ivanovitch, Count Panin, the Minister of State to Catharine II., who was a man of great parts and extraordinary firmness. —Encyclopedia Americana.

stores, were no longer comprised in the war contraband, an important thing for Russia, which produced hemp, pitch and tar, iron, masts and spars, and grain. On this point, one of the most important of maritime law, Russia had defended the liberties of general commerce, by defending her own private interests.

II. The flag did not cover the merchandise, unless this merchandise were owned by the neutral trader. Thus coffee, coming from the French colonies; bullion exported from the Spanish colonies, could not be seized if they were the property of a Dane, or a Russian. It is true that this reservation saved, practically, a portion of the neutral commerce: but Russia sacrificed the first principle of maritime law, that the flag makes the nation, and did not support the noble part she had undertaken to play, under Paul and under Catherine. This protection of the weak she so earnestly wished to exert on the continent she sullenly abandoned on the ocean.

III. Neutrals, though allowed to trade without hindrance, were to stop, according to custom, at the entrance of a port blockaded, but which was actually blockaded, with imminent danger of forcing the blockade. In this respect the great principle of actual blockade was strictly maintained.

IV. Lastly, the right of search, the subject of so much dispute, and the proximate cause of the last league of the North, was settled in a manner not very honourable for the neutral flag. Therefore, it was never admitted, that merchants ships, conveyed by a vessel of war, guaranteeing her nationality by her presence, and above all, the absence of all contraband goods on board, could be searched. The dignity of the naval flag, in fact, did not permit a captain of a ship, perhaps an admiral, to be stopped by a privateer, furnished with merely a letter of marque. The Russian cabinet endeavoured to save the dignity of the flag by a nice distinction. It was decided that the right of search, as regarded merchant vessels conveyed by ships of war, should not be put in force by all vessels indiscriminately, but by ships of war alone. A privateer furnished merely with a letter of marque had no right to stop and challenge a convoy, protected by a ship of war. The right of search, therefore, could only be exerted by equals upon equals. By this means, undoubtedly, a portion of the objections was removed, but the fundamental principle was sacrificed, and the transaction was the less honourable to the court of St. Petersburg, as it had been one of the four contested principles for which Copenhagen had been bombarded only three months previously, and for which Paul I. had endeavoured to rouse all Europe against England.

Thus Russia had maintained two of the great principles of maritime law, and sacrificed two. England, it must be observed, had made concessions, and, in the hope of obtaining peace, had abandoned some of the haughty claims of Mr. Pitt. The Danes, Swedes, and Prussians were invited to unite in this convention.

Freed from Russia, having obtained some success in Egypt, the only advantage England wished to take of this improvement in her situation, was a speedier reconciliation with France. Lord Hawkesbury sent for M. Otto to the foreign office and desired him to present the following proposition to the First Consul. "Egypt is at this moment occupied by our troops," said he; "heavy reinforcements will be sent to them—their success is probable. The struggle, it must be confessed, however, is not over. Let us stop the effusion of blood: let us both agree to evacuate Egypt, and restore it to the Sublime Porte."

To this proposition, Lord Hawkesbury added the intention of retaining Malta: "for," said he, "Malta was to be evacuated by England, only in return for the voluntary abandonment of Egypt by France. This was, no longer, on the part of France, a voluntary concession, but an inevitable consequence of the war, and there was no reason for compensating it by the restoration of Malta."

In the East Indies the English minister was satisfied with Ceylon. He offered to restore to Holland the Cape of Good Hope, and her possessions in South America, such as Surinam, Demerara, Berbice, and Essequibo. But he required one of the Great Antilles, either Martinico or Trinity, at the choice of France.

Thus England would have obtained by this ten years' war, independently of Hindoostan, the island of Ceylon in the Indian Ocean, the island of Trinity or Martinico in the Caribbean Sea, and the island of Malta in the Mediterranean. The cabinet would have a splendid gift to offer at the shrine of British pride, in each of the three principal seas.

The First Consul sent an immediate answer to the claims of the English. They laid great stress on the events in Egypt, and he, to rebut their pretensions, laid equal stress on the events in Portugal. "Lisbon and Oporto," he answered Lord Hawkesbury, through M. Otto, "will belong to us, if we desire it. A treaty is at this moment being negotiated at Badajoz, to save the provinces of England's most faithful ally. Portugal proposes, in order to redeem her territory, to exclude the English from all her ports, and to pay, in addition, a heavy war contribution; and Spain appears inclined to accept the offer. All depends, however, on the First Consul. He can accept or reject the treaty; and he will reject it, and occupy the principal provinces of Portugal, if England does not consent to peace, on moderate and reasonable terms. They demand," added he, "that France shall evacuate Egypt; granted, provided England will abandon Malta, and not demand Martinico nor Trinity, and be satisfied with the island of Ceylon, a splendid possession, completing perfectly the superb empire of the Indies."

The English ambassador, in reply to these propositions, explained himself in a manner rather unsatisfactory, as regarded Portugal, proving, what was already known, that England cared but little for the allies whom she had compromised. "If the First Consul invades the states of Portugal in Europe," answered Lord Hawkesbury, "England will invade the states of Portugal beyond the seas. She will take the Azores and Brazil, and obtain a ledge which, in her hands, will be worth much more than the Portuguese continent in the hands of the French." The meaning of this was, that England, instead of defending an ally, would revenge herself, even on that ally, for the new possessions acquired by her rival.

The First Consul saw that it was necessary to assume an energetic tone, and openly announced the resolution he had already formed in his own bosom, which was to struggle hand to hand with England, until he had brought her to moderate claims. He declared that he would never, on any conditions, surrender Malta: that Trinity belonged to an ally, whose interests he would defend as though they were his own: that he would not leave this colony in possession of the English: that they ought to be satisfied with Ceylon, and that, of all the disputed points, with the exception of Malta, not one was worth the misery about to be inflicted on the world, nor a single drop of the blood about to be shed.

To these diplomatic explanations, he added public statements in the Moniteur, and the detailed account of the armament preparing on the coast of Boulogne.

Divisions of gun-boats sailed, in fact, from the ports of Calvados, Seine-Inférieure, from the Somme and Scheldt, for Boulogne, and had already succeeded several times in escaping the English cruisers by keeping close to the coast. The First Consul had not determined then, as he had at a subsequent period,¹ on the plan of a descent upon England; he wanted to intimidate this power by the splendour of his preparations, and he had at last resolved on completing his arrangements, and passing from threats to action, if the rupture became irreparable. He explained himself to this effect fully, in a meeting of the Council, at which the consuls alone were present. Full of confidence in his colleagues, Cambacérès and Lebrun, he unbosomed himself to them. He declared to them, that with the armament then at Boulogne, he had not the means of attempting a descent, one of the most difficult operations of war; that by this preparation he merely wished to prove to England his intentions, which were, a direct attack; for the success of which, he, General Bonaparte, would not hesitate to risk his life, his glory, and his fortune; that should he not succeed in obtaining from the British cabinet reasonable sacrifices, he would take his own part, complete the flotilla of Boulogne, so that it should be enabled to carry 100,000 men, in order to try the chances of a terrible but decisive operation.

Wishing to call to his aid the opinion of England and of Europe herself, he added to the notes of his negotiator, which were addressed only to the English ministers, articles in the Moniteur appealing to the whole European public. In these articles, very models of terse and pressing polemics, which were written by himself and eagerly devoured by the readers of all nations, attentive to the singular scenes which were in progress, he caressed the actual English ministers, representing them as wise, reasonable, well-intentioned men, intimidated by the violence of the ex-ministers Mr. Pitt and Mr. Windham.² It was on the latter of these especially, that he poured out his sarcasms with an unsparing hand, because he held him to be the leader of the war party. In these articles he strove to reassure Europe with regard to the ambition of France. He laboured to show that his conquests were but an equivalent to the acquisitions which Prussia, Austria, and Russia had made in the partition of Poland; that nevertheless she had restored three or four times that she had retained; that England was therefore bound, in her turn, to restore a large part of her conquests; that retaining the continent of India, she remained in possession of a superb empire, in comparison with which the contested islands were worth nothing; that the value of those isles was not of consequence such as to justify the continued effusion of blood; that if France, in truth, seemed to cling vigorously to that point, it was from a sentiment of honour, from a desire to defend her allies, and to retain at the utmost some few roadsteads in distant seas; to conclude, that, should they choose to maintain the war, England might doubtless conquer more colonies, but that she had more already than her commerce could require; that France had on the contrary acquisitions to make all around her frontiers of widely different value, known so well to the whole world as to render it needless to designate them; since her troops occupied Holland, Switzerland, Piedmont, Naples, Portugal; and, last of all, that the struggle might still be simplified, and rendered less onerous to the nations, by reducing it to a strife, body to body, between France and England. The author-general took heed not to offend the pride of Britain; but he gave them to understand that a descent would be his last resource, and that if the English ministers desired that the war should be concluded only by the destruction of one of the two nations, there was not a Frenchman who was not disposed to make a last and most vigorous effort to terminate this long and cruel quarrel to the eternal glory and the eternal advantage of France. "But wherefore," said he, "place the question on this last resort! wherefore not put an end to the sufferings of humanity! wherefore risk in this manner the lot of two great nations!" The First Consul terminated one of those addresses in these singular and beautiful words, which one day were to have so melancholy an application to himself. "Happy," he cried, "happy are nations

¹ This first attempt, which was in 1801, must be carefully distinguished from the great naval and military organization, known under the name of Camp of Boulogne, and executed in the year 1804.

² Mr. WILLIAM WINDHAM, a statesman and orator of great weight, eloquence, and ability. He was born in London in 1750, educated at Eton and Oxford. In 1782 he entered parliament, as member for Norwich. He sided with the opposition until the celebrated secession from the Whig party in 1793, when he adhered to Burke, and was appointed secretary of war with a seat in the cabinet, which he retained until Pitt's resignation in 1801. He was distinguished for his opposition to the ephemeral treaty of Amiens. In 1806 he came in with Lord Grenville as secretary of war and the colonies, in the short administration called that of All the Talents. He died in 1810. He was a sound scholar and highly esteemed in private life. [Encyclopædia Americana. 2 when, having arrived at high prosperity, they have wise governments which care not to expose advantages so vast to the caprices and vicissitudes of a single stroke of fortune!"

These articles, remarkable for their vigorous logic, and their impassioned style, attracted general attention, and produced a deep effect on all minds. Never had any government held a language so open and so comprehensive.

The language of the First Consul, accompanied by very serious demonstrations on the shores of France, naturally produced a great effect on the other side of the channel. The formal declaration that France would never concede Malta, had made a great impression, and the British government replied that it was willing to yield this point, provided that island should be restored to the order of St. John of Jerusalem, but that in that case it should require the Cape of Good Hope. It yielded Trinity, moreover, and even Martinique, on condition of receiving a portion of the Dutch American continent, that is to say, Demerara, Berbice, or Essequibo.

The concession of Malta was one step gained in the negotiation. The First Consul held out for not yielding Malta, nor yet the Cape, nor even the Dutch continental possessions in America. In his eyes, Malta should have been the compensation for Egypt yielded to the French. There could, therefore, be no longer any question concerning Malta with the English, nor of any equivalents for it.

The English cabinet ceased to insist on Malta, or on the Cape as a compensation for Malta. But it returned to its demand for one of the Great Antilles, and, as it could no longer claim the French island of Martinique, it demanded the Spanish isle of Trinity.

The First Consul would no more consent to yield Trinity than Martinique. It was a Spanish colony, which would give the English a dangerous foothold on the vast continent of South America. He carried his loyalty toward the ally of France, so far as to offer Tobago, a small French island, in lieu of Trinity. It was not very important, but it was valuable to England, because all the planters were English. With a noble pride, which is permissible only to one who has loaded his country with glory, he added, it is a French colony, the acquisition ought to touch the pride of Britain, which will be flattered at obtaining a colonial trophy from us. And the conclusion of the peace will doubtless be rendered easier thereby.¹

Such was the position of affairs, about the end of July, and beginning of August, 1801. (Great warmth was exhibited on both sides. The preparations on the coast of France were imitated on the coast of England. The militia was disciplined; wagons were constructed for the rapid transportation of troops to any threatened point. The English war-party journals held the most violent language; some of them, under the direction, it is said, of Mr. Windham, endeavoured to excite the people against M. Otto and the French prisoners. M. Otto immediately demanded his passports, and the First Consul caused to be published in the Moniteur the most threatening observations.

Lord Hawkesbury hastened to M. Otto, insisted on his remaining, and succeeded, although with difficulty, by giving him hopes of a speedy adjustment. National animosity, however, seemed awakened, and a rupture was dreaded. All the reasonable men in England feared, and endeavoured to prevent it. They despaired, however, of success, for the First Consul would yield at no price the possessions of his allies, upon which the English insisted.

But whilst he was so loyally defending the Spanish colonies, the Prince of Peace, with the thoughtlessness of a vain and frivolous favourite, led his master into the most unfortunate position, and absolved the First Consul from all friendly relations with Spain.

It has not been forgotten that M. de Pinto, the Portuguese envoy, had arrived at the Spanish head-quarters, to submit to the will of France and Spain. The Prince of Peace was anxious to terminate a campaign, the commencement of which had been so brilliant and easy, but which would have been difficult to continue without the aid of France. The assistance of our soldiers would have been, for instance, necessary for the occupation of Lisbon or Oporto. The enterprise, from being a mere matter of ostentation, might become a serious affair, and require fresh French troops. Foreseeing this necessity, the First Consul had ordered the advance of 10,000 additional men, making the total number of French in Spain about 25,000. Now the Prince of Peace, who had, without reason, sent for our troops, was frightened, with reason, at their arrival. Their discipline, however, had been most severe, and they had testified for the clergy, the churches, and the ceremonies of religion, a respect to which they were unaccustomed, and that would have been elicited by no one but General Bonaparte. But now that they were near at hand, the Spaniards were terribly alarmed by their presence. They should either not have been sent for, or, being summoned, should have been used to attain the end proposed. This end was not to consist only in dispersing a few Portuguese troops, in obtaining some millions of

¹ The minister of foreign relations to M. Otto, commissioner of the French republic in London:

20 Thermidor, year IX.—8th August.

As to America. I add to these peremptory observations the following, with this note.

The British government demands the reservation in the Antilles, of one of the islands which she has recently conquered, and that on the pretext that it will be necessary to the preservation of her ancient possessions. Now, on no consideration can this argument apply to the isle of Trinity. Put an end, therefore, to all discussion on that head. Trinity will be, by its position, no means of defence to the English colonies, but a means of attack against the Spanish continent. Its acquisition would, moreover, be an acquisition to the British government of a value beyond all justice or reason. The discussion can only bear on Curaçoa, Tobago, St. Lucia, or some other isle of similar importance. Although the last two are French, the government might be induced to abandon one, and perhaps the pride of England would be flattered by thus receiving one of our colonial possessions as a trophy. You will not fail, citizen, to attribute an increased value to those isles, the concession of which might be made on our part, and especially of Tobago. That isle, which was formerly English, is still inhabited by English planters, and all its relations are English; its soil is new, and its commerce susceptible of vast improvement.

tribute, or even in closing the ports of Portugal to English vessels, but evidently, in seizing some valuable pledge, to be used in wresting from the English the concessions they were unwilling to grant. To effect this, it was necessary to occupy certain Portuguese provinces, especially that of which Oporto was the capital. This was the surest way of influencing the British cabinet, by acting on the large merchants of the city, deeply interested in the commerce of Oporto. This had been agreed upon, by the government of Paris and Madrid. Despite, however, all that had been agreed upon, the Prince of Peace thought of accepting the conditions of Portugal, and being satisfied with the fortified place of Olivença for Spain, and fifteen or twenty millions for France, and for the two powers combined, the closure of the Portuguese ports to all British vessels, either of the naval or merchant service. Under these conditions, the campaign just achieved was puerile. It was nothing but a pastime, invented to amuse a favourite satiated with royal favours, and seeking military glory by ridiculous means, such as were suitable to his guilty and silly frivolity.

The Prince of Peace took advantage of the paternal feelings so easily excited in his masters, but excited, it must be said, either too soon or too late. He made them fear the presence of the French; a fear, it must be repeated, very unseasonable and chimerical, for it could scarcely enter the mind of any one, that 18,000 Frenchmen wanted to conquer Spain, or even extend their stay beyond a proper time. All this supposed projects which were not even dreamed of by the First Consul, and which he only conceived subsequently, after astounding events, which neither he nor any one else then foresaw. At that time, he had but one wish, to wrest from England one island more, and that island was Spanish.

Whilst accepting the conditions proposed by the court of Lisbon, which consisted merely in ceding Olivença to the Spaniards, twenty millions to the French, and the exclusion of the English flag from the ports of Portugal, care had been taken to prepare two copies of the treaty, one of which was to be signed by Spain, and the other by France. The Prince of Peace affixed his signature to the one intended for his court, and dated from Badajos, because it was transacted in that city. He then caused the king, who was present at that place, to ratify it. Lucien signed the copy intended for France, and despatched it to his brother for his ratification.

The First Consul received these communications at the very moment of the greatest excitement in the negotiation at London. His anger may well be supposed. Although he was fond of his family, sometimes even to weakness, he repressed his irritability less with his relations than with others, and, certainly on this occasion, he may be pardoned having given vent to it. This he did without reserve, and expressed the most violent indignation against his brother Lucien.

He hoped, however, that the treaty was not yet ratified. Couriers extraordinary were sent to Badajos, to announce that France refused her assent, and to prevent that of Spain. But these couriers found the treaty ratified by Charles IV.¹ and the compact irrevocable. Lucien was overwhelmed with the embarrassing and even humiliating part reserved for him in Spain, instead of the brilliant part he had there expected to play. He answered his brother's anger by a fit of ill humour, common enough to him, and sent his resignation to the Minister of Foreign Affairs. The Prince of Peace, on his part, became arrogant. He used ridiculous and silly language toward the man who then governed France. He announced, in the first place, the cessation of all hostility towards Portugal, then demanded the retreat of the French, and even added this very imprudent declaration, that if fresh troops passed the frontiers of the Pyrenees, their passage would be considered as a violation of territory. He claimed, moreover, the restoration of the fleet at Brest, and a prompt conclusion of the general peace, in order to break off as soon as possible an alliance now become burdensome to the court of Madrid.² This conduct was as improper as it was contrary to the true interests of Spain. It must be said, however, that the terrible misfortune which had just happened to two Spanish vessels had thrown a gloom over the nation, and contributed to that ill humour, which manifested itself so unseasonably and injuriously for the policy of the two cabinets.

The irritation of the First Consul having reached its maximum, he answered immediately, that the French would remain in the Peninsula, until the declaration of peace between France and Portugal: that if the army of the Prince of Peace took one single step toward the 15,000 Frenchmen then at Salamanca, he would consider it as a declaration of war, and that if, to impertinent language, one single hostile act was added, the downfall of the Spanish monarchy was at hand.³

¹ CHARLES IV., KING OF SPAIN. Born at Naples in 1740, came to Madrid in 1759, on the succession of his father, Charles III., to the Spanish throne, to which he in his turn succeeded in 1788. He was married to the Princess of Parma, Louisa Maria. Too imbecile to govern himself, he yielded his power wholly to his queen and ministers, especially to the infamous Prince of Peace, Godoy. Hunting was his only business, gluttony his only pleasure. He was deposed and abdicated in 1808, and died of the gout at Naples in 1818.—Encyclopædia Americana.

² Despatch of 26th of July.

³ The First Consul wrote short notes, intended as a basis for the instructions which his ministers were to transmit to the ambassadors. The following is the note sent to the cabinet of foreign affairs, to serve in the compilation of the despatch to be sent to Madrid. M. de Talley-rand, having left for some watering place, had been replaced by M. Caillard.

To the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

21st Messidor, year IX.—10th July, 1801.

Inform citizen minister, the ambassador of the republic at Madrid, that he must repair to court, and display the energy necessary in this posture of affairs. He will state:

That I have read the letter of General, the Prince of Peace: that it is too ridiculous to deserve a serious answer; but that if this prince, bought by England, persuades the king and queen into measures contrary to the honour and interests of the Republic, the last hour of the Spanish monarchy is at hand.

That I intend the French troops to remain in Spain until the Republic shall have made peace with Portugal. That the slightest movement of the Spanish troops

He ordered Lucien to return to Madrid, there assume his character of ambassador, and await his further orders. This was enough to intimidate and awe the contemptible courtier, who compromised too lightly the greatest interests of the universe. In fact, he soon wrote the most submissive letters, in order to recover the good graces of the man whose influence and personal authority over the Court of Spain he so greatly feared.

It was, however, necessary to come to some conclusion concerning this strange and unaccountable conduct of the court of Madrid. M. de Talleyrand was on a visit to a watering-place to recruit his health. The First Consul communicated to him all the steps of the business, and received in answer a very sensible letter, containing his advice in this important affair.

A war of correspondence, according to M. de Talleyrand, could lead to nothing, whatever success, relying on engagements made, might reasonably be expected from the promises made by both parties. The war against Spain, besides leading us from the object, which was the general pacification of Europe, besides being contrary to the true policy of France, became ridiculous in the pitiable condition of the Spanish monarchy, with our troops in the heart of her provinces, with her squadrons at to approach the French troops, will be considered as a declaration of war;

That, however, I am anxious to do all that is possible to reconcile the interests of the Republic with the conduct and inclinations of his Catholic Majesty;

That whatever may happen, I will never consent to articles three and six;

That I am not opposed to the renewal of negotiation between the ambassador of the Republic and M. de Pinto, and that a protocol of the negotiation be kept every day.

That the ambassador should endeavour to make the Prince of Peace, and even the king and queen, understand, that improper words and letters, among friends like ourselves, may be considered as family quarrels, but that the slightest action or outbreak would be irre-medi-able;

That as to the King of Etruria, a minister was offered him because he has no one near him, and that to govern men some knowledge is necessary; that, however, as he hoped to find at Parma men capable of aiding him, I insisted no longer;

That as to the French troops in Tuscany, they must remain two or three months, until the King of Etruria has organized his army;

That affairs of state may be canvassed without passion, and that, moreover, my desire of being useful to the house of Spain would be ill repaid if the king permitted the corrupting influence of British gold to disunite two great nations, when on the eve of obtaining peace after so much anxiety and fatigue; that its consequences would be terrible and fatal;

That, at this moment, less haste in making peace with Portugal would have materially assisted in accelerating the conclusion of peace with England, etc.

You know this cabinet; you will therefore mention in your despatch every thing which can serve to gain time, prevent hasty measures, renew the negotiation, and, at the same time, have weight, by presenting to their views the grave aspect of affairs, and the consequences of too great rapidity.

Inform the ambassador of the republic, that if Portugal consents to leave to Spain the province of the Alentejo until the peace, that might be a sort of mezzo termine, since by that Spain would find herself obliged to execute to the letter the preliminary treaty.

I would as soon have nothing as fifteen millions in fifteen months.

Despatch the courier whom I send you directly to Madrid.

WE GIVE THIS CURIOUS LETTER OF M. DE TALLEYRAND.

20th of Messidor, year IX.—24th of July, 1801.

GENERAL.—I have just read, with all the attention I possess, the letters from Spain. If an answer for the sake of our, only is required, it is easy for us to be in Brest. There was a much more natural way of punishing her; which was to cede to the English the Spanish island of Trinity, the sole and last difficulty which retarded the peace of the world. Spain had in fact absolved us from all duty, all loyalty toward her. In this case, added M. de Talleyrand, time must be wasted at Madrid and gained at London, by hastening the negotiation with England, by the concession of Trinity.

This advice was founded on reason, and so appeared to the First Consul. However, making it a point of honour to defend even an unfaithful ally, he informed M. Otto of his new intentions in relation to Trinity, and evinced himself ready to sacrifice it, not immediately, but only at the last extremity, when nothing else could be done, without producing a rupture. He ordered him to insist on the acceptance of the French island of Tobago, in exchange for Trinity.

Unfortunately the strange conduct of the Prince of Peace had greatly weakened the influence of our envoy. It was still further affected, by the recent arrival of the news of the capitulation of General Belliard at Cairo. Nevertheless the continuance of General Menou in Alexandria kept up a lingering doubt favourable to our claims. To our flotilla of Boulogne the right, even by referring to the letter of the three or four treaties made this year with that power: but those would be mere pleas. We must consider if this is not the moment for adopting a decisive line of conduct with this unhappy ally.

I start from the following data: Spain has waged, to use one of her own expressions, a hypocritical, &c., war against Portugal; she wants now to make peace. The Prince of Peace is, as we are informed and as I easily believe, parleying with England. The Directory thought he was bought by that power. The king and queen depend on the prince; he was nothing but a favourite; he is now, in their opinion, a statesman and great warrior. Lucien is in an embarrassing position from which he must be extricated.—The prince uses with some skill in his letters these words: The king has decided upon making war on his own children. These words will have some weight upon public opinion. A rupture with Spain is a laughable threat when we have her ships at Brest, and our troops in the heart of her kingdom. Such, methinks, is our position in regard to Spain; now, what have we to do?

I now perceive, that for two years I have been no longer accustomed to think alone. Without you my imagination and understanding are without a pilot; hence I shall probably write some foolish things, but it is not my fault, I am not myself when far from you.

It seems to me that Spain, which, in the various treaties of peace, has embarrassed the Court of Versailles by her enormous pretensions, has completely absolved us from all contracts. She has even marked out to us a course to be pursued; we can do with England what she has done with Portugal: she sacrifices the interests of her allies, and this places at our disposal the island of Trinity in our negotiation with England. Should you be of this opinion, it would then be necessary to hurry somewhat the treaty at London, and be content with exercising diplomacy or rather cavilling at Madrid, confining yourself always to friendly discussions, gentle explanations, satisfying them as to the fate of the King of Tuscany, treating only of the interests of the alliance, etc. etc. In short, to lose time at Madrid, and hurry it at London.

It would be unadvisable, under these circumstances, to change the ambassador, and it should not be done, if, as I propose, you attempt temporizing. Why could you not permit Lucien to go to Cadiz to see the fleet, and travel to the different ports? During this time, the English affairs will be advanced; you would prevent England from stipulating with Portugal, and he could return to Madrid to treat finally of this peace.

I am much afraid, general, that you will find upon my opinion the impress of the shower baths, and baths which I take very punctually. In seventeen days I shall be better. I shall be very happy to renew to you the assurance of my devotion and respect.

CH.-MAUR. TALLEYRAND.

was to belong the honour of terminating all the difficulties of this tedious negotiation.

Great uneasiness was still felt in England at the preparations made on the coast of the British Channel. In order to quiet it, the English Admiralty had recalled Nelson from the Baltic, and given him the command of the naval force in that quarter. This force was composed of frigates, brigs, corvettes, and light vessels of all dimensions. The enterprising character of this celebrated English sailor, gave rise to the hope that he would soon destroy, by some bold stroke, the French flotilla. On the 4th of August—18th of Thermidor—he appeared, about the break of day, off Boulogne, with some thirty small vessels. His flag was hoisted on the frigate Medusa. He took up a position about 1900 fathoms from our lines, that is out of reach of our artillery, and only within range of our heavy mortars. His intention was to bombard our flotilla. This was commanded by Admiral Latouche-Tréville,¹ a brave sailor, full of natural genius and ardour for war, and destined, had he lived, to the highest honours. He exercised the gun-boats every day, accustomed the soldiers and sailors to climb rapidly on board the ships, and descend from them in the same manner, and to manœuvre together, with celerity and precision. On the 4th, our flotilla was formed in three divisions, anchored in a line parallel to, and five hundred fathoms distant from the shore, broadside to the enemy. It was composed of large gun-boats, supported at intervals by brigs. Three battalions of infantry were on board of these boats of all descriptions, to assist the scamen.

Nelson ranged a division of bomb-ketches in front of his squadron, and opened his fire at 5 o'clock in the morning. He hoped, by overwhelming our flotilla with bombs, to destroy it, or to force it to re-enter the port. He, therefore, threw an immense quantity of shells during the whole day. The majority of these projectiles, discharged from heavy mortars, passed over our line and fell on the strand. Our soldiers and sailors immovable under this incessant fire, more alarming indeed in appearance than fatal in reality, displayed wonderful coolness and gayety. Unfortunately they had not the means of returning it. Our bomb vessels, hastily constructed, could not resist the shock of the mortars, and threw only a few ill-directed shot. The powder, taken from the old stores in the arsenal, was good for nothing, and did not send the projectiles to the necessary distance. The French crews asked to advance, either to bring their guns within range, or to board the enemy. But our gun-boats, awkwardly constructed without the experience subsequently acquired in this kind of ship building, would not work well in the north-east wind then blowing. They would have been driven by the wind and current on the English line, and obliged, in order to return to the shore, to have exposed their broadside thus leaving them defenceless, as their guns were in the bow. They were, therefore, obliged to remain motionless under this shower of projectiles, which lasted sixteen hours. Our soldiers and sailors, supporting it bravely, laughed at the shells as they flew over their heads. Their brave commander Latouche-Tréville, was in their midst with Colonel Savary, aid-de-camp of the First Consul. An enormous quantity of bombs was thrown, but by a species of miracle, no one was seriously wounded. Two of our boats were sunk, but not a man was lost. A gun-boat, the Méchante, commanded by Captain Margoli, was pierced through the middle. This brave officer threw his crew into the other boats, then keeping two sailors with him, brought back his boat, making water in every direction, and grounded her on the sand before she had time to sink.

The English, notwithstanding the disadvantage of our position and the bad quality of our powder, suffered more than we. They had three or four men killed and wounded by the bursting of our shells.

Nelson retired in great mortification, promising to take revenge in a few days, and to return with certain means of destruction.

His re-appearance was, therefore, daily expected, and the French admiral prepared for his warm reception. He re-enforced his line, provided it with better ammunition, cheered the spirits of his sailors and soldiers, already full of ardour, and proud at having defied the English on their own element. Three picked battalions, taken from the 46th, 57th, and 108th demi-brigades, had been embarked on board the flotilla to act as on the day of the 4th.

Twelve days afterwards, the 16th of August—28th Thermidor—Nelson appeared with a naval force much larger than the first. Every thing betokened on his part a serious attack, and an attempt at boarding. This was what the French desired.

Nelson had thirty-five sail, a great many boats, and two thousand picked men. Toward evening he had ranged his boats around the Medusa, distributed his people in them, and given his instructions. These boats, manned by English mariners, were to advance during the night by means of their oars, and carry our line by boarding. They were formed in four divisions. A fifth division of bomb-ketches was to take position, not in front of our flotilla, which had been found of no advantage in the bombardment of the 4th, but on one flank, so as to rake our line.

Toward midnight these four divisions, commanded by four intrepid officers, Captains Sommersville, Parker, Cotgrave, and Jones, advanced rapidly toward the coast of Boulogne. A small French boat, manned by only eight men, had been left as an outpost. She was

¹ LATOUCHE-TRÉVILLE. L. R. M. LEVASSOR, COUNT OF. Born at Rochefort on June 3d, 1745, at thirteen he entered the marine guard, and during the American war obtained the command of a frigate. He commanded the flotilla at Boulogne, against the attacks of Nelson to cut it out with boats in 1801, which enterprise failed, owing to the squadrons of attack not arriving simultaneously and to the boats being chained to one another and to the shore. He subsequently obtained the command at Toulon, when he boasted that Nelson and the whole British fleet had fled before him. Nelson kept this letter for a long time, swearing that if he ever took him he would make him eat it in a sandwich. Of this retribution he was however deprived by the death of Latouche, which occurred, according to the French papers, in consequence of his walking so often to the signal-post on Sèpe to watch the English fleet, which was blockading him.—Encyclopædia Americana.

surrounded and boarded, but made a gallant resistance, and the noise of her musketry served to announce the presence of the enemy.

The four English divisions approached with the whole strength of the men at the oars. As soon as they were perceived, they were received with a discharge of musketry and grape shot. The first division, commanded by Captain Sommerville, was carried by the tide, out of its course to the eastward, far beyond our right wing, which it was ordered to attack. The two divisions of the centre, commanded by Captains Parker and Cotgrave, advancing directly toward the middle of our line, reached it the first, about one o'clock in the morning, and attacked it badly. That under Captain Parker, after having exchanged with our boats a very heavy fire, threw itself upon one of the large brigs which had been stationed among our boats to support them. It was the Etna, commanded by Captain Pevrieu. Six pinnaces surrounded her to carry her by boarding. The English climbed up gallantly, their officers leading; but they were received by 200 infantry soldiers, and driven back with the bayonet. The brave Pevrieu, having engaged successively two English sailors, though wounded both by a dirk and a pike, killed them both. In a few moments the pinnaces were repulsed, and the greater part of the sailors in them disabled. Our boats received as bravely the assailants who attacked them, and beat them off with hatchets and bayonets. A little further off, Captain Cotgrave attacked the French with great gallantry, but no more advantage. A large gun-boat, the Surprise, surrounded by four pinnaces, sunk the first, took the second, and put the other two to flight. The soldiers vied with the sailors in this sort of combat, perfectly congenial to their brave and audacious disposition.

Whilst the 2d and 3d English divisions were thus received, the first, which was to have attacked our right wing, carried eastwardly by the tide, was unable to arrive at the scene of action until at a quite late period. Endeavouring to return from the eastward to the westward, she seemed to threaten the extremity of our line, and to endeavour to pass between the land and our boats, a manœuvre of which the English are very fond. This was, however, more a consequence of its position than of calculation. But detachments of the 108th posted on the shore, kept up a murderous fire on them. The English sailors, undismayed, attacked the gun-boat, Vulcan, stationed on the extreme right of our line. The lieutenant commanding her, named Guérault, a gallant fellow, received them at the head of his sailors, and some infantry soldiers. He had a hard contest to maintain. Whilst he was fighting on the deck of his boat, the English surrounding him, endeavoured to cut his cables, so as to carry off the boat itself. Fortunately one of them was of chain, and resisted all their efforts to part it. The firing from the other French boats and the shore obliged the English to sheer off. The attack at this point was, therefore, as successfully repulsed as at the others.

Day was beginning to break. The 4th division of the enemy, intended for our left, and obliged to make a long detour to the westward, against the tide, running the other way, had not arrived in time. Thanks to the darkness, Nelson's bombs had not done much harm. The English were everywhere repulsed: the sea was covered with their dead, and several of their boats were taken or sunk. The daylight, becoming momentarily more clear, rendered a retreat necessary. This they executed about four o'clock in the morning. The sun shone out to illuminate their flight. This time, it was not on their part a fruitless attempt, it was an actual defeat.

Our crews were in high spirits: they had not lost many, and the English, on the contrary, had suffered severely. What added most to the satisfaction produced by this brilliant action, was to have beaten Nelson in person, and to have nullified all the threats of destruction he had publicly hurled at our flotilla.

The contrary effect would necessarily take place on the other side of the channel: and although this combat at anchor did not prove what a similar flotilla could do at sea, with 100,000 men on board, nevertheless the confidence of the English in the enterprising genius of Nelson was somewhat shaken, and the unknown danger by which they were threatened gave them still more uneasiness than before.

The vicissitudes, however, of this great negotiation were about terminating. Influenced by the conduct of the Spanish cabinet, the First Consul had authorized M. Otto to yield Trinity. It was supposed that this concession and the two combats of Boulogne would put an end to the hesitation of the British cabinet. They consented, indeed, to the propositions named, with the exception of some few minor difficulties. The English cabinet wanted, whilst restoring Malta to the order of St. John of Jerusalem, to stipulate that the island should be placed under the protection of a guaranteeing power; for they hardly relied on the ability of the order to defend it, even should it be restored. The two cabinets could not agree upon the guaranteeing power. The Pope, the Court of Naples, and Russia, were successively discussed and rejected. Lastly, the mode of engrossing the treaty itself gave some trouble. As it was to have a great effect on public opinion in both countries, both the parties laid as much stress on appearances as on reality. England consented to enumerate, in the treaty, the numerous possessions she had restored to France and her allies, but she wished also to enumerate those taken from her. This claim was just, much more so than that of the First Consul, who wished that the possessions restored to France, Holland, and Spain should be enumerated, and that England should obtain the others only at the price of silence.

To these difficulties, of no real value, were added others, in relation to the prisoners, the debts, the sequestrations, and especially to the allies of the contracting powers, and the part which should be assigned to them in the protocol. They were, however, anxious to finish and terminate the miseries of the world. On the one hand, the English cabinet wanted to conclude before the meeting of Parliament, on the other, the First Consul was daily fearful of hearing of the surrender of Alexandria, for the prolonged resistance of this place still maintained a doubt useful to the negotiation. Impatient to achieve great results, he anxiously desired the arrival of the day when he could say to France that magical and new word of peace, not only with Austria, Prussia, or Russia, but peace with the whole universe.

Consequently it was agreed to sanction immediately the great results obtained, and to refer to further negotiation the difficulties of forms and details. To this effect it was proposed to engross the preliminaries of peace, and, immediately after the signature of these preliminaries, to order the plenipotentiaries to draw up at their leisure a definitive treaty, to which were to be referred all difficulties not fundamental and the settling of which would require time. In order to arrive more certainly at a speedy termination, the First Consul wished to limit the negotiation to a specified time. It was now the middle of September, 1801—end of Fructidor, year IX.; he granted until the 2d of October—10th of Vendémiaire, year X. After this time, he was determined, he said, to take advantage of the thick fogs of autumn to execute his projects on the coasts of England and Ireland. All this was said with the delicacy due to a great and haughty nation, but with that peremptory tone which left no room for doubt.

The two negotiators, M. Otto and Lord Hawkesbury, were honest men, and anxious for peace. They desired it for itself, and were likewise induced by the very natural and legitimate ambition of affixing their names to one of the greatest treaties in the history of the world. Thus they lent all the facilities compatible with their instructions to the engrossing of the preliminaries.

It was agreed that England should restore to France and her allies, that is to Spain and Holland, all the maritime conquests she had made, with the exception of the islands of Ceylon, and Trinity, which she had definitively acquired.

Such was the form adopted to conciliate the proper self-love of the two nations. In short, England was to keep the continent of India, which she had taken from the native princes: the island of Ceylon, taken from the Dutch, and the necessary appendage to this continent: lastly the island of Trinity, in the Antilles, taken from the Spaniards. This was sufficient to satisfy the greatest national ambition. She restored the Cape of Good Hope, Demerara, Berbice, Essequibo, and Surinam to the Dutch; Martinico and Guadaloupe to the French; Minorca to the Spaniards, and Malta to the order of St. John of Jerusalem. As to this last point, the guaranteeing power was to be named in the closing treaty. England was to evacuate Porto-Ferraio, which, with the island of Elba, was to return to the French. In return, the French were to evacuate the Territory of Naples, that is to say, the Gulf of Tarentum.

Lastly, Egypt was to be evacuated by the troops of both nations, and restored to the Porte. The states of Portugal were guaranteed.

If we consider only the great results, which the long disputed restoration of a few islands neither greatly increased nor diminished, the following is the summing up of the treaty. In this struggle of ten years, England had acquired the empire of the Indies, without France being able to counter-balance it by the possession of Egypt. But, in return, France had changed the face of the continent to her own advantage; she had conquered the formidable line of the Alps and the Rhine, removed Austria for ever from her frontiers, by the conquest of the Low Countries, torn from this power the constant object of her dearest wishes, that is, Italy, which had passed nearly wholly under the French dominion. She had, by the principle laid down of secularizing, considerably weakened the imperial house of Germany, to the profit of the house of Brandenburg. She had given Russia some fatal blows, for having wished to meddle in the affairs of the East. She governed Switzerland, Holland, Spain, and Italy. No country in the world exerted a magical power like her own; and, if England had increased by sea, France had added to the extent of her shores the coasts of Holland, Flanders, Spain, and Italy, countries completely under her dominion or her influence. Here were vast means of maritime power.

Such was all that England sanctioned, in signing the preliminaries at London, for the price, indeed, of the continent of India. France might readily consent to it. Our allies, vigorously defended, recovered nearly all they had lost by the war. Spain was deprived of Trinity through her own fault, but she gained Olivença in Portugal, and Tuscany in Italy. Holland abandoned Ceylon; but she recovered her Indian colonies, the Cape of Good Hope, and the Guianas: and she was freed from the Stadtholder.

Such were the consequences of this peace, the most splendid and glorious ever concluded by France. It was natural, therefore, that the French negotiator was anxious to terminate it. The 30th of September had arrived, and some difficulties in the engrossing were not yet overcome. They were all removed, and at last, on the evening of the 1st of October, the last day allowed by the First Consul, M. Otto had the gratification of affixing his signature to the preliminaries of peace, a deep and unequalled gratification, for no negotiator had ever had the happiness of securing by his signature so much greatness to his country.

It was agreed to keep this news secret at London for twenty-four hours, in order that the courier of the French legation might announce it first to his government. This fortunate courier left on the night of the 1st of October, and arrived at 4 o'clock of the afternoon of the 3d—11th Vendémiaire—at Malmaison. At that moment the three consuls were holding a government council. The greatest excitement was produced by the opening of the despatches; they ceased from their labours, and embraced each other. The First Consul, who willingly threw aside all reserve with men in whom he had confidence, evinced plainly the feelings which filled his bosom. So many results obtained in so short a time—order, victory, and peace restored to France by his genius and indefatigable perseverance, in two years—were blessings of which he might be justly proud. In these effusions of mutual gratification, M. Cambacérès said to him, "Now that we have made a treaty of peace with England, we must make a treaty of commerce, and remove all subjects of dispute between the two countries." "Not so fast," answered the First Consul, quickly, "the political peace is made; so much the better, let us enjoy it. As to a commercial peace, we will make one if we can. But at no price will I sacrifice French industry. I remember the misery of 1786." This extraordinary and instinctive passion for the interests of French industry must have been very strong, to burst out at such a time. But Consul Cambacérès, with his ordinary sagacity, had touched upon the difficulty which at a later period was destined to again embroil the two nations.

The news were instantly sent to Paris, in order to be published. Toward evening, cannon were heard in the streets, and every one inquired what happy event elicited these manifestations. They hastened to the public offices, where the government commissioners had orders to give information of the signing of the preliminaries. At that moment, in fact, the conclusion of peace was proclaimed in all the theatres, amid a joy for a long time unexampled. This joy was natural, for a peace with England was a true general peace; it assured the repose of the continent, suppressed the reason for European coalitions, and opened the world to our commerce and the products of our industry. Paris was suddenly illuminated during that night.

The First Consul immediately added his ratification to the preliminary treaty, and sent it to London, by his aide-de-camp Lauriston.¹ If the joy in France was great and general, in England it bordered on delirium. The news, at first kept secret by the negotiators, had at last transpired, and it was necessary to announce it to the Lord Mayor of London by a message. This message caused the more excitement, as, for several hours, a report of the rupture of the negotiation had been quite current. The people immediately abandoned themselves to those violent transports which are peculiar to the passionate character of the English nation. PEACE WITH FRANCE, was written with chalk in large letters on the public conveyances leaving London. Everywhere they were stopped, the horses unharnessed, and dragged in triumph. They imagined that all the miseries of scarcity and high prices were to finish at once. They dreamed of unknown, immense, impossible benefit. These are periods when nations, like individuals, weary with hating, experience the desire of reconciliation, even though it be transitory or delusive. At this moment, unfortunately so fleeting, the English people thought they almost loved France: they adored the hero, the sage, who governed it; and shouted with transport. Long live Bonaparte.

Such is human joy: it is lively and profound only from our ignorance of the future. Let us thank the wisdom of God, for having sealed to men the book of their destiny! How many hearts would have been, that day, chilled to the core, if, by dropping suddenly the veil which concealed the future, the French and English could have seen before them fifteen years of bitter hatred, and sanguinary war, the continent and the ocean dyed with the blood of two nations! And, how astounded France would have been, if, whilst thinking herself so great, so great eternally, she had caught a glimpse, in a page of that dreadful book of destiny, of the treaties of 1815! And that hero, victorious and wise, who governed her, how surprised and affrighted would he have been, if, in the midst of his most splendid works, he could have perceived his great mistakes; if, in the midst of the most elevated prosperity, he could have foreseen his terrible downfall, and his martyrdom! Oh! indeed, Providence, in the wisdom of his designs, has been beneficent in discovering only the present to man: it is all-sufficient for his feeble understanding! And let us, who to-day know all, both what happened then and subsequently, endeavour for a moment to place ourselves in the ignorance of that time, in order to understand and to partake of its lively and profound emotions.

The joy of the English was still alloyed by a slight doubt, for the ratification of the First Consul had not arrived, and some sudden determination was feared from this energetic and haughty man, who had proved so exacting toward their nation. This doubt was distressing, but London suddenly learns that an aide-de-camp of the First Consul, one of his brother soldiers, Colonel Lauriston, had arrived at the hotel of M. Otto, and brought the ratified treaty. All distrust being now dispelled, the joy is unbounded. The populace hurried to the house of M. Otto, and found him in his carriage with Colonel Lauriston, about to go to Lord Hawkesbury, and exchange the ratifications. They unharness the horses, and drag the two Frenchmen to Lord Hawkesbury's residence.

From Lord Hawkesbury's, the two envoys were to repair to the prime minister's, Mr. Addington, then to the Admiralty, to Lord St. Vincent.² The people insisted on dragging the carriage from one minister to another. At last, at the Admiralty, the crowd and confusion had become so great, that Lord St. Vincent, fearing some accident, placed himself at the head of the escort, lest the carriage should be overturned, and some melancholy disaster ensue from this convulsive joy. Several days were spent in transports of this kind, and testimonials of extraordinary satisfaction.

¹ LAURISTON. JAMES ALEXANDER BERNARD LAW, COUNT DE. Grandson of the celebrated projector Law. Was born in 1768. He embraced the military profession at an early age, and served in the artillery, in which he was very rapidly promoted, owing partly to his own activity and yet more to the friendship of Bonaparte, whose aide-de-camp he was.—Encyclopædia Americana. H.

² LORD ST. VINCENT, one of the most distinguished naval officers of England, perhaps better known as SIR JOHN JARVIS. He was created Earl of St. Vincent for his glorious victory off the cape of that name, over the combined French and Spanish squadrons, in which Nelson distinguished himself so highly by the boarding of the San Josef and Salvador Mundo. H.

One fact worthy of remark is, that, a few hours after the signature of the preliminaries, a courier arrived from Egypt, bringing the news of the surrender of Alexandria, which took place on the 30th of August, 1801—12th Fructidor. "This courier," said Lord Hawkesbury to M. Otto, "reached us eight hours after the signature of the treaty; so much the better; had he arrived sooner, public opinion would have obliged us to have been more exacting, and the negotiation would probably have been broken off. Peace is worth more than an island, more or less." This minister, an honest man, was right. But it proved that the resistance of Alexandria had been useful, and that, even in a desperate cause, it is always well to listen to the voice of honour, which advises the most obstinate resistance.

It was agreed that plenipotentiaries should meet at Amiens, an intermediate point between London and Paris, to settle the treaty definitively. The British cabinet chose an old and gallant soldier, who had long borne arms for his country, but who thought the time had arrived for terminating the miseries of the world, in Lord Cornwallis,¹ one of the most estimable men in Great Britain. Lord Cornwallis had commanded the English armies in America and in India. He had been Governor-general of India, and Viceroy of Ireland during the close of the last century. It was agreed that Lord Cornwallis should repair to Paris, to congratulate the First Consul, before proceeding to the place of meeting.

The First Consul, on his part, chose his brother Joseph, of whom he was particularly fond, and who, by the suavity of his manners, and gentleness of his disposition, was peculiarly adapted to play the part of a peace-maker, which was always reserved for him. Joseph had signed the peace with America at Morfontaine, with Austria at Lunéville, he was about signing that with England at Amiens. Thus the First Consul caused the fruit cultivated by his own victorious hands to be gathered by those of his brother. M. de Talleyrand, seeing all the apparent honour of these treaties falling to the lot of a personage, a stranger to the labours of our diplomacy, could not avoid a feeling of vexation, a feeling, however, momentary, and strongly repressed, observed, nevertheless, by the malicious and scrutinizing eyes of the diplomatists residing at Paris, and which served to fill more than one despatch. But the skilful minister knew that he dared not alienate the family of the First Consul; and that, moreover, if after having given General Bonaparte his dues, some portion of the glory of these great negotiations still remained to be shared, the European public decree it to the minister of foreign affairs alone.

The negotiations commenced with various states, and yet unconcluded, were almost immediately terminated. The First Consul understood the art of producing great effects on the minds of men, because he himself had a brilliant imagination. He quickly settled all difficulties with the various courts, and desired to heap upon France every kind of gratification in rapid succession, and to bewilder and intoxicate her by extraordinary results.

He closed with Portugal, and made his brother Lucien sign, at Madrid, the conditions at first refused at Badajos, with the exception of a few unimportant modifications. He insisted no longer on the occupation of one of the Portuguese provinces, for the basis of the peace with England being secured by the abandonment of Trinity, he had no longer any interest in retaining a guarantee, which at first seemed requisite. An indemnity for the expenses of the war was agreed upon, as well as some commercial advantages for our industry; such, for example, as the immediate introduction of our cloths, and various productions on the footing of the most favoured nations. The exclusion of English war and merchant vessels was formerly stipulated until the conclusion of peace.

The evacuation of Egypt terminated all difficulties with the Ottoman Porte. M. de Talleyrand concluded, at Paris, with the minister of the Sultan, the preliminaries of peace, which stipulated the restoration of Egypt to the Porte, and the renewal of her former relations with France, and the active enforcement of all anterior treaties of commerce and navigation.

Similar treaties were made with the regencies of Tunis and Algiers.

A treaty was signed with Bavaria which placed her, with regard to France, in the relations of alliance which had formerly existed between that court and the old French monarchy, when the latter protected all the second class German powers against the ambition of Austria. It was an actual renewal of the treaties of Westphalia and Teschen. Bavaria abandoned to France all her former possessions on the left bank of the Rhine. In return, France promised to use her influence in the Germanic affairs soon about to be negotiated, to procure for Bavaria an adequate indemnity. France, moreover, guaranteed the integrity of her states.

Lastly, to finish this work of general pacification, the treaty with Russia, which established a right of peace already existing in fact, was signed, after long discussion, by M. de Markoff and M. de Talleyrand. As has been seen, the new emperor had shown less energy in his resistance to the maritime pretensions of England, but also less ostentation and exacting in the protection granted to the little Italian states, which had taken a part in the coalition against France. Alexander had never made any diffi-

¹ LORD CORNWALLIS, CHARLES, MARQUIS OF. Born in 1739, and educated at Eton and Cambridge. He devoted himself early to the profession of arms. In 1762 he took his seat in the House of Peers on the death of his father. By his speeches he appears to have been favourable to the claims of the colonies; yet in his military capacity he accepted a command in America, and distinguished himself at the battle of Brandywine. He was then appointed governor of South Carolina, and won the battles of Camden and Guilford. He then invaded Virginia, and was obliged to surrender at Yorktown with his whole army to Washington and Lafayette. In 1786 he was sent out, as commander-in-chief and governor-general, to India. During his tenure he vanquished Tippoo Saib, stormed Seringapatam, and conquered the Mysore. He was afterwards Viceroy of Ireland in 1796, during the rebellion, until 1801, in which capacity he conducted himself with great firmness and judgment, and a conciliatory temper. In 1801 he signed the treaty of Amiens, as in the text.

culties as to Egypt; but, at all events, they were all suppressed by recent events. He pretended no longer to the title of Grand-master of the Knights of Malta, thus rendering easy the restoration of the Order upon its former footing, as has been agreed upon with England. The only serious difference with Alexander was as to Naples and Piedmont. By insisting and gaining time, these also had been overcome. The evacuation of the gulf of Tarentum had just been promised to the English. Russia was satisfied, and saw in it the accomplishment of a condition essential to her honour, namely, the integrity of the Neapolitan states. She had ceased to speak of the island of Elba. As to Piedmont, each day, added to the silence of England during the negotiation at London, had emboldened the First Consul not to restore this important province to the King of Sardinia. Russia reminded him of the promises made on this subject. The First Consul answered by saying, that a defence of the true maritime law in all its extent had been promised to him, and that a part of it had been yielded to England. They agreed on an article by which they promised an amicable arrangement of the interests of his majesty, the King of Sardinia, and to have for them all the respect compatible with the actual nature of things. This was giving themselves great latitude with regard to this prince, and especially that of indemnifying at some time with the duchy of Parma or Plaisance, as was then the intention of the First Consul. The conduct of the King of Sardinia, his devotion to the English during the last campaign in Egypt, had deeply wounded the chief of the French government. The latter, however, had better reasons than anger; he looked upon Piedmont as one of our most valuable Italian provinces, for it always gave us an outlet into Italy, and the opportunity of constantly maintaining an army there. It was, in short, for France, what Milan had so long been for Austria.

Russia and France had always been of one opinion on the affairs of Germany: there was consequently no difficulty on that head.

The treaty was therefore engrossed upon this basis, in conjunction with the new envoy, M. de Markoff, recently arrived from Petersburg. An open treaty was first signed, which simply stated that a good understanding was restored between the two governments, and that they would not permit the emigrants of either country to entertain treasonable intrigues in their former land. This article was intended for the Poles on the one hand, and the Bourbons on the other. To this open treaty was added a secret convention, in which it was declared, that the two empires having reaped the benefit of their interposition in the affairs of Germany, at the treaty of Teschen, they would again unite their influence to effect in Germany the territorial arrangements most favourable to the equilibrium of Europe; that France especially would endeavour to obtain an advantageous indemnity for the elector of Bavaria, the Grand-duke of Wurtemberg, the Grand-duke of Baden; (the latter had been added to the list of the protégés of Russia, on account of the new empress, who was a princess of Baden;) that the Neapolitan states would be evacuated on the conclusion of the maritime peace, and enjoy neutrality in case of war; and that lastly, an amicable arrangement of the affairs of the King of Sardinia should be made, when opportunity offered, and in the manner most compatible with the actual condition of things.

The First Consul immediately sent his aide-camp, Caulaincourt, to Petersburg, to carry to the young emperor a well-written and friendly letter, in which he congratulated him on the conclusion of peace, informed him with a kind of satisfaction of a multitude of details, and seemed to desire, in future, to conduct with him the great affairs of the world. M. de Caulaincourt, whilst waiting for an ambassador, was to supersede Duroc, who had been rather hasty in returning from Petersburg. The First Consul had sent the latter a large sum, with orders to be present at the coronation of the emperor, and to represent France with magnificence. Duroc, not having had time to receive this letter, had departed. Another cause had induced him. Alexander had ordered an invitation to be present at the coronation to be sent to him, but M. de Panin had not obeyed him. This affair having been subsequently explained, the emperor, hurt at this disobedience, banished M. de Panin to his country residence, and replaced him by M. de Kotschoubey, one of the members of his secret council. The young emperor thus began to get rid of the men who had assisted in his elevation, and who wanted to lead him in their policy, which was exclusively English. Every thing, therefore, augured well from Russia. The delicate and flattering attentions of the First Consul could not fail to render this result more certain.

These various treaties, which completed the peace of the world, were signed nearly at the same time as the preliminaries of London. Public joy was at its greatest height, and it was determined to celebrate the general peace by a splendid festival. This was fixed for the 18th of Brumaire. The day could not have been more wisely chosen, for to the revolution of the 18th of Brumaire these happy results were to be attributed. Lord Cornwallis was to be present. He arrived on the 16th of Brumaire—7th of November—at Paris, with a number of his countrymen. The signature of the preliminaries had scarcely been completed when the demand for passports for France rapidly increased. M. Otto had given three hundred. These were insufficient, an unlimited number was required. The vessels bringing English goods and coming for French productions, showed the same anxiety to obtain letters of safe conduct. All these demands were granted with the greatest alacrity, and the relations between the two countries were restored immediately with inconceivable rapidity and ardour. On the 18th of Brumaire, Paris was filled with Englishmen, impatient to see this France, so new and suddenly so brilliant, and above all to see the man who at this moment was the admiration of England and of the world. The illustrious Fox was among those most anxious to visit France. On the day of the festival, made magnificent by the tranquil and profound joy of all classes of citizens, no carriages out those of Lord Cornwallis were allowed in the streets. The crowd hastily and respectfully opened before this honourable representative of the English armies, who had just concluded a peace with his own nation and ours. He was surprised to find France so different from the hideous picture painted at London by the emigrants. All his countrymen shared the same feeling, and expressed it with the most ingenious wonder.

Whilst this festival was taking place at Paris, a superb banquet was given in the city of London, and amid the most enthusiastic shouts, the following toasts were drunk.

The King of Great Britain!

The Prince of Wales!

The liberty and prosperity of the united kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland!

The First Consul Bonaparte, the liberty and happiness of the French republic.

Loud and unanimous acclamations accompanied this last toast.

France was at peace with all the powers of the earth. There remained but one to conclude, more difficult perhaps than the preceding, for it required a genius far different from that of a warrior, and it was also very desirable, as it was to restore tranquillity to the minds of men, and union to families. This peace was that of the Republic with the Church. We will now proceed to relate the laborious negotiations of which this was the object, with the representative of the Holy See.

BOOK XII.

THE CONCORDATE.¹

State of the Catholic Church during the French Revolution—Civil Constitution of the Clergy decreed by the Constituent Assembly—The intention of this Constitution was to assimilate the administration of Religion to that of the Kingdom, by establishing a diocese in each department, cause the Bishops to be elected by the Faithful, and disengage them from the Canonical Government—Clergy required to swear fidelity to this Constitution—Refusal on their part, and Schism—Various Orders of Priests, their Character and Influence—Inconvenience of this state of things—Arguments furnished by it to the Enemies of the Revolution, to disturb the State and Private Families—Various Systems proposed to remedy this evil—The System of Inaction—The System of a French Church, of which the First Consul was to be the head—The System of an encouragement to Protestantism—Opinions of the First Consul on these different Systems—He forms the project of restoring the Catholic Religion, by adapting its Discipline to the new French Institutions—He wants to depose the old Titular Bishops, a circumscription of sixty leagues instead of one hundred and fifty-eight; the creation of a new Clergy, composed of respectable Priests of all Sects; the reformation of the Police of Religion to the State; a Salary to the Priests instead of a Landed Endowment; and, lastly, the authorizing by the Church, of the Sale of the National Properties—Amicable Relations of Pope Pius VII. with the First Consul—Monsignor Spina, charged with the Negotiation at Paris, retards it in a temporal interest of the Holy See—Secret desire to recover the Legations—Monsignor Spina at last aware of the necessity of haste—He confers with the Abbé Bernier, to whom is confided the Negotiation on the part of France—Difficulties of the plan proposed to the Court of Rome—The French Consul sends his plan to Rome and demands an Explanation from the Pope—Three Cardinals consulted—The Pope, after this consultation, desires that the Catholic be made the State Religion; that he be excused from deposing the old Titular Bishops, and from authorizing otherwise than by his silence the Sale of the Properties of the Church—Debates with M. de Cacault, Minister of France at Rome—The First Consul, weary with the delay, orders M. de Cacault to leave Rome within five days, if the Concordate is not adopted in that time—Terror of the Pope and Cardinal Consalvi—M. de Cacault suggests to the Pontifical Cabinet the idea of sending Cardinal Consalvi to Paris—Departure of the latter for France, and his fears. His arrival at Paris—Kind reception by the First Consul—Conferences with the Abbé Bernier—They agree upon the principle of a State Religion—The Catholic Religion is declared that of a majority of the French—All the other conditions of the First Consul, relative to the deposition of the old Titular Bishops, the new Circumscription, the Sale of the Church Properties, are accepted with a few modifications as to form—Definitive agreement on all points—Efforts made at the last moment by the adversaries of the Restoration of Religion, to prevent the First Consul from signing the Concordate—He insists—Signature affixed on the 15th of July, 1801—Return of Cardinal Consalvi to Rome—Satisfaction of the Pope—Solemnity of the Ratifications—Choice of Cardinal Caprara as Legate a latere—The First Consul would have wished to celebrate on the 18th of Brumaire, the Peace with the Church, as well as the Peace with all the European powers—The Necessity of addressing the old Titular Bishops, to obtain their Resignations, causes delay—Demand of their Resignation addressed by the Pope to all the old Bishops, constitutional or not constitutional—Wise submission of the Constitutional—Noble Resignation of the Members of the old Clergy—Admirable Answers—No Resistance on the part of any except those who had fled to London—Every thing ready for the Restoration of Religion in France, when a warm opposition in the Tribunate creates new delay—Necessity of conquering this opposition before proceeding further.

The First Consul would have wished that the anniversary of the 18th of Brumaire, intended for the celebration of the reconciliation of France with Europe, should have also witnessed the reconciliation of France with the church. He had made the greatest efforts to terminate the negotiation with the Holy See, so that the religious ceremonies might have been added to the popular festivals. But it is still less easy to treat with spiritual than with temporal powers, for the gain of a battle is not sufficient; and it is a point of honour with the human mind to be conquered only by force, accompanied by persuasion.

This difficult labour of persuasion added to force, had the conqueror of Rivoli and Marengo undertaken with the Romish church, in order to reconcile her to the French republic.

The Revolution, as we have before frequently said, had shot beyond the mark in many things. To cause it to retrograde, only as regarded these things, and that neither within nor beyond the mark, was a legitimate and salutary reaction, which the First Consul had undertaken, and which he then rendered admirable, by the wisdom and skill of the means he employed.

¹ Concordate. A convention between the Bishop of Rome, as head of the church, and any secular government, for the settling of ecclesiastical affairs.—Encyclopædia Americana.

Religion was evidently one of the things in which the Revolution had exceeded all just and reasonable bounds. In no department was reform so necessary.

Under the old monarchy there had existed a powerful clergy, possessing a greater portion of the soil, supporting none of the public offices, making only when they pleased voluntary contributions to the royal treasury, erected into a political power, and forming one of the three orders which, in the states-general, expressed the will of the nation. The Revolution had swept away the clergy with their wealth, influence, and privileges; it had swept them away with the nobility, the parliament, and the throne itself. It was impossible for it to have done otherwise. A proprietary clergy, erected into a political power, might have suited the state of society in the middle ages, and have then been useful to civilization, but it was inadmissible in the eighteenth century. The constituent assembly had well done in abolishing it, and replacing it by a clergy, devoted solely to their religious duties, having no share in the deliberations of the state, and salaried instead of being proprietary. To ask the approval of all these changes from the Holy See, was demanding a great deal. In order to succeed, it was politic to stop these, and not furnish a legitimate pretext for saying, that religion herself was attacked in all she held most immutable and sacred. The Constituent Assembly, carried away by that taste for regularity, so natural to reformers, assimilated, without hesitation, the government of the church to that of the state. Some dioceses were too vast, others too small; it was wished that the ecclesiastical should be the same as the administrative limits, and a diocese was created for every department. The ecclesiastical, like the civil and judiciary officers, were to be made elective. This arrangement seemed to be a return to the times of the primitive church, when the bishops were elected by the faithful. The canonical institution, that is, the confirmation of the bishops by the Pope, was immediately suppressed; and a constitution, to which the name of Civil Constitution of the Clergy was formed. The men who acted in this way were animated by very pious intentions. They were true believers, fervent Jansenists, but of narrow minds, insatuated with theological disputations, and hence very dangerous in human affairs. To complete their mistakes, they required the French clergy to swear fidelity to the civil constitution. This was giving rise to a case of conscience for the sincere, and a pretext for the malevolent; it was, in short, creating a schism. Rome, already affected by the misfortunes of the throne, was soon wounded by those of the altar. She forbade the oath. A portion of the clergy, faithful to her voice, refused to take it; another portion consented, and formed, under the title of sworn (assermenté) or constitutional clergy, that recognised by the state, and the only one allowed to perform the offices of religious worship. Priests had not yet been proscribed: the exercise of the priesthood was merely interdicted to some, and granted to others. But the deposed priests were generally preferred by the faithful, because the religious feeling is susceptible, easily alarmed, and especially distrustful of power. They turned towards the ecclesiastics considered as orthodox, and appearing persecuted. They left, by instinct, those whose orthodoxy was suspected, and who were supported by the government. There was a private as well as a public worship—the former more observed than the latter. The passions inimical to the Revolution leagued with offended religion, and hurried her into the errors of faction. In the province of La Vendée a horrible civil war was soon the consequence of this schism. The Revolution was not far behind, and from the mere suspension of the ecclesiastical functions, it soon passed to persecution. It proscribed and banished priests. Then ensued the abolition of all religion, and the proclamation of the Supreme Being. Then, priests who had or had not submitted to the laws, sworn or not sworn, were treated alike, and sent to the same scaffold, where royalists, Constituents, Girondists, and Mountainers, perished together.

Under the Directory this sanguinary proscription ceased. A variable government, sometimes inclining to indifference, and sometimes to severity, kept the church in a continual state of anxiety. The First Consul, encouraging, by his power, and evidence of intention of reformation, all those who had suffered, without regard to the manner, induced the ministers of religion to leave their hiding-places, or to return from exile. But by bringing them to the light, he made the schism more apparent, and widened, perhaps, the breach. In order to remove the difficulty of the oath, he ceased to require it, and substituted for it a simple promise of submission to the laws. This promise, which could not alarm the consciences of the priests, had facilitated their return, but had added, in some manner, new disputes to those already existing, by creating in the bosom of the clergy one order more.

There were the constitutional or sworn priests, legally invested with the sacerdotal functions, and enjoying the use of the religious edifices which had been restored to them by a decree of the consuls. There were priests, not sworn, who would never take the oath, who, after having lived in exile and in prison, had reappeared during the first days of the consulate, but who officiated in private houses, and pronounced the public worship performed in the churches improper. Lastly, these priests not sworn, were divided into priests who had not and those who had made the promise. The latter were not entirely approved of by the orthodox. They applied to Rome, which, fearing the First Consul, refused to answer. But Cardinal Maury, residing in the states of the Holy See, where he had become Bishop of Montefiascone, the medium of the Pope with the royalist party, and unwilling, at least then, to countenance the submission of the priests to the new government, had interpreted the silence of Rome, and sent to France, on the subject of the promise, disapprobatory letters, thus disturbing anew the consciences of the people

* Montagnards, members of the first assembly, belonging to that part called the Mountain, (Montagne.)

ALL these priests, thus divided, had each his own hierarchy. The constitutional priests obeyed the bishops, elected under the civil constitution. Of these bishops some had perished, either by a natural or a violent death. Those who had died, had been replaced by bishops, who, not having been regularly elected, amid the proscription levelled at all religion, had usurped their powers, or caused themselves to be elected by secret chapters, or kinds of religious coteries, without any authority either legal or moral. Thus the powers of the constitutional priests themselves, in the view of the civil constitution, were disputed by some amongst themselves, and had fallen into discredit. In this clergy were many respectable individuals; but, in general, they had lost the confidence of the faithful, because they were known to be at variance with Rome, and because, by meddling with the religious and political affairs of the day, they had derogated from the dignity of the priesthood. Many of them were violent clabbists, and very immoral. The best were sincere priests, whom the fury of Jansenism had driven into schism.

The clergy claiming to be orthodox had also its bishops, exerting a less public, but more real and very dangerous authority. The priests not sworn had nearly all emigrated. They were in Italy, Spain, Germany, and especially in England, whither they had been attracted by the subsidies of the British government. Corresponding with their diocese, by means of the grand-vicar chosen by them and approved by Rome, they governed their church from the bosom of their exile, under the inspiration of the passions excited by banishment, and frequently to the advantages of the enemies of France. The deceased, and they were many during the last ten years, were everywhere replaced by secret governors clothed with the powers of the Court of Rome; so that one of the wisest and oldest precautions of the Gallican church, that of filling vacancies by chapters, and not by the agents of the Holy See, was completely neglected. The French church had thus lost its independence, for it was directly governed by Rome, when it ceased to be by the emigrated bishops. Yet a little while, and the emigrated bishops would necessarily be nearly all dead, and the entire Church of France be under ultramontane authority.

There are men who are but slightly affected by the moral sight of a society torn by a thousand sects; they want the government either to disdain these religious divergences as foreign to it, or to respect them as sacred objects of its care. One circumstance, however, does not permit this proud indifference, which is the profound derangement of society, especially when this derangement is on the eve of being transformed into serious disorganization.

These various orders of clergy endeavoured to enlist proselytes in their favour. The constitutional clergy had but little power, and was only a subject of recriminations for the Jacobins, who were wont to say that the Revolution had been wholly forfeited, especially in the person of the priests alone who were attached to its cause; a matter in which the government could do nothing, for on it did not depend the disposition of the faithful, in favour of one clergy or another. But the clergy reputed orthodox had an effect upon minds entirely opposite to that of the established clergy. They endeavoured to alienate from the government all those whom the tediousness of civil discussions would have driven to the First Consul. If possible, they would again have kindled the passions of La Vendée. They maintained still a sort of secret suspicion and discontent. They agitated the south, more excited than La Vendée, and in the mountains in the centre of France, riotously gathered the people around the orthodox priests. Everywhere this clergy threw discord into families, by persuading those who had been either baptized or married by the sworn, (assermentés,) that they were not in the bosom of the true Catholic church, and that they must be rebaptized or remarried if they wished to become true Christians, or abandon a life of concubinage. Thus the welfare of families became a question, not in a legal but in a religious point of view. There were more than 10,000 married priests, who, carried away by the giddiness of the times, or excited by terror, had sought in marriage, some the gratification of passions they could not repress, and others an abjuration which saved them from the scaffold. They were husbands, and fathers of families, ruined by public prejudice, so long as the pardon of the church was withheld from them.

The purchasers of the national domains, those whom, of all citizens, the government had most interest in protecting, lived also in a state of disturbance and oppression. On their death-beds they were besieged by perfidious suggestions, and threatened with eternal damnation, if they did not consent to the most rapacious arrangements. Confession became a powerful engine in the hands of the emigrants, in striking a blow at property, at public credit, and, in a word, at one of the most essential principles of the Revolution, the inviolability of the public sales. The police of the government and the laws were equally powerless against these evils.

These disorders were not such as a government can observe with indifference. When religious sects have no other result than to multiply, in a vast country like America, and to succeed each other ad infinitum, leaving no traces but the fleeting remembrance of ridiculous or indecent practices, it may be conceived, that, to a certain point, the state may look on with indifference or inaction. Society presents a melancholy moral aspect, but public order is not seriously disturbed. Such was not the case in the old French society of 1801. Without great danger, the government of souls could not be intrusted to inimical factions. The torch of civil war could not be left in their hands, with the liberty of applying it, wherever they listed, to La Vendée, Brittany, or the Cevennes. They could not be permitted to disturb the tranquillity of families; besiege the beds of the dying to extort iniquitous concessions; to bring into doubt the credit of the state.

and, in short, to shake a whole class of possessions, even those which the Revolution had promised to render eternally inviolable.

The ideas of the First Consul on the constitution of society were too just and profound to allow him to regard with an indifferent eye the religious disorder in France at this period; and he was induced, moreover, to interfere, by motives still more elevated than those we have just indicated, if there can be motives more elevated than public order and private tranquillity.

A religious belief and a form of worship are necessary to all human associations. Man, thrown into the middle of the universe, without knowing whence he comes or whither he goes, why he suffers, even why he exists, what reward or what punishment he will receive hereafter; a prey to the contradictions of his fellow-men, some of whom tell him, that there is a God, the author and prime-mover of all things, others that there is none; the former, that good and evil exist, which should serve as a guide for his conduct; the latter, that there is neither good nor evil, which are mere fables invented by the powerful of the earth—experiences the imperious irresistible desire, of creating for himself on all those objects some definite belief. True or false, ridiculous or sublime, he creates one. Everywhere, in all ages, in all countries, in ancient as in modern times, in civilized as in savage countries, he is found at the foot of an altar, sometimes venerable, sometimes ignoble or sanguinary. When an established belief does not prevail, a thousand sects as bitter in dispute as in America, a thousand superstitions as degrading as in China, agitate and debase the human mind. Or, indeed, if, as in France in 1793, a transitory disturbance sweeps away the old religion of the country; man, at the very moment in which he had made a vow to henceforward believe nothing, belies himself in a few days, and the insane worship of the Goddess Reason, inaugurated at the side of the scaffold, has just proved that this vow was as vain as it was impious.

Judging, therefore, from his ordinary and constant conduct, man requires a religious belief. What, consequently, better can be desired for a civilized society, than a national religion, founded on the true sentiments of the human heart, conformable to the rules of a pure morality, consecrated by time, and which, without intolerance and persecution, brings, if not the whole, at least a great majority of the citizens to the foot of an ancient and revered altar?

Such a belief cannot be invented, if it has not existed for ages. Philosophers, even the most profound, may create a philosophy, adorn by their science the age in which they live: they give excitement to thought, but not belief. A warrior covered with glory may found an empire, he cannot found a religion. In former times, sages and heroes, pretending to have communication with Heaven, have been seen to conquer the minds of nations, and give them a belief: but, in modern days, the creator of a religion would be considered as an impostor, and though surrounded with terror like Robespierre, or with glory like the youthful Bonaparte, his career would terminate only in ridicule.

There was nothing to invent in 1800. That pure moral and antique belief existed: it was the old religion of Christ; according to some the work of God, according to others that of man; but according to all, the profound work of a sublime reformer. A reformer commented upon during eighteen centuries by countless vast assemblies of the eminent men of every period, occupied in discussing, under the title of heresies, the various systems of philosophy, adopting successively on each of the great problems of the destiny of man the most plausible and most social opinions, adopting them, as it were, by a majority of mankind, succeeding at last in producing that collection of unvarying doctrine, so often attacked, and always triumphant, called Catholic Unity, and at the foot of which the most splendid geniuses have bowed in silence. That religion, which had included in its ranks all civilized nations, had formed their manners, inspired their songs, furnished the subjects of their poetry, their paintings, and their statues, impressed with its seal all their national recollections, and stamped with its emblems their standards alternately victorious or vanquished, still existed! It had been lost temporarily in a great storm of human mind; but when the storm had ceased, the necessity of belief returned, and rose again from men's bosoms, as the natural and indispensable belief of France and Europe.

What could be more clearly indicated, and necessary in 1800, than to build up that altar of St. Louis, of Charlemagne, and of Clovis, for a time overthrown! General Bonaparte, who would have been ridiculous had he endeavoured to pass for a prophet or a revealer, was acting the true part assigned to him by Providence, by erecting with his victorious hands that venerable altar, and bringing back, by his example, nations wandering like a flock with the shepherd. And nothing short of his glory would have sufficed for such a work! Great geniuses, not only among philosophers, but among kings, Voltaire and Frederick, had heaped contempt on the Catholic religion, and given the signal of raillery for fifty years. General Bonaparte, who had as much talent as Voltaire, and more glory than Frederick, was able alone, by his example and reverence, to dispel the taunts and mockery of the last century.

Not the slightest doubt on this subject arose in his mind. The double motive of restoring order in the state and in families, of satisfying the moral wants of men, had inspired him with the firm determination of replacing the Catholic religion on its former basis, with the exception of its political attributes, which he regarded as incompatible with the present state of French society.

Is it needful to inquire, with motives such as those which governed him, whether he was actuated by religious faith or by policy and ambition? Wisdom, that is to say, a profound knowledge of human nature, guided his actions, that is sufficient. The rest is a mystery, which curiosity, always natural when a great man is concerned, may seek to penetrate, but which is of little importance. It must, however, be stated that the moral constitution of General Bonaparte led him to religious ideas. An elevated mind appreciates, in proportion to its very elevation, the beauties of creation. It is intelligence that discovers intelligence in the universe, and a great mind is more capable than a contracted one of tracing God by means of his works. General Bonaparte discussed voluntarily philosophical and religious questions with Monge, Lagrange, Laplace, sages whom he honoured and loved, and frequently embarrassed them, in their incredulity, by the clearness and originality of his arguments. To this must be added, that, being educated in a wild and religious country, under the eyes of a pious mother, the sight of the old Catholic altar awakened in him recollections of infancy, always so powerful on a sensitive and exalted imagination. As to ambition, which some of his detractors have wished to assign as the sole motive of his conduct in this matter, at that time, he had no other than that of doing good, in every way; and certainly he may be pardoned, if, as a reward of having done well, he found his power augmented. The most noble and legitimate ambition is that which endeavours to found its empire on the satisfaction of the true wants of nations.

The task he had proposed to himself, apparently easy, since it was only the satisfying of a very real public want, was nevertheless very difficult. The men who surrounded him, with hardly an exception, were but little disposed to the restoration of the old religion; and these men, magistrates, warriors, litterateurs, or savans, were the authors of the French Revolution, the true and only defenders of that Revolution then condemned, and who were to terminate it, by redeeming its errors, and fixing definitively its rational and legitimate results. The First Consul, therefore, met with warm opposition from his collaborators, his supporters, and his friends. These men, taken from the ranks of the moderate revolutionists, had not with Robespierre and St. Just shed human blood, and it was easy for them to denounce the excesses of the Revolution; but they had partaken of the errors of the Constituent Assembly, repeated with a smile the witticisms of Voltaire, and it was difficult to make them confess that they had for a long time overlooked the higher truths of social order. Sages like Laplace, Lagrange, and especially Monge, told General Bonaparte that he was about to humble, before Rome, the dignity of his government and his age. M. Rœderer, the most fiery monarchist of the day, and anxious for the most rapid and entire return to monarchy, yet saw with regret the project of restoring the old religion. M. de Talleyrand himself, the assiduous partisan of every thing that could reconcile the present with the past, and France with Europe, a workman of second rank, but a useful and zealous promoter of the general peace, looked upon with great coldness what was called the religious peace. He did not want to persecute the priests any longer, but, annoyed by private recollections, he was not desirous of the re-establishment of the old Catholic church, with its rules and discipline. The fellow-soldiers of General Bonaparte, the generals who had fought under his orders, wanting in primary education, and educated among the vulgar jests of camps, and declamations of clubs, were opposed to the restoration of religion. Though covered with glory, they seemed to fear that ridicule would attend their worship at the altar. Lastly, the brothers of General Bonaparte, living in close communion with the literati of the age, fearing every thing that had the appearance of serious opposition to their brother's power, and ignorant that beyond this interested or unenlightened resistance of men near the government, the real necessity was felt by the mass of the people, dissuaded him earnestly from what they considered as an imprudent or premature step.

The First Consul was therefore annoyed by advice of all kinds. Some told him not to meddle with religious affairs, to be satisfied with the non-persecution of the priests, and to let the sworn and non-sworn priests settle the matter in their own way. Others, aware of the danger of indifference or inaction, persuaded him to seize the opportunity and declare himself the head of a French church, and thus to remove from the hands of others the powerful engine of religion. Others proposed to drive France into Protestantism, and assured that, if he gave the example by his conversion to that faith, it would be followed with enthusiasm.

The First Consul opposed, with all his reason and eloquence, these pernicious counsels. He had formed a religious library, composed of a few but well chosen books, relating chiefly to the history of the church and the relations of church and state; he had ordered the Latin writings of Bossuet on this subject to be translated for him; he had devoured all this in the short intervals furnished him by the cares of government, and supplying by his genius all of which he was ignorant, as in the composition of the civil code he astonished the world by the accuracy, extent, and variety of his knowledge of religion. According to his custom, when deeply intent on an idea, he discussed it daily with his colleagues, his ministers, with the members of the Council of State or Legislative Body, with every one, in short from whom he might obtain information. He refuted successively the erroneous systems proposed to him, by cogent, clear, and decisive arguments.

To the system which consisted in abstaining from all participation in religious affairs, he replied, that indifference, so much vaunted by certain disdainful spirits, is not allowable in a people who had, for instance, just been seen invading a church and threatening to pillage it, because the rites of sepulture had been refused to a favourite actress of the public. How could one remain indifferent in a country, which, with the pretension of being indifferent, was so little so! The First Consul demanded, moreover, how it was possible to abstain from meddling, when the sworn and non-sworn priests were disputing for the possession of the house of worship, and solicited constantly the assistance of the public authority, to obtain some and dispossess others. He asked what would be done, when the constitutional clergy, already but little followed by the believing part of the population, would be entirely abandoned by them, and when the clergy who had refused the oath, exclusively followed and listened to, would alone be able to perform worship, as had already happened, and would preside over clandestine meetings. Must not the temporality of worship be restored to those who had conquered its spirituality? Was there not reason for meddling? Again, it was necessary to support those priests whose landed endowments had been taken by the Revolution, and for that purpose either give them appointments on the budget of the state, or suffer them to organize under the title of voluntary contributions, a vast system of taxation, which would produce 30,000,000 or 40,000,000 francs, to be distributed by them alone, perhaps to some foreign power, and might one day, perhaps, unknown to the government, feed the old soldiers of the civil war of La Vendée. Whatever they might do, the government would be aroused, despite itself, from its inaction, either to maintain good order, to dispose of the houses of worship, or, lastly, to pay the priests itself, or watch over their mode of payment.

It would thus have all the responsibility of government, without its advantages, without being able (which it would be by a prudent arrangement with the Holy See for securing to itself the religious administration) to bring back the clergy to the government, and enlist them in the work of reparation, to re-establish repose in families, to tranquillize the dying, the possessors of national property, the married priests, &c.; in fact, all parties compromised by the part they had taken in the Revolution.

Inaction, then, according to the First Consul, was only a mere dream, besides being a subterfuge resorted to by men who had no practical notion of the rationale of government.

As to the idea of creating a French church independent of all foreign supremacy, like the Church of England, and having, in place of a spiritual foreign head, a temporal one located at Paris, which could be no other than the government itself; in other words, the First Consul looked on it to be as vain as it was contemptible. What! he, a warrior, wearing sword and spurs, and doing battle, to become the head of a church, a sort of Pope, regulating church discipline and dogma! But it was sought to render him as odious as Robespierre, the inventor of the worship of the Supreme Being, or as ridiculous as Larévellière-Lepeaux, the inventor of the theophilanthropia! Who, in that case, were to be his followers? Who were to constitute his flock of the faithful? He could not, assuredly, expect it would consist of the orthodox Christians, to which class the majority of Catholics belonged, and who had an aversion from following excellent orists who had no other fault than that of having taken an oath imposed on them by the laws. The only followers he could hope to have, then, would be a few bad priests, a few monks who had run away from their convents, and were frequenters of the clubs, who, having led dissolute lives before, wished to lead them still, while they waited for the head of the new church to grant permission to the priests to marry! He could not even hope to count among his flock the Abbé Grégoire, who, while he demanded a return to the primitive church, held out for remaining in communion with the successor of St. Peter! He could not even hope to have Larévellière-Lepeaux, who wanted to confine religious worship to a few hymns, and to a few flowers strewed upon an altar! Was such the church of which they wanted to make him the head? Was that the part to be played by the conqueror of Marengo and Rivoli, the restorer of social order! Yet was this project proposed to him by the jealous supporters of liberty! But supposing that the project might succeed, which, by the way, was impossible, and that to his already immense temporal power the First Consul should unite the spiritual power; he would become the most formidable of tyrants, and the master of both body and soul in as great a degree as the sultan of Constantinople, who is at one and the same time head of the state, of the army, and of the religion. Moreover, the hypothesis was absurd; he would be a tyrant, open to derision, for he could succeed only in producing a schism, the most silly of all. He, whose wish was to be the pacificator of France and of the world, to terminate all political and religious divisions—was he to become the originator of a new schism, a little more absurd, and not less dangerous, than the preceding ones? "Yes! doubtless," said the First Consul, "a Pope I must have, but he must be a Pope who will approximate men's minds to each other instead of creating divisions, who will reunite them and give them to the government sprung from the Revolution, as a price for the protection that he shall have obtained from it. And for this purpose I must have the true Pope, the Catholic, Apostolic and Roman Pope, whose seat is at the Vatican. With the French armies and some deference I shall always be sufficiently his master. When I shall raise up the altars again, when I shall protect the priests, when I shall feed them and treat them as ministers of religion deserve to be treated in every country, he will do what I shall ask of him, through the interest which he will have in the general tranquillity. He will calm men's minds, reunite them under his hand, and place them under mine. Short of this, there is only a continuation and an aggravation of the desolating schism which is preying on us, and for me an immense and indelible ridicule."

As to the idea of urging France to Protestantism, it appeared to the First Consul more than ridiculous, it was odious to him. In the first place, he thought he could not succeed any better by it. In his opinion, persons were wrong in fancying that in France one could do whatever one wished. It was an error by no means creditable to those who committed it, for they were supposing France to be without conscience and without opinion. He, himself, said some, could do whatever he wished. "Yes," replied he, "but only with regard to the real and sensibly felt wants of France." She had been in deep desquiet, and he had brought her to the most perfect calm; he had found her a prey to anarchists, who no longer knew how to defend her against foreign aggression, and he had dispersed these anarchists, re-established order, and driven far from their frontiers the Austrians and the Russians; given her the peace for which she was so eager; he had put an end, in a word, to the scandals of a weak and licentious government: was it so very astonishing that he should have been allowed to do such things? Again, quite recently, the opposers of the tribunal had wished to refuse him the means of clearing the high roads of the brigands who infested them! Yet, with that fact before them, persons pretended that he could do whatever he pleased! It was an error. He had power according to the wants and the opinions at the time predominant in France, but nothing more. He could use it better, more strenuously, than another, but he should be powerless against the actual movement of opinion. This movement inclined to the re-establishment of all things essential to society: religion was the first. "I am very powerful at present," exclaimed the First Consul; "what then! were I to wish to change the old religion of France, she would set herself against me, and conquer me. Do you know when the country was hostile to the Catholic religion? It was when the government, in coalition with it, used to burn books and send to the wheel the Callas and the Labarres; but, rely on it, were I to become the enemy of religion, the whole country would join her. I should change the indifferent into believers, into sincere Catholics. I should, perhaps, be a little less jeered for wishing to urge on to Protestantism, than if I set myself up as patriarch of a Gallican church, but I should soon become the object of public hatred. Is Protestantism the old religion of France? Is it the religion which, after long civil wars, after a thousand fights, has triumphed lastingly, as most suitable to the manners, to the genius of our nation? Is it not evident that it is violence to impose one's opinions on a people instead of their own, to create for them tastes, usages, even recollections which they have not. The principal charms of a religion are its recollections. For my part," said the First Consul, one day to one of those with whom he was in conversation, "when at Malmaison, I never hear the sound of the church bell in the neighbouring village without emotion; and what emotion could be created in France by Protestant meeting-houses, which were not frequented in childhood, and whose cold and stern aspect so badly accords with the manners of our nation? It may be thought, perhaps, that it is an advantage not to be dependent on a foreign head. It is an error. Everywhere, and for all things, there must be a head. There is no institution more to be admired than that which maintains unity in faith, and prevents, at least as much as is possible, religious dissensions. There can be nothing more odious than a crowd of sects disputing with one another, interchanging invectives, coming to open contention with arms in their hands, if they be in their first excitement, or, if they have got the habit of living together, looking at each other with a jealous eye—forming in the state coteries which stand by one another, urge on their partisans, keep aloof those of rival sects, and give the government embarrassments of every sort. The bickerings of sects are the most insupportable that I know of. Dispute is the province of science; it animates it, sustains it, and leads it to discoveries. To what does dispute in religious matters lead, if not to uncertainty and to the destruction of all faith? Moreover, when the activity of the mind is directed to theological controversies, these controversies are so absorbing that they turn the thoughts of man from all useful research. Seldom do you find combined together great theological controversy with great mental operations. Religious quarrels are either cruel and sanguinary, or dry, barren, and bitter; there are none more odious than they. Inquiry in regard to science, faith in matters of religion, that is the true, the useful course. The institution which maintains unity of faith, that is to say, the Pope, as guardian of Catholic unity, is an admirable institution. The reproach of being a foreign sovereign is made against this head of the church. True, he is a foreign sovereign, and we ought to thank Heaven for it. What! in the same country can one picture to himself a like authority conjoined with the government of the state! United to the government, this authority would be the despotism of the sultans; were it separate from, perhaps hostile to the government, it would produce a frightful, an intolerable rivalry. The Pope is outside Paris, and well it is so; he is neither at Madrid nor at Vienna, and that is why we bear with his spiritual authority. Vienna and Madrid congratulate themselves for the same reason. Do you imagine that if he were at Paris the Viennese or Spaniards would consent to receive his decisions! We are then lucky that he is not a resident amongst us, and that, while residing away from us, he does not take up his abode amongst rivals; that he dwells in that old Rome, far from the hand of the Emperors of Germany, far from that of the Kings of France, or the Kings of Spain, holding the balance between the Catholic sovereigns, inclining always a little to the side of the strongest, but he soon recovers his attitude, if the stronger becomes an oppressor. Centuries have brought this about, and have done it well. For the government of souls, it is the most beneficent institution imaginable. I do not," added the First Consul, "maintain these opinions through the positiveness of a devotee, but from reason. Hear me!" said he one day to Monge, whom he esteemed most highly among the savans of the day, and whom he had constantly with him, "religion such as mine is very simple. I look at this universe, so vast, so complex, so magnificent, and I say to myself, that it cannot be the result of chance, but the work, however intended, of an unknown Omnipotent Being, as superior to man as the universe is to the finest machines of human invention. Search, Monge, obtain the assistance of your friends, the mathematicians and the philosophers; you will not find a more powerful or a more decisive argument, and whatever you may do to oppose it, you will not weaken it. But this truth is too succinct for man; he wishes to know regarding himself, regarding his future, a crowd of secrets which the universe does not disclose. Allow religion to tell him all which he feels the want of knowing, and respect her disclosures. It is true, that what one class of religionists advance is contradicted by others. For my part, I come to conclusions different from those of M. de Volney. Inasmuch as there are different religions which naturally contradict each other, he draws a conclusion against all; he puts forward that all are bad. Now I should rather find them all good, all, at bottom, say the same thing. They are wrong only when they wish to proscribe each other; but that is what must be hindered by good laws. The Catholic religion is that of our country, that in which we were born; she has a government profoundly constructed, which obviates disputes as much as it is possible to obviate the tendency of man to disputation; that government is away from Paris, and we should felicitate ourselves that it is so; it is not at Vienna, it is not at Madrid, it is at Rome, and therefore should be acceptable. If, next after the institution of the papacy, there be any thing approaching it in perfection, it is the relation to the Holy See of the Gallican church, subject to it, yet independent of it, at one and the same time. Catholic unity and Bossuet's articles form, conjoined, the true form of religious government. It is that which we must re-establish. As to Protestantism, it has a right to the most firm protection of government: those who profess it have an absolute right to an equal share in social advantages; but it is not the religion of France. Ages have decided on it. If you propose to the government to make it prevail, you propose an act of violence and an impossibility. Besides, what is more hideous than schism? What can weaken a nation more? Of all civil wars, that which penetrates the heart most deeply, which troubles families the most painfully, is a religious war. We must put an end to that. We are at peace with Europe; let us maintain it as long as we shall be able, but religious peace is the most urgent of all. That being concluded, we have nothing more to apprehend. It is doubtful whether Europe will let us remain long in tranquillity, or that she will be satisfied to see us always as powerful as we are; but, when France shall be united as one man, when the Vendéans and the Bretons shall march in our armies with the men of Burgundy, Lorraine, and Franche Comté, we shall have nothing more to fear from Europe, were she to come against us with all her combined powers."

Such were the conversations held daily by the First Consul with his intimate advisers, with MM. Cambacérès and Lebrun, who were of his opinion, with MM. de Talleyrand, Fouché, Rœderer, who were of contrary opinions to his, with a crowd of members of the Council of State and of the Legislative Body, whose ideas in general differed from his. In these discussions, he spoke with unexemplified warmth and perseverance of purpose. He saw nothing more useful, more urgent, than to put an end to religious differences, and applied himself to it with that ardour which he displayed in things that he looked on as of pre-eminent importance.

He had decided on his plan, which was simple, wisely conceived, and which has been successful in terminating the religious differences of France; for the unhappy disputes, which the First Consul, when emperor, had at a later period with the court of Rome, occurred between him, the Pope, and the bishops, and never affected the religious peace re-established amongst the people. There never sprung up again into existence, even when the Pope was a prisoner at Fontainebleau, two forms of worship, two sections of clergy, or two classes of the faithful.

The First Consul formed the project of reconciling the French republic and the Roman church, by treating with the Holy See, on the very basis of the principles laid down by the Revolution. No longer was there to be a clergy endowed with political power; no longer a clergy having landed property; the thing would have been anomalous in 1800. A clergy solely devoted to the performance of worship, paid by a stipend from the government, appointed by it, and the appointment ratified by the Pope; a new revision of the dioceses, which were to consist of sixty sees, instead of the one hundred and fifty-eight that formerly existed on the territory of old and new France; the regulation of the forms of worship transferred to the civil authority, the jurisdiction of the clergy to the Council of State, instead of the parliaments, since abolished—such was the plan of the First Consul. It was the chief constitution decreed in 1790, with modifications that would render it acceptable to Rome; that is to say, with bishops nominated by the government, and confirmed by the Pope, in place of bishops elected by their flocks, together with a general promise of submission to the laws, instead of the oath taken by the different religious communities—an oath which had served as a pretext for ill-disposed or timorous priests to excite scruples of conscience; it was, in a word, the true reform of worship—the reform to which the Resolution should have confined itself, in order to render it agreeable to the Pope—a circumstance not to be despised, for every religious establishment was impossible without a good understanding with Rome.

It has been said, that a matter of the greatest importance was omitted; namely, to require that bishops nominated by the civil power should be accepted by the Pope, whether he would or would not. In such a case, the government of Rome would have been seriously weakened—a matter not at all desirable. The civil power, in nominating a bishop, indicates the subject in whom it recognises, with the moral qualities of a pastor, the political qualities of a good citizen, who respects, and will cause to be respected, the laws of the country. It belongs to the Pope to say whether, in this subject, he recognises an orthodox priest who will teach the true doctrines of the Catholic church. To wish to confine the period of delay to some months, after which the ratification by the Pope should be considered as granted, would have been to force the ratification itself, to deprive the Pope of his spiritual authority, and to renew no less than the memorable and terrible quarrel of investitures. In matters of religion, there are two authorities, to wit, the civil authority of the country where the religion is practised, charged to watch over the maintenance of the laws and the established powers; and the spiritual authority of the Holy See, charged with watching over the maintenance of unity of faith. It is needful that both should concur in the selection of the clergy. The religious authority of the Holy See sometimes refuses, it is true, to ratify the appointment of the bishops selected; it makes use of this means to force the temporal power. The like has been seen to have occurred, and it is an abuse, though fleeting, yet inevitable. The civil authority, also, may stand back, and that has been seen under Napoleon himself, that most enlightened and most courageous restorer of the ancient Catholic church.

The plan of the First Consul left nothing more to be desired for the definitive establishment of worship; but it was necessary that he should give his mind to the transition, that is to say, the passage from the present state to the approaching one about to be created. What was he to do regarding the sees as they stood? What arrangements were to be made with ecclesiastics of every sort, bishops or simple priests, some sworn and attached to the Revolution, performing worship publicly in the churches; others unsworn, who were emigrants, or had returned from emigration, exercising by stealth the functions of their ministry, and the greater part hostile to his government? A system occurred to the mind of General Bonaparte, the adoption of which was an immense difficulty at the court of Rome; for, during eighteen centuries, the church had never done what was about to be proposed to her. This new system was to abolish all existing dioceses. For that purpose, the former bishops, still living, were to be applied to, and the Pope was to demand of them their resignation. If they refused it, the Pope was to pronounce their deposition; and, when a tabula rasa should thus have been made, sixty new dioceses were to be traced out on the map of France, forty-five of which were to be bishoprics, and fifteen archbishoprics. To fill them, the First Consul was to nominate sixty prelates, taken indiscriminately from among the sworn and unsworn priests; but rather from the latter, who were the most numerous, were held in most consideration, and were most beloved by the faithful. He would choose both from among ecclesiastics worthy of the confidence of government, respectable from their morals, and reconciled to the French Revolution. These prelates, nominated by the First Consul, were to be instituted by the Pope, and at once to enter on their duties, under the surveillance of the civil authority and of the Council of State.

A salary, in proportion to their wants, was to be allotted to them from the Budget of the state. But, in return, the Pope was to recognise as valid the alienation of the church property, to interdict the suggestions which the priests were in the habit of making at the bedside of the dying; to reconcile to Rome the married clergy; to assist the government; in a word, in putting an end to all the calamities of the period.

This plan was a complete one; and, with some exceptions, excellent for the present as well as for the future. It reorganized the church, as much as possible, on the same model as that of the state; it fused down all individual peculiarities, selecting from all parties wise and moderate men, who valued the public good above their revolutionary or religious stubbornness. But we shall presently see how great is the difficulty of executing a good work, even when it is necessary, even when it is a real and pressing want; for, unfortunately, though it be a want, it does not result from it that it presents a clear, evident notion, unsusceptible of being contested.

At Paris, there was the party of scoffers—disciples still living of the philosophy of the eighteenth century; old Jansenists, who had become constitutional priests, and finally, generals, imbued with vulgar prejudices: this was the obstacle on the part of France. But at Rome, there was fidelity to antique precedents; the fear of touching dogma if discipline were altered; religious scruples, sincere or affected; above all, antipathies to our Revolution; and, in particular, a sort of complaisance with regard to the French royalist party, which was composed of emigrant priests or nobles, some residing at Rome, others in correspondence with her, all passionate enemies of France, and of the new order of things beginning to be established in it: this was the obstacle on the part of the Holy See.

The First Consul persisted in his plan with invincible firmness and patience, during one of the longest and most difficult negotiations known in the history of the church. Never had the temporal and spiritual powers met under more important circumstances; never had they been more worthily represented.

That young man, so sensible, so profound in his views, but so impetuous in his will—that young man, who governed France, found himself, by a singular design of Providence, placed on the stage of the world, in presence of a pontiff of rare virtue, of physiognomy and character angelic, but of a tenacity capable of braving martyrdom, where he thought that the interests of the Faith, or those of the court of Rome, were compromised. His countenance, animated, yet mild, told the elevated sensibility of his soul. About sixty years old, weak in health, though he lived to an advanced age, holding down his head and stooping, gifted with a keen and penetrating look, his language graceful and affecting, he was the fit representative not more of that imperious religion, which under Gregory VII. commanded, and deserved to command, barbarous Europe, than of that persecuted religion, which, having no longer in its hands the thunderbolts of the church, was unable to exercise on men any other power than that of mild persuasion.

A secret charm attached him to General Bonaparte; they had both met, as we have said elsewhere, during the wars of Italy, and, in place of these ferocious warriors, spawned by the French Revolution, who were depicted in Europe as profaners of the altar and assassins of emigrant priests, Pius VII., at that time Bishop of Imola, had found a young man full of genius, speaking, like himself, the Italian language, displaying the most moderate sentiments, maintaining order, causing the temples to be respected, and, far from persecuting the French priests, making use of his power to oblige the Italian churches to take them in and support them. Surprised and delighted, the Bishop of Imola restrained the spirit of insubordination of the Italians of his diocese, and repaid General Bonaparte the services which his church had received from him. The impression produced by this first acquaintance was never effaced from the heart of the pontiff, and influenced his whole conduct towards the general, when he became Consul and Emperor; a striking proof that in all things, great or little, a good turn is never lost. In fact, at a later period, when the conclave was assembled at Venice, to elect a successor to Pius VII., who died a prisoner at Valencia, the remembrance of the first acts of the general of the army of Italy had influenced, in a manner we may call providential, the selection of the new Pope.

It will be remembered that, at the very time when Pius VII. was preferred by the conclave, in the hope of finding in him a conciliator, who would reconcile Rome with France, and perhaps put an end to the misfortunes of the church, the First Consul had gained the battle of Marengo, had become master of Italy and ruler of Europe, and had sent an emissary, the nephew of the Bishop of Vercelli, to announce his intentions to the newly-elected pontiff. He sent him word, that, pending ulterior arrangements, peace should exist between France and Rome de facto, on the footing of the treaty of Tolentino, signed in 1797; that there should be no more mention of a Roman republic, the invention of the Directory; that the Holy See should be re-established, and recognised by the French as in ancient times. As to the question of knowing whether the three great provinces of Bologna, Ferrara, and Romagna, were to be restored to the church, not a word was said. But the Pope was replaced on his throne and had peace. All the rest he left to Providence. The First Consul had, moreover, commanded the Neapolitans to evacuate the Roman States, which they had, in fact, evacuated, saving the environs of Benevento and Ponte Corvo. Still more, in all the movements of his armies around Naples and Otranto, the First Consul had given orders to respect the Roman States. He had even sent Murat, who commanded the French army in Lower Italy, to bend his knee at the foot of the papal throne. Monsignor Gonsalvi had then guessed aright, and he was amply rewarded for it; for, on his arrival at Rome, the Pope appointed him Cardinal Secretary of State, first minister of the Holy See, a post which he held during the greatest part of the pontificate of Pius VII. It was in the train of these, in some sort miraculous events, that the Pope, at the request of the First Consul, sent Monsignor Spina, a keen, devout, greedy Genoese priest, to Paris, for the purpose of treating on all matters, political as well as religious. At first, Monsignor Spina had assumed no official title, so much did the holy father, notwithstanding his liking for General Bonaparte, notwithstanding his ardent desire for an approximation, dread to avow his relations with the French republic. But soon, when he saw the ministers of Prussia and of Spain, who were already in Paris, closely followed by those of Austria, Russia, Bavaria, Naples, those, in fact, of all the courts, the pontiff no longer hesitated, and allowed Monsignor Spina to assume an official character, and to avow the object of his mission. The French emigrant party made a great outcry, and tried useless efforts to hinder, by its remonstrances, the approximation of the church to France, knowing well that if it lost religion as a means of keeping up agitation, it would soon lose its best arm. But Pius VII., although chagrined, nay, sometimes intimidated by these remonstrances, showed himself decided to place the interests of religion and of the Holy See above all consideration of party. One single reason slackened a little his excellent resolutions; it was the vague, and by no means wise, hope of recovering the Legations, lost at the time of the treaty of Tolentino.¹

M. Spina, being now in Paris, had orders to gain time, in order to see if the First Consul, as master of Italy, and having the power of disposing of it as he pleased, would entertain the lucky thought of restoring the Legations to the Holy See. An expression which was frequently in the mouth of the First Consul had given rise to more hope than he intended to convey by it. "Let the holy father," said he, "put the utmost confidence in me, let him cast himself into my arms, and I will be for the church another Charlemagne." "If he be a new Charlemagne," replied those priests, who knew but little of the affairs of the age, "let him prove himself to be so by restoring to us the patrimony of St. Peter." Unfortunately, they were out in their reckoning, for the First Consul thought he had done a great deal in re-establishing the Pope at Rome, in restoring to him, with his pontifical throne, the Roman State, in offering to treat with him for the re-establishment of Catholic worship; and, in fact, he had done a great deal, the state of opinion in France and that in Italy being considered. If the French patriots, still full of the ideas of the eighteenth century, saw with little satisfaction the approaching re-establishment of the Catholic church, the Italian patriots saw with despair the re-erection of priestly government over them. It was then impossible for the First Consul to extend his complaisance to the length of restoring the Legations to the Holy See, which Legations could not be of any use in supporting clerical government, and which were, besides, a promised portion of the Cisalpine Republic. But the court of Rome, feeling itself distressed since it had been deprived of the revenues of Bologna, Ferrara, and Romagna, reasoned otherwise. As to the rest, the Pope, who, in the midst of the pomp of the Vatican, lived like an anchorite, thought less of this worldly interest than Cardinal Gonsalvi, and Cardinal Gonsalvi less than Monsignor Spina. The last walked with stealthy step in the negotiation, hearkening to all that was said to him regarding religious questions, having the air of attaching exclusive importance to those, and yet, by some random expressions, dropped from time to time on the poverty of the Holy See, trying to bring about the introduction of the question of the Legations. He had not succeeded in making his hints understood, and was protracting matters, in trying to obtain something that might answer the false hopes imprudently indulged in by his court.

¹ There does not exist a more curious negotiation, or one more deserving of meditation, than that of the Concordat. There does not exist one in which the archives of France are richer in documents; for, besides the diplomatic correspondence of our agents, and above all the Abbé Bernier's own correspondence, we possess that of Monsignor Spina and Cardinal Caprara with the Pope and Cardinal Gonsalvi. The last has remained in our hands in virtue of an article of the Concordat, by which the archives of the Roman legation, in case of a rupture, were to remain in France. The letters of Monsignor Spina and Cardinal Caprara, written in Italian, form one of the most curious monuments of the time, and afford of themselves the secret of the religious negotiations of that period, a secret still very imperfectly known at the present day, even after the divers works published on this matter.

To treat with Monsignor Spina, the First Consul had made choice, as we have said before, of the celebrated Abbé Bernier, the pacificator of La Vendée. This priest, a simple curé in the province of Anjou, unadorned with the externals which a careful education imparts, but gifted with a profound knowledge of mankind, of superior prudence, long exercised amidst the difficulties of civil war, very well read in canonical matters, was the principal author of the re-establishment of peace, in the provinces of the West. He was fond of this peace, because it was his work, and was naturally desirous of every thing that could strengthen it, and looked on the approximation of France to Rome as one of the surest means of rendering it complete and definitive. Nor did he cease from addressing to the First Consul the most earnest entreaties to hasten the negotiations with the church. Furnished with his instructions, he conveyed to the Archbishop of Corinth the proposals of the French government, already put forward: viz., resignation of their sees imposed on all former titular bishops; a new remodelling of dioceses; sixty sees instead of 168; the formation of a new body of clergy, composed of ecclesiastics of all parties; the nomination of this clergy by the First Consul, and their institution by the Pope; a promise of submission to the established form of government; salaries paid from the state budget; a renunciation of church property, and a complete recognition of the right of selling that property; superintendence of the forms of worship to be allowed to the civil authority represented by the Council of State; finally, the pardon of the church for the married priests, and their re-admission to the Catholic communion.

Monsignor Spina was loud in his language, on hearing these conditions put forward; he characterized them as exorbitant, as contrary to the faith, and held up that the Pope would never consent to them. He, first of all, required that in the preamble of the Concordat the Catholic religion should be declared the Religion of the State in France, that the consuls should make a public profession of it, and that the laws and acts contrary to this declaration of a State Religion should be abrogated.

As to the new re-construction of the dioceses, he admitted that the number of sees was great, but he pretended that the Pope had not the right to depose a bishop, that none of his predecessors had dared to do so, in the history of the Roman church, and that if his holiness allowed such an innovation, he would create a second schism directed this time against the holy father himself; that all he could do on this subject was to have an amicable understanding with the First Consul; that those amongst the former bishops who should display good feeling towards the French government should be merely and simply reinstalled in their dioceses, or, at least, in the diocese corresponding to that which they had formerly occupied; that those, on the other hand, who had conducted themselves, or were conducting themselves still, in a manner not meriting the confidence of this government, should be laid aside, and, till their deaths, certainly not far off, considering their great age, administrators, chosen by the Pope and the First Consul, should govern their sees.

Monsignor Spina, then, did not entertain the idea of forming a new clergy, taken from all classes of priests, and from all parties, unless to fill the vacant sees. Still more, he did not wish that the constitutional priests should participate in it, unless they should make one of those solemn recantations, which are a triumph for Rome, and an indemnification for the pardon which she grants.

In regard to the nomination of bishops by the head of the Republic, and their institution by the Pope, there was but little difficulty. The point naturally set out from was the principle that, in treating with Rome, the new government should have all the prerogatives of the old government, and that the First Consul should be considered, in every particular, as the kings of France had been. Hence the nomination of the bishops was his right. Yet, the post of First Consul, at least for the nonce, was elective; General Bonaparte, now invested with that dignity, was a Catholic, but his successors might not be so; and, at Rome, it was not allowed that a Protestant sovereign could nominate bishops. Monsignor Spina demanded that this exception should be looked to.

Every thing regarding the curés was settled. They were to be nominated by the bishops, with the approval of the civil authority.

The promise of submission to the laws was admitted, without entering into the precise terms.

The Pope's sanction of the sales of church property was a stumbling-block to the Roman negotiator. He acknowledged the absolute impossibility of recalling those sales; but demanded that the Holy See should be spared a declaration which might imply a moral asproval of what had taken place on that head. He conceded a renunciation of all ulterior inquiry, while he refused the formal recognition of the right of alienation. "This property," said Monsignor Spina, "known by the names Vota fidelium, patrimonium pauperum, sacrificia peccatorum, the church herself had not the power to alienate. However, she can renounce the prosecution of its recovery." As an indemnification, he demanded a restitution of the domains not yet alienated, and that the dying should have the power of making wills in favour of religious establishments, which implied a renewal of property in mortmain, and was a recommencement of the old order of things, namely, that of a clergy endowed with lands. Finally, the pardon of the married priests, and their reconciliation with the church, was an affair of indulgence, easy, on the part of the court of Rome, which is always disposed to forgive, when the fault is acknowledged by him who has committed it. Still, she excepted from the pardon two classes of priests, to wit, former friars, who had made certain vows, and bishops. This was not the way to acquire for the Holy See the good wishes of the minister of foreign affairs, M. de Talleyrand.

These pretensions of the court of Rome, although they did not imply a real impossibility of coming to an understanding with the French government, showed a glimpse, nevertheless, of serious difference of opinion.

The First Consul felt this, and showed great impatience at it. He had had several interviews with Monsignor Spina, and had declared to him, in person, that he would never depart from the fundamental principle of his project, which consisted in making a tabula rasa, in forming new diocesan arrangements and a new clergy, in deposing the former bishops, and selecting their successors from all classes of priests. He had told him, that the amalgamation of honest and wise men of all parties was his principle of government; that he would apply that principle to the church as well as to the state; that it was the only way left him of putting an end to the troubles of France, and that he would persist in it undeviatingly.

The Abbé Bernier, who, to the very palpable ambition of being the principal instrument in the re-establishment of religion, joined a sincere love of whatever was good, addressed the most earnest entreaties to Monsignor Spina to smooth the difficulties laid in the way by the court of Rome, against the project of the First Consul. "To declare the Catholic religion," said he, "the Religion of the State, was impossible, was contrary to the ideas prevalent in France, and would never be admitted by the Tribunal and the Legislative Body." In place of such declaration, on his view of it, the mention of a fact might be substituted, namely, that the Catholic religion was that of the majority of Frenchmen. The mention of this fact was of as much use as the wished-for declaration. To insist on an impossibility, rather through pride than principle, was to compromise the true interest of the church. The First Consul might assist in person at the solemn rites of worship, and the presence of a man like him at these ceremonies was a great act; but it was necessary to renounce the demand of his going through certain forms, such as confession and communion; that went beyond the bounds within which it was fit he should confine himself with regard to the French public. It was needful to win back opinion, and not to shock it, above all, not to afford it subjects for laughter. The demand of resignation of their sees, addressed to the former bishops, was quite simple; it was a consequence of the step which they had taken in regard to Pius VI., in 1790. At that period, the French prelates, in order to make their resistance seem to arise from anxiety for the faith, and not for their own private interests, had declared that they accepted the Pope as arbitrator, and that they delivered their sees into his hands; that, if he was of opinion that they should abandon them in favour of the civil constitution, they would submit. At the present day, then, it was only taking them at their word, and enacting the fulfilment of that solemn offer. If some amongst them, through personal motives, should be a bar to so great a benefit as the restoration of religion to France, they should no longer be looked on as bishops, but be considered as having resigned from 1790. The Abbé Bernier added, that there was a precedent of this sort in the church, namely, the resignation en masse of the 300 bishops of Africa, agreed on for the purpose of putting an end to the schism of the Donatists. It is true that they had not been deposed. As to the new selections to be made, it was necessary to concede to the First Consul the principle of amalgamation. This principle the First Consul would apply, above all, to the benefit of the unsworn clergy; he would pick out two or three constitutional priests, merely for example's sake, but his principal selection would be from the mass of the orthodox clergy. The French negotiator advanced here on his own responsibility further than he should have done. It is true, that the First Consul set little value on the constitutional bishops, who, for the most part, were narrow-minded Jansenists, or declaimers at the clubs; it is true, that in that body of clergy he esteemed only the ordinary priests, who, in general, had taken the oath through submission to the laws, through a desire of continuing their sacred ministry, and had not taken advantage of the agitations of the time to raise themselves to the sacerdotal hierarchy. Nevertheless, if he had but little respect for the constitutional bishops, he adhered to his principle of amalgamation, and did not bargain away the rights of the sworn clergy so cheaply as the Abbé Bernier seemed to announce. But the Abbé Bernier expressed himself thus to further the success of the negotiation. As to the nomination of the bishops by the First Consul, it was necessary, according to the Abbé Bernier, to get over a very remote and very improbable difficulty, viz. that of some day having a Protestant First Consul. It was not worth while, in his opinion, to look forward to so very unlikely an occurrence. Relatively to the property of the clergy, it was needful to lose no time in drawing up a form of selling it, since they were agreed on the principle. Relatively to the restitution of the unsold property, and to testamentary donations of houses and lands, they were irreconcilable with the political principles in vogue at the time in France, principles absolutely at variance with property in mortmain. That the Roman negotiator should be content in this respect with one concession, namely, that of donations of annuities from the public funds. "In fine," said the Abbé Bernier, "the time has arrived for concluding, for the First Consul was beginning to be dissatisfied. He thought that the Pope had not the energy to break with the emigrant party, for the purpose of giving himself entirely to France. He would end by renouncing the good of which he had at first entertained the thought, and, without persecuting the priests, leaving them to themselves, he would allow the church to become what it could in France, not taking into consideration that he would pursue in Italy a line of conduct hostile to the court of Rome. It was," continued Abbé Bernier, "to have lost all discernment not to profit by the dispositions of so great a man, the only man capable of saving religion. He himself, too, had great difficulties to overcome with regard to the revolutionary party; and, so far from thwarting, one ought to assist him in surmounting these difficulties, by making to him such concessions as he needed for winning to his side opinions, little disposed in France in favour of the Catholic religion."

Monsignor Spina was beginning to be very much embarrassed. He was a believer, but his covetousness surpassed his faith. Incessantly demanding money for his court, his most ardent wish was to make her as rich and as lavish as of yore. But the little success of his insinuations regarding the lost provinces discouraged him singularly. He perceived that the First Consul, as wily as the Italian priests, did not wish to be communicative with persons who were not communicative themselves. He saw, moreover, all the courts at his feet; he saw the Russian negotiator, M. de Kalitscheff, who had wished, in so insolent a manner, to protect the petty Italian princes, go away disappointed, all Germany dependent on France for the partition of the territorial indemnities; Portugal submissive, and England herself brought to make peace through fatigue. Confronted by such a state of things, he was convinced that he had no longer any other resource than to submit, and to trust for what he was desirous, to the sole will of the First Consul. Disposed to yield, Monsignor Spina was still afraid to give his adherence to the very arbitrary conditions which the French cabinet had laid down, with the evident resolution of not swerving from them, because they were established by the imperious necessities of the state of things.

The First Consul, with his accustomed cleverness, relieved the Roman negotiator from embarrassment. It was the moment, already described above, when all the negotiations were going on together, especially those with England. Thinking, with a sort of joy, on the prodigious effect that a general peace would have, which should comprise even the church herself, he wished to have done with it by a

